However, in view of the fact that Bill 36 was adopted by the Quebec National Assembly and then given royal assent on July 31, 1974, it is imperative, to clarify the related federal statutes, that the federal Parliament eliminate all references to the Court of Queen's Bench to leave only references to the Superior Court as the court of first instance which now exercises all jurisdiction both in civil and criminal matters.

[English]

Honourable senators, you will understand that in supporting this bill it is essential to appreciate the problems that have been experienced in the province of Quebec. Until the new law was adopted by the National Assembly of Quebec, there had been a court of first instance, the Court of Queen's Bench, having jurisdiction in only criminal matters, and another, the Superior Court, having jurisdiction in only civil matters. That created many difficulties, some of which I hope will be avoided in the future as a result of this bill, and for these reasons I support the motion moved by Senator Langlois.

[Translation]

Senator Robichaud: Honourable senators, I would like to put a question which may be overly simplistic, but as a lawyer who has always practised in provinces with no civil code, what is the subtle difference, if any, between the Superior Court of Quebec and the Court of Queen's Bench?

Senator Flynn: Obviously I thought I had explained it. The Quebec law stated that the court of first instance in criminal cases should be called the Court of Queen's Bench and that the court of first instance authorized to deal in civil cases should be named the Superior Court.

So there were two names, if you prefer, one for the court having jurisdiction in civil cases and the other for the court exercising it in criminal cases. Because of the confusion which may sometimes arise between what may be considered of a criminal or of a civil nature, the Superior Court said: I have no jurisdiction, the other has it. The Court of Queen's Bench replied: I have no jurisdiction, it is the Superior Court which has it.

So Quebec has just passed legislation providing for the situation now existing in all the other provinces, where the court of first instance has double authority, in criminal and civil matters, so that it will no longer be possible to pass the buck.

[English]

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the honourable senator speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

[Translation]

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I do not believe I have much to add to the rather lengthy and detailed remarks I made Tuesday evening as mover of this bill.

I shall limit myself to merely adding a brief comment on the question put by Senator Robichaud and the reply given to it by my colleague, the Leader of the Opposition, Senator Flynn.

I should like to add, to clarify the situation, that I believe Senator Robichaud studied at Laval University, possibly not at its law school, but I do know that he is a former student of that university.

In any event, I should not have too much trouble making him understand fully the reply Senator Flynn has just given him although, to my mind, the answer is crystal clear. The Quebec imbroglio results from the fact that our Superior Court, which is a court of first instance, has two jurisdictions: one, jurisdiction of first instance in civil matters, and two, jurisdiction of first instance in criminal law. However, in addition to that, the judicial structure had a second level. There was duplication at the first level, as I have just pointed out, that is to say that the Court of Queen's Bench had appeal jurisdiction; it was primarily a court of appeal with added jurisdiction of first instance in criminal matters. The result of this was that this appeal Court of Queen's Bench, which was also a court of first instance in criminal matters, was presided over, in its criminal jurisdiction, by the same judges, those of the Superior Court. That is where the whole confusion was coming from. When a justiciable person turned to this court of first instance in criminal matters, he or she had to decide whether the case should be taken before the Court of Queen's Bench or the Superior Court. That is where all this imbroglio, all this mess, all this procedural duplication was stemming from. As I said Tuesday evening, it forced the justiciable to take in a short time a quick decision on a matter of precedence which was confusing and which gave birth to different views. It ensured that a judge of the Superior Court, acting as a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench in criminal matters, could reject a request simply because the applicant turned to a judge of the Superior Court rather than to a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench.

The contradiction, the mess I mentioned, derived from this false situation.

Now, as Senator Flynn added, after 125 years of many judicial errors, after 125 years of mess, Quebec is adopting exactly the same judicial structure which exists in the other provinces of the country—only one Superior Court of first instance, with twin jurisdictions, criminal and civil. The appeal court is simply left with jurisdiction over appeals in both areas too. Thus confusion and mess are removed at the same time.

I think this supplementary explanation will make Senator Robichaud and all my colleagues understand the necessity of passing the legislation before us today.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, although I do not press the motion, I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. As I say, I do not insist. I am in the hands of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: As far as I am concerned, I would not insist. After all, we have all the facts. I do not see what the committee could add to what is already on the record.

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I agree. I see no reason for referring this bill to the committee.

Senator Langlois: May I be permitted to withdraw my motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Langlois, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

CRIMINAL CODE (CONTROL OF WEAPONS AND FIREARMS)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Donald Cameron moved second reading of Bill S-14, to amend the Criminal Code (control of weapons and firearms).

He said: Honourable senators, Bill S-14 represents the introduction, for the third time, of the legislation I introduced in the Senate on February 5, 1973, and which died on the Order Paper with the close of that particular session. At that time it was known as Bill S-2. It was re-introduced as Bill S-4 on April 2, 1974. There followed a very good debate. For this reason, in my judgment, we do not need a lengthy debate on the present bill, Bill S-14, but I would hope to move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs as soon as it is convenient to do so.

In this respect, I suggest that the hearings of that committee should be set sufficiently far ahead so that interested people who may wish to appear will have ample time to make arrangements. I have had letters from people as far away as Halifax in the east and Edmonton in the west who have indicated they would like to appear before this committee. This should be kept in mind by the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Honourable senators, it is not my purpose to repeat the arguments made in the previous debate in favour of more strict gun control. In order to refresh your memories, I should like to emphasize a few of the main points, and to quote from the statistics, which are becoming more horrendous all the time. When this subject was debated on the last occasion, I put statistics on the record as of that date and I want to bring them up now to the current date.

In the United States, the country for which the most complete statistics are available, in the year 1971 alone there were 11,300 murders, 2,400 gun accidents, 10,000 suicides, 20,000 accidental woundings, 92,000 aggravated assaults by use of guns, 160,000 robberies at gunpoint, for a grand total of 295,900, almost 300,000, assaults with guns. These figures are shocking and the record indicates they are increasing year by year. They are increasing also in Canada, where there were 292 murders in 1972. In the United Kingdom, in the same period, these crimes were increasing at an annual rate of 17 to 24 per cent.

I received some figures this morning to show that in Canada in 1972 there were 478 victims of murderous assault, of whom 199 were shot, that is, 41.6 per cent. In 1973 there were 474 victims, of whom 214 were shot, that is, 45.1 per cent. These figures include only cases where charges were laid of capital or non-capital murder; they do not include incidents of manslaughter.

Honourable senators, I know that many people have attacked this bill because they do not want to see any form of gun control legislation, and they cite a number of grounds for that attitude, of which the following are the most typical. Preliminary cost analyses prepared for the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence in the United States by the Research Associates Incorporated of Washington, D.C. in December, 1968, show first year costs estimated for the national firearms registration system to be $25,500,000, and the second year and continuing costs to be $22,500,000. In addition, there are indirect costs involved in the sale of hunting licences, tags, permits, and so on, to hunters. These have brought in a revenue of $81.5 million in the United States. This puts a different complexion on the total cost of $22,500,000 and the $28 million brought in from excise and sales taxes on ammunition.

The argument, therefore, is that the annual revenue of $100 million would be lost to the federal treasury if hunting was curtailed or prohibited. Then they raise the argument that there are heavy indirect costs of maintaining the bureaucracy needed to enforce the legislation. To put it in other words, and these are United States figures, they estimate that the cost in personnel, time, inconvenience and so on would be around $450 million per year. That seems a large amount of money, but when spread over the entire United States it is not so large.

Recently, we have seen an increase in crime associated with the use of drugs. The incidence of drug use in association with crimes of violence has increased markedly. However, it seems that the curve is beginning to dip and we can only hope that it will continue to do so.

● (1500)

There are those in the United States who suggest that the United States should set about disarming itself by 1983. It might be said that Canada should follow that example. However, while a 1970 amendment to the Canadian Criminal Code restricted the sale and ownership of handguns, automatic weapons and rifles to persons granted permits by the police or by a provincial attorney general, it provided no restriction on the sale or ownership of shotguns and rifles for hunting purposes. That means that, practically speaking, any person 16 years of age or over can purchase a shotgun or a rifle in any sporting goods shop without having to give his name or address.

As honourable senators are aware, the proposed anti-gun legislation has evoked considerable correspondence and discussion. Numerous organizations, such as women's institutes, missionary societies, and so on, have begun discussing the matter. Only yesterday I received a letter from an organization in the St. John's Presbyterian Church in Medicine Hat. The letter, which in part is an excerpt from a recently passed "resolution" concerning programs of radio, television, theatre and movies, in my opinion states the case rather well. It says in part:

The world of tomorrow depends on our children and grandchildren, who are our most precious heritage. What they see and hear has a tremendous influence on young minds.

1. Plays (more often than not) portray the immoral as the natural and normal way of life.
2. Radio and TV pour out thousands of suggestive songs that keep sex constantly in the minds of young listeners, thus lowering their ideals.

I did not know they had to listen to the radio to keep that in their minds.

3. Some plays are geared to cause people to lose respect for policemen and the law.

That is true and it is serious.

4. Plays on crime and violence are too numerous, teaching all the intricacies of crime. Most of us would never see a murder in our lifetime but by TV our children and grandchildren can see one or more each day.
5. Many producers make more money out of undesirable shows, caring nothing for the good of our young people.
6. There is much that subtly scoffs at faith in God, undermining values of right and wrong in impressionable young minds.

The authors of this letter have sent copies of it to sponsors of programs, to television and radio stations, to theatre managers, to Members of the House of Commons and the Senate, to censorship boards, to the CRTC and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I wish them luck in their campaign. It is worthy of support.

No sensible person pretends that stricter gun laws will eliminate the use of guns by criminals. In other words, the professional criminal will obtain guns in one way or another. However, if we enacted more restrictive legislation it might help to cut down the accessibility of guns in several ways. First, restricting the availability of guns would make it harder for guns to be obtained for the commission of crimes, thus reducing the amount of crime in which guns are used. Secondly, if more complete records of gun sales were kept, it would be easier to trace guns used in the commission of crimes. Thirdly, if we had stricter gun licensing, then known criminals, the insane and the irresponsible would not be able to procure guns legally. The point is that there must be a stiffening of the penalties for all kinds of crimes. The molycoddling of criminals must be brought to an end. It should be made more difficult to obtain parole—and in my opinion a careful re-examination of the laws in that respect is long overdue. The penalties for breach of parole should be made more severe.

Those are only some of the points that should be kept in mind when looking at the matter of more effective gun control. I wonder how many senators are aware that one of the common rights of initiation in certain young people's organizations, a right which is regarded with a certain amount of pride, is that the initiate, in order to prove his manhood, must steal a car or commit some crime of the kind. This reveals a rather sick attitude towards society and towards the law. Surely, we should look carefully at those voluntary agencies in society which would have the effect of encouraging such an approach to life or attitude towards society.

For those reasons I commend this bill, honourable senators, and suggest that in putting forward such a measure we are producing legislation which is timely, which is in the public interest and which, as soon as it is implemented, will help to cut down the growing incidence of serious crime in this country. That the incidence of serious crime is increasing there can be no doubt. The increase in the number of murders in Canada over the last few years is shocking. From 1972 to 1973 alone there was an increase from 41.6 per cent to 45.1 in the number of murders committed—a substantial increase in just one year.

I suggest that if Bill S-14 becomes law, although it may not eliminate the use of guns in serious crimes, it will help to reduce the incidence of crimes involving the use of guns.

If this bill receives second reading today, I intend to move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. I would suggest that provision be made sufficiently far in advance to enable people who have expressed an interest in appearing before the committee to have ample time to arrange to do so. I think there is no need for me to take time to discuss it more fully here. It should receive ample study before that committee, and people who have arguments pro and con should have an opportunity to express their views. Out of that hearing, I hope, will come some amendments to the bill as it stands now, and that the result of the discussions will be a much more effective and practical bill than we have at the present time. I therefore recommend this bill to your favourable consideration.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Cameron, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

SCIENCE POLICY

COMMITTEE APPOINTED TO ORGANIZE AND HOLD CONFERENCE TO ESTABLISH COMMISSION ON THE FUTURE

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne moved pursuant to notice:

That a Special Committee of the Senate, to be known as the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy, be appointed to organize and hold a Conference for the purpose of determining the feasibility of establishing a Commission on the Future, whose responsibility would be to help as many private and public organizations as possible to forecast and build their future not only in isolation but together, as was recommended in Chapter 13 of Volume 2 of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy;

That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisers and to incur such other special expenses as may be necessary for the purpose of organizing and holding the said Conference; and

That the committee be composed of the Honourable Senators Asselin, Bélisle, Blois, Bonnell, Bourget, Buckwold, Cameron, Carter, Giguère, Godfrey, Goldenberg, Grosart, Haig, Hastings, Heath, Hicks, Lamontagne, Lang, Manning, Neiman, Phillips, Riel, Robichaud, Rowe, Stanbury, Thompson, van Roggen and Yuzyk.

[Translation]

He said: Honourable senators, since this is the first time I take part in the debates of this House during this session, I hope that you will allow me to offer my most sincere congratulations to Madam Speaker for the honour and great responsibility that have been conferred upon her recently. I am convinced that her great modesty will not hide for long her other great qualities.

Since this motion had been approved by this House on March 27 of last year, I certainly do not intend to take up much of your time to justify it all over again.

I would however like to remind you that this conference would have two main purposes. First, to determine the feasibility of creating in Canada a research system on the future with a centre which could, at least temporarily, be within the Economic Council. Second, to determine the feasibility of creating an information system on the future with a central relay station which could be called the Commission on the Future or better still in my opinion, Futures Canada.

This information centre, which would create a link between researchers and decision-makers, would be a private non-profit organization which could have four main functions: First, to convince as many private and public organizations as possible to establish a future research service and help these organizations establish such services.

Second, to create a data bank containing the valid results of future research in Canada and in the rest of the world and transmit this information in a usable form to the research services of private and public organizations linked with the centre.

Third, to maintain, in co-operation with management schools and futurists, a training program which would help managers better understand the various forecasting techniques and use them in such a way that the decision-making could be more oriented towards the long-term future.

Fourth, to organize annual meetings, on a regional and national level, between private and public organizations linked to the information system and representing various segments of the Canadian society, so that they may have a better mutual understanding and that they may eventually come to a consensus as concerns the problems and challenges of the future, which would set the foundations of the future-oriented democracy.

[English]

The proposed conference would be attended by about 150 top Canadian decision-makers representing the various segments of Canadian society and the best futurists in the world. It would be called to consider why there is a need for a Canadian Centre of Futures Studies and for Futures Canada, what these two institutions should do to meet that need and how they could do it.

Last March, I said in this chamber that I was preparing, in collaboration with our small staff, an extensive working paper covering these various topics for the consideration of the members of the Special Committee on Science Policy. The first draft of that paper, entitled "Futures Studies and Futures Information in Canada," which I have here, was made available to the members of the committee in April, but unfortunately our committee died before we were able to discuss it. I remember very clearly that the Leader of the Opposition, at the end of the last session, deplored the fact that our committee would cease to exist if Parliament were dissolved, and that this would delay the preparation of the conference. Of course, he was completely right, but as I noted at that time, there was no way to avoid this difficulty.

Fortunately, Mr. Pocock and Mr. Ostiguy have been able to go on with their work. They have gathered information on the organization of futures studies in other countries. They have sought the views of experts both in Canada and abroad on the structure, the role and the activities that we have in mind for the proposed Commission on the Future, or Futures Canada, as I now prefer to call it. Detailed background information has been obtained on more than 80 Canadian organizations and individuals having a declared interest and capability in the field of futures research. A report has been prepared, listing more than 7,000 Canadian associations and organizations which would constitute the potential market of the proposed commission. Finally, a second draft of our working paper will be ready in the next few weeks.

The contacts I have had with a great number of people during the last few months, including groups of teachers at the secondary school level, have convinced me that a rapidly increasing number of Canadians are deeply interested in the problems and opportunities raised by the future. World events, including the oil crisis, the population explosion and the food problem, have greatly contributed to this increasing interest. We realize more and more that mankind has reached a turning point and that if collective action based on a broad consensus is not taken soon, we will face a crisis of unprecedented proportions. We have made considerable progress in developing such a consensus since the special Senate committee issued its first warning in Volume 2 of its report, published in January 1972.

Senator Perrault, before he became the Leader of the Government in the Senate, expressed this new awareness in a speech made in Vancouver in May 1974. He stated:

The oil crisis... the energy crisis... the food production problem... environmental preservation and now... competition for the riches and the resources of the world's oceans... are problems which must be faced by this generation. There appear to be two alternatives... The path to what has been described as a "viable planetary society" or the path to anarchy and the ultimate collapse of world order.

He went on to say:

The problem is that today's dilemmas appear to dwarf anything we have known before and they will require proportionately more effective solutions.

And he added:

If we do not take care, through reflection and collective planning, our society and the whole of humanity will face even more numerous and more serious crises while the era of exceptional quantitative growth will go on during the next few decades.

At the time Senator Perrault was making these observations, he did not know that he was practising cabinet solidarity even before becoming a minister. Indeed, at about the same time as the leader was speaking in Vancouver, the Prime Minister of Canada was making a similar and most remarkable speech at Duke University on May 12, 1974, which unfortunately attracted very little attention in Canada. He said:

One need not be a neo-Malthusian, or a subscriber to any of the pessimistic theories now abounding, to have learned that there are limits to the rate at which the earth's resources can be exploited, that there are limits to the ability of our biosphere to absorb pollution, that there are limits to the capacity of the globe to support human life. These truths we now know and accept.

But until that knowledge is made manifest in an extended sense of responsibility, it will be of little use to mankind. The classical scope of responsibility—to one's self, to one's family, to one's community and nation—must be broadened. Not even the biblical admonition of responsibility to all men is sufficiently broad. The new responsibility must be more. It must extend to all space and through all time. It must be inclusive of persons far beyond our own national frontiers; it must encompass the physical planet and all its ingredients—water and air, non-renewable resources, living organisms; it must extend into the future, not just for months or years, but for decades.

This much needed extended concept of responsibility is precisely what we hope the proposed Commission on the Future, or Futures Canada, would help to spread. The Prime Minister called for a new "community ethic" which would require "an understanding that no individual, no government, no nation is capable of living in isolation, or of pursuing policies inconsistent with the interests—both present and future—of others.” But he warned that we could not expect the development of such a new ethic, based on the concept of interdependence and on a broad future-oriented consensus, solely from governments. He said:

The direction in which a nation is to move may be fixed by its leaders, but the speed with which the nation responds depends upon the influence of others. And especially is this so in the democracies where Siren-like appeals originate from so many sources and interests. No single political leader, no group of political leaders, is capable of changing the values and attitudes of a whole society.

This is precisely why I believe that an institution like Futures Canada is so much needed, not only here but in other countries as well, to help change the values and attitudes of society. As I said earlier, there is a growing recognition in the world today that mankind is reaching a turning point. Some people still believe that this transition will be smooth because it will generate its own moral conversion. Few people today would accept this optimistic view. At the other extreme there are those who see the future as a storm of crises and problems that will be overcome not by the wisdom and foresight of man, but by the saving intervention of nature.

This second message of despair can hardly be viewed by mankind as an acceptable scenario for the future. As far as I am concerned, I am much more inclined to agree with the Prime Minister's assessment of the turning point as a great challenge to be met positively. He said in his speech at Duke University:

The challenge is immense, and I am glad that it is, for only the greatest of challenges are able to capture the imagination of men and women everywhere.

The challenge is at once both basic and sophisticated and I am glad that it is, for only a challenge of many parts is able to stimulate simultaneously the response of theologians, philosophers, scientists, and politicians.

The challenge is not a gloomy one of avoiding doomsday; it is a joyous one of introducing into the world a dynamic equilibrium between man and nature, between man and man.

The Senate will make a great contribution toward meeting this immense, basic, sophisticated and joyous challenge if it sponsors a successful conference which it is hoped will serve as a launching pad for the establishment of two national networks of research and information on the future, designed to improve the decision-making process of as many private and public organizations as possible, and to gradually develop a broad future-oriented consensus in our society. My participation in the last meeting of the Club of Rome in West Berlin at the beginning of October leads me to believe that several other nations are closely watching what we in the Senate are trying to do, and will soon begin, in my view, to imitate our experiment if it is successful.

Yesterday Senator Croll expressed the view that too many members were assigned to the committee proposed in this motion, and that this might prevent other committees from functioning properly. I must indicate, however, that the proposed committee will not wish to meet very often. Unlike others, it is not asked to make a long and complicated inquiry, but to prepare a conference. Its main responsibility will be to approve a working paper which will serve as background information to guide the conference, and to determine the date and the format of that meeting. Once the preliminary work has been carried out by the steering committee and the staff, the full committee will be able to make the major decisions fairly quickly.

The reason for inviting a large number of senators to join the proposed committee is that a good public relations job must be mounted throughout the country to make it known that the Senate is sponsoring a conference on the future, to explain the nature and purpose of such a meeting, and to persuade the top decision-makers of the country to attend the conference. It will be expected that the members of the committee will participate actively in these public relations activities. This is the reason why an adequate regional representation is being sought, but most of this work will be carried on when the Senate is not sitting.

In such circumstances I hope that the membership of the committee will be as set out in the motion, and as it was approved by the Senate when I moved the same motion last March.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: There is a question I should like to put to the honourable senator. If I understood his remarks correctly concerning the responsibilities of the members of the committee, their main function would be to draw the attention of various groups throughout Canada to the possibilities of participating in the conference he suggests. Will this committee be expected to complete the studies already under way, or will its main function be to call the attention of the public to it and make an attempt to sell to the public of Canada this idea of a conference for the future?

Senator Lamontagne: As I have just explained, I believe the first responsibility of the members of the committee will be to approve the contents and orientation of the working paper which I feel will be very useful to us, not only to guide the conference but also to plan it so that the meeting is not like all others, so that the group does manage to study the agenda submitted to it and deal with it efficiently.

I do believe the first function of the members of the committee will be very important, but it should not take up too much of their time seeing that, after having read the document, two or three meetings should be enough to discuss its contents. As I said, the second function of the members of the committee, as I see it, should be to decide on the date and the format of the conference, and to give instructions to the organization committee and the staff of the various segments of society which should be represented at the conference. This will be a very complicated problem, difficult to solve, because we would very much like the main sectors of society, the churches, industry, universities, labour unions, and so on, to be adequately represented.

It will be a very difficult problem for us to choose the main leaders in those various sectors.

Finally, as I said earlier, it will be essential, I think, for the members of the committee when they have the opportunity to deliver speeches and make contact with the main policy makers of their respective areas, to let them know that the Senate intends to organize that conference, to convince those who will be invited to accept the invitation and not to send a representative who would not have the authority to speak on behalf of his organization or association.

[English]

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I need hardly say that as a member of Senator Lamontagne's committee, the Senate Special Committee on Science Policy, my inclination is to make some fairly extended comments on the motion. However, I believe there are good reasons why it might be in the interests of the expediting of this very important proposal that, if it is the wish of the Senate, it be approved as soon as possible. For that reason I shall merely say that I am in the fullest concord with the motion. I believe it is something upon which we are already well launched, or upon which the committee—which, of course, has not yet been reappointed—was launched.

I realize why there is so much emphasis at the present time on discussion of futures, and the recent recognition of the crises which appear to face mankind. One accepts the fact that there is a new awareness in the world of problems of the ecology generally, the depletion of resources, the great question of food supply, with a third of the world population faced possibly with starvation in the next year or so, the great problem of the spread of pollution, and so on. However, I sometimes regret that so much emphasis is placed on the crisis nature of discussions on the future.

We use the term "futures" today in the plural, as Senator Lamontagne has done throughout his explanation of the motion, for the very good reason that we have gone far beyond the old concept of merely forecasting or predicting the future. We are looking today to the development of what are sometimes known as normative values, to set up targets of good behaviour for mankind as a whole. We use the term in the plural to avoid any suggestion that a group or conference of this type will produce a general conclusion, "this is the one proper future for mankind". Clearly we do not know, and will never know. We say "futures" because in my view—and I think in that of others who have studied this matter much more than I—the essence of the approach to the problem is that we must always think of it in terms of alternatives. We are thinking, first of all, of what futures are available—what futures are likely to happen—because there is no single future. Tragedies or successes may take many different forms, which means that we must consider solutions which will take many different forms. I am sure that this is something that will come out of the discussions of the committee, and particularly of the conference which we hope will follow.

● (1540)

We still hear once in a while from those who are not in favour of these kinds of studies that this is just crystal gazing, mere forecasting. Of course, there must always be, in any approach to this important subject, a degree of prediction. We must try to say, "Given present facts and present data, this is likely to happen or that is likely to happen." That is why such studies become so complicated, because we have moved so far away from the old concept of looking to a single future.

I would also hope that we will remember that the study of futures—it has become a science in recent years—is concerned with many other aspects of human progress, whatever it might be, than merely the avoidance of certain disasters.

There is the positive side to it. I know, from discussions that have already taken place, that we will not be concentrating merely on the crises which have been brought to our attention most spectacularly in the last few years. We shall be looking at the whole set of futures.

As Senator Lamontagne said in reply to Senator Asselin, we shall ask church people to come before us. As an example of what comes to mind, we might look at organizations such as the YMCA, the YMHA, and the YWCA—I see Senator Fergusson expecting me to add that—and see what their future might be. Will such organizations always be concerned with young people? Will they always be concerned with Christian or Hebrew people? Will they always be associations? We do not know. We would hope that as we bring people together in the preliminary studies, and in the conference itself, we shall be able to provide the impetus, the motivation, for Canadians in almost every activity—farmers, teachers, the labour movement, the business community—to think in terms of their own futures, and then, at some time, perhaps in the conference, to bring this data, this input, together to draw a set of viable futures for Canada and Canadians.

Honourable senators, that is all I shall say at this time. I can assure Senator Lamontagne that the members of the committee with whom I have spoken—I have spoken to most of them—are looking forward to renewing this very interesting activity. I therefore commend the motion and hope it will have reasonably speedy passage through the Senate.

INCOME TAX

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY LEGISLATION

Senator Everett, for Senator Hayden, moved pursuant to notice:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine and consider any bill based on the Budget Resolutions relating to income tax in advance of any such bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto; and may be necessary for the purpose of the said examination.

He said: Honourable senators, by way of a short explanation, this is a motion that has been used before in the Senate on behalf of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to expedite the hearing of a very complicated bill. In this case, we are asking for permission to consider the Budget Resolutions relating to income tax in advance of a bill coming before the Senate. This is a device that we used with respect to the 1971 income tax amendments. It permits the Senate to take the appropriate and proper amount of time to consider a bill as complicated as an income tax bill, instead of having to meet a deadline later in the session.

THE GREY CUP

NATIONAL FOOTBALL FINAL IN VANCOUVER—QUESTION

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, we heard that during the weekend the Leader of the Government in the Senate was the Prime Minister's representative in Vancouver at the football game between the Edmonton Eskimos and the Montreal Alouettes. Could he give the Senate a very brief resumé of the game?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have analyzed the outcome of the game very carefully, and it is my well-considered theory that the Montreal Alouettes won because their quarterback was far more adept in the back-stroke than was the Edmonton quarterback.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Asselin: Is it in order that the honourable Leader of the Government send a telegram, on behalf of the Senate, to the Montreal Alouettes congratulating them on the national championship they won in Vancouver?

Senator Perrault: That proposal will be given careful consideration. There was no doubt about the superiority of the Alouettes on Saturday afternoon.

Senator Langlois: The Alouettes could swim.

Senator Langlois moved the third reading of Bill S-16, to revise references to the Court of Queen's Bench of the Province of Quebec.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PRIVATE BILL

INTERNATIONAL AIR TRANSPORT ASSOCIATION—SECOND READING

Hon. Alan A. Macnaughton moved the second reading of Bill S-18, respecting International Air Transport Association.

He said: Honourable senators, as this is a private bill originating in the Senate, and as its title is fairly long, I thought I should give the Senate some explanation of what the association is, what it does and why this bill is before us. I think an explanation should be on the record in case the bill is sent to committee, because the association is rather an interesting one.

The International Air Transport Association—IATA—is a non-profit organization incorporated in 1945 by a special act of the Parliament of Canada being Statutes of Canada, 9-10 George VI, chapter 51.

IATA is an association of 111 of the world's scheduled air carriers. It is a voluntary and non-political organization of airlines flying the flags of more than eighty states, and the majority of its member enterprises are either fully government-owned or at least government-controlled.

The purposes, aims and objectives of IATA, as set out in its existing act of incorporation are:

- (a) to promote safe, regular and economical air transport for the benefit of the peoples of the world, to foster air commerce and to study the problems connected therewith;
- (b) to provide means for collaboration among the air transport enterprises engaged directly or indirectly in international air transport service;
- (c) to co-operate with the International Civil Aviation Organization and other international organizations.

In pursuing these objectives, IATA provides the forum for technical, legal, security, commercial, financial and other co-operation among its members. It acts as a spokesman of the international air transport industry to governments and international organizations.

The ultimate authority of the association is vested in the general meeting. Such meetings are held annually throughout the world at specified places on specified dates.

An executive committee of 21 presidents and/or chief executives is elected by the annual general meeting. The committee is vested with the general management and control of the association and, subject to the general meeting, fixes its policy and supervises its activities. The chief executive is the director general, Mr. K. Hammarskjöld, who is responsible for implementing that policy of the association. The work of the association is largely carried out through a number of committees made up of senior industry executives.

IATA is, of course, a purely non-profit organization. It derives its revenues entirely from its members. Its budget for 1975 is $12 million, and its full-time staff totals 470. The head office is located in Montreal, and the association's other principal office is in Geneva. Branch offices and compliance staff are maintained in more than 30 cities around the world.

Probably the best known aspect of IATA's work is in the field of rates and fares. The IATA traffic conferences consider and act upon all international air traffic matters involving passengers, cargo and mail, including fares, rates, schedules and agency matters. The traffic conferences function by authority vested in them by governments in an estimated 1,500 bilateral air transport agreements. The resolutions formulated by the traffic conferences are then subject to government approval. In the absence of an inter-governmental organization to accomplish these objectives, IATA provides the recognized framework for setting international air fares and charges.

In 1945, when the association was incorporated, virtually all public air services were provided on a scheduled basis. Therefore, it was natural that membership in the association should be open to air transport enterprises operating scheduled services. In fact, membership in the association was, and is still, limited to air transport enterprises as defined in the act of incorporation which operate an air service as defined in the act between the territories of two or more states—active membership—or to any such air transport enterprise operating scheduled air services—associate membership.

A definition of "air service" and "air transport enterprise" is contained in paragraphs (a) and (b) of section 1 of the act of incorporation. The said paragraphs now read as follows:

- (a) "air service" means, any scheduled air service performed by aircraft for the public transport of passengers, mail or cargo;
- (b) "air transport enterprise" includes those persons, corporate bodies and unincorporated bodies, companies, firms, partnerships, societies and associations, now or hereafter operating a scheduled air service for public hire, under proper authority, in the transport of passengers, mail or cargo under the flag of a State eligible to membership in the International Civil Aviation Organization.

However, over the years since 1945 the distinction between scheduled and non-scheduled services has been progressively eroded, and now a significant proportion of the public demand for international air transport is met by charter operators. For example, in 1973, 22.6 per cent of international passenger traffic was carried by charter operators. IATA has, therefore, gradually become less representative than it was in 1945. If the objectives of the association, particularly in the field of rates and fares and its role as spokesman for the international air transport industry, are to be fulfilled, the association must be able to represent all air carriers.

More specifically, the worldwide increase in charter traffic has been most pronounced in respect of travel over the North Atlantic, between points in North America and points in Europe. During the last five years the net effect of this change was that in 1973 26 per cent of the North Atlantic traffic was carried in the form of charters. While a large portion of this charter traffic was carried by IATA members, the fact remains that this large segment of the market remained entirely outside the rate-making responsibility of IATA. The IATA traffic conferences experienced increased difficulty in agreeing on scheduled fares in the absence of any form of agreement regarding charters which occupied more than one-quarter of the total North Atlantic market.

Over the last six months the governments of the United States and Canada, and the European Civil Aviation Conference have recognized this vacuum, and both scheduled and non-scheduled carriers have felt the need to fill it. Negotiations have been initiated between IATA members and non-IATA carriers in an attempt to establish minimum charter rates and related conditions through the medium of ad hoc separate inter-carrier meetings. Although these meetings have not yet produced results, they have brought home to IATA members the need to eliminate the administrative difficulties involved in carrying on parallel negotiations in their own traffic conferences and, at the same time, conducting similar talks in a separate forum with charter carriers.

The admission to IATA of non-scheduled carriers will, therefore, enable IATA to create a single forum to negotiate fares and rates covering the total market, both scheduled and charter. More important, any agreement achieved through these negotiations would be subjected to the efficient compliance organization of IATA.

With respect to the enhancement of IATA's role as the authoritative spokesman for the international air transport industry, the extension of membership in IATA to charter carriers will not only benefit IATA members, but will also be in the interest of charter carriers and the public. The variety of facilities designed to help IATA members through the association activities will, of course, automatically be available to them. These include the IATA clearing house, the agency program, compliance machinery, other traffic, legal and technical activities and, finally, participation in formulating the common industry position.

[Senator Macnaughton.]

In brief, it is in the realization that if the aims and objectives of IATA are to be met in the modern world, it is necessary for all air carriers to have the opportunity to become members of the association. Thus, the purpose of this bill is to authorize the association to admit into its membership air transport enterprises which are not designated airlines operating scheduled air services under inter-governmental agreements. This would enable supplemental and charter carriers operating air charters to participate in furthering the association's objectives in the total air transport system, as it has developed since the act of incorporation was passed.

To accomplish this, it is proposed that the word "scheduled" in paragraphs (a) and (b) of section 1 of the act of incorporation, be deleted.

That, honourable senators, is the purpose of the bill, which, on the surface, looks rather simple. It simply eliminates the word "scheduled," thus opening the association to both charter carriers and designated carriers.

Senator Heath: I wonder if the honourable senator would mind repeating the percentage of traffic carried by unscheduled air carriers at the present time, and explain whether that percentage takes into account cargo, mail and passengers?

Senator Macnaughton: The figure I gave was 26 per cent for the North Atlantic. I think it refers to passenger traffic, not cargo. That is subject to correction, because I do not pretend to be a super-authority.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I understand this bill, under our rules, will automatically go to a committee, and will no doubt be examined carefully there. However, I would ask the sponsor one or two questions which may be of general interest.

First, what is the position of the Canadian Transport Commission vis-à-vis the application for these amendments to the IATA act? Has the matter been discussed with the Canadian Transport Commission? Are they aware of it? Have they given their blessing?

Senator Macnaughton: I cannot say yes or no to that, but I do know that this is a special act of the Canadian Parliament, and that the association deals with commercial matters relating to international airlines. That was the original purpose in giving them the special charter.

If they were operating inside Canada only, there is no doubt that they would be subject to the Canadian Transport Commission. This is an association; it is a non-profit organization. It has obviously been cleared with all government authorities—not only those in this country but in the other countries of the various airlines. Thus, for example, they have to be very careful not to conflict with the Sherman anti-trust act in the United States, where they have been advocating that the charter and designated airlines should get together to settle this issue and agree on rates. This has the blessing of the CAB, the American aviation set-up.

The association will, in effect, fix rates—and not without reason, when one bears in mind the political and monetary conditions prevailing today, as well as the cost of fuel. I believe I am correct in saying that the cost of fuel has been increased on five different occasions over the last two years. These things make conditions very difficult for the airlines. The overall loss of the world airlines, I think I am correct in saying, will be approximately $300 million this year. It is essential, therefore, bearing in mind the present economic, political and energy situations, that there be some organization whose purpose it is to arrive at some agreement to ensure that not all of the world airlines go down the drain, or lose tremendous amounts of money.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps I should make it clear that I am not questioning the usefulness of the association. However, because we are dealing with a bill to amend an act of incorporation under the laws of Canada, I think I should ask whether the Canadian Transport Commission has been advised of, has commented on, has approved or objected to, this expansion of the membership of the IATA.

Canadians generally are concerned about the setting of rates where airlines get together for that purpose. I am not suggesting that this may not be the best way of handling the situation, but it is always a matter of concern to Canadians that the rates are set by agreement within an association. As I say, I am not objecting to that, but I am surprised that we do not have information as to whether this matter has been referred to the Canadian Transport Commission which, obviously, has a vital interest in this expansion of the membership of IATA.

I would ask the sponsor of the bill whether any scheduled airlines presently covered by this act of incorporation have ever been refused membership in IATA? Also, supplementary to that, if the membership is now thrown open to the charter and supplemental airlines, will the membership or any recognized charter or supplemental airline be automatic, or will it be subject to the decision of the present members of IATA?

Senator Macnaughton: In answer to your latter question, Senator Grosart, since this is an association, I should think the members of the association will decide the question of who should be admitted. The director general, Mr. Hammarskjöld, will appear as a witness before the committee, as will legal counsel for the association, and perhaps those gentlemen can give more precise answers to your questions.

To clear up one small point, Senator Grosart used the word "supplemental." I myself did not know what this referred to until I went into it. The word "supplemental" is an American adjective given to surplus aircraft. As a result of the Vietnam war they had a great many surplus aircraft which they used for transporting the troops back to the United States, and for various other purposes in the Pacific. They simply wanted to distinguish those aircraft from regular aircraft or military aircraft, so they called them "supplementals." I do not think there is any real distinction between a supplemental aircraft and a charter aircraft, which is a free-flying craft, except that there are a great many supplemental aircraft in the United States system.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that it is proposed that this bill be referred to a committee of the Senate, we will defer further questions until study of this bill by the committee.

Senator Walker: Perhaps Senator Macnaughton could tell us to what committee he would like this bill referred.

Senator Macnaughton: It has been suggested to me that it should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Macnaughton, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

ARMY BENEVOLENT FUND ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Alan A. Macnaughton moved the second reading of Bill C-17, to amend the Army Benevolent Fund Act.

He said: Honourable senators, before giving you a brief background of the proposed amendment to the Army Benevolent Fund Act, may I say that I am standing in for Senator McElman, who at the moment is snowbound.

When the Army Benevolent Fund Act was promulgated in 1947, provision was made for assistance only to those Canadian Army veterans who served during World War II. No provision was made to assist personnel still serving in the Canadian Army who did not have wartime service. In 1952, senior officers of the Canadian Army felt that there was a need for a fund to provide assistance to personnel serving in the postwar Canadian Army, and for this purpose the Canadian Army Welfare Fund was established.

Because the Army Benevolent Fund had considerable experience in providing financial assistance, and had an organization all across Canada, the board of directors of the Canadian Army Welfare Fund recommended that the Army Benevolent Fund be given the responsibility for management of the Canadian Army Welfare Fund. A joint cabinet submission was prepared by the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Veterans Affairs, requesting authority for the Army Benevolent Fund to manage the Canadian Army Welfare Fund on the understanding that all costs associated with this management would be borne by the Canadian Army Welfare Fund. On March 12, 1953, Lieutenant General Murchie, Chairman of the Army Benevolent Fund Board, was advised that the cabinet had approved, on February 6, 1953, the recommendation that the Army Benevolent Fund be authorized to administer the Canadian Army Welfare Fund.

So, for over twenty years the Army Benevolent Fund has been administering the Canadian Army Welfare Fund, and since 1971 the fund has administered the Canadian Forces Personnel Assistance Fund, a fund similar to the Canadian Army Welfare Fund and providing financial assistance to personnel in the Canadian forces today. In recent years the Auditor General has recommended that the Army Benevolent Fund should have statutory authority rather than just cabinet authority to manage these funds.

Honourable senators, the amendment under consideration today will provide statutory authority for the Army Benevolent Fund to continue to manage the Canadian Army Welfare Fund, and the Canadian Forces Personnel Assistance Fund, the administration of which they have been carrying out for over twenty years under cabinet authority.

I am prepared in due course to refer this bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science but I wonder if in the circumstances it really is necessary.

● (2040)

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I seem to be paired with Senator Macnaughton tonight.

An Hon. Senator: Why tonight?

Senator Grosart: We had dinner together earlier. As Senator Macnaughton has pointed out, this is a very simple bill. It merely transfers the administration of this important fund that goes back to World War I from administration by the cabinet to administration by a board which would be set up by order in council and the majority of which would obviously consist of veterans.

Senator Macnaughton has wondered whether it is necessary to send the bill to a committee. It did go to committee in the other place, the Committee on Veterans Affairs. Unfortunately, the printed proceedings of that committee are not yet available, so I am not in a position to know just what issues might have been raised. However, when the report of the committee was received in the House of Commons, the house leader there then moved that the bill, as reported by the committee, be concurred in and the House of Commons acceded to this and third reading was given to it immediately. I therefore assume that it is a completely non-controversial bill and, unless there are other views, we on this side would not feel it necessary to send it to committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

Senator Macnaughton moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, November 20, the debate on the motion of Senator Everett for second reading of Bill S-15, to amend the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce Act.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I congratulate Senator Everett on the introduction of the bill and the explanation he gave. I am sorry that for unavoidable reasons he is not with us this evening but I feel I should go ahead now so as not to hold up this bill any longer.

I might say that I found myself somewhat concerned about the bill and also about the explanation given by Senator Everett. As honourable senators will recall, the essence of this bill is to make it possible for certain members of the staff of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to have access to customs import invoices which are normally in the exclusive possession of the customs collectors who are required by the Customs Act to retain those invoices on file. The Customs Act itself is very specific in providing for complete secrecy of this very important information. Its section 172(3) reads:

In no case shall an invoice be shown or a copy thereof given to any person other than the importer, or an officer, except upon the order or subpoena of a court of justice.

Senator Everett explained that this very peremptory provision for privacy of this information was enlarged by an amendment to the Statistics Act which provided that certain officials of Statistics Canada would have access to this information. In this case there are many safeguards. It requires the consent of the importer or his agent, and it requires the taking of an oath that the information will not be disclosed, and so on. Unfortunately, we find that this extension of access to this information to Statistics Canada was then, by departmental arrangement—those were the exact words used by Senator Everett—extended to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I certainly have grave doubts about this kind of extension.

One wonders why these amendments were not put into the Customs Act. As you read the Customs Act, it is a very clear statement of the extreme privacy required. One would have to be aware that there was an extension of this in the Statistics Act. Now, when this bill passes, one would have to be aware that there is a further extension in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce Act. On top of that, one would have to know that it is possible, apparently, by some kind of interdepartmental arrangement among the officials, to extend this further.

If it can be extended by interdepartmental arrangements from Statistics Canada to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, surely it can be extended, by the same kind of an arrangement, from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to any other department, or perhaps to any other entity. It seems to me that this is the kind of extension of bureaucratic invasion of privacy that we in the Senate should be concerned about.

One wonders why the officials in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce require this special access. They made it very clear in the explanation given that they require detailed access. They want all the details. Senator Everett—speaking for the department, I presume—gave the reason. He said it is very important for the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to be able to make import analyses, to discover what we are importing, and then, presumably, to do something about it. Senator Everett placed great stress on the possible job of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce under what is generally known around the world—though he did not use the phrase—as import substitution. One can well understand that the developing nations should feel from time to time that it was necessary to substitute some domestic production or manufacture for an import. Amongst the major trading nations, however, those nations that do 70 to 80 per cent of all the world trade, this is recognized as a great danger.

In Canada we are always talking about that and saying we are on the side of the liberalization of trade. We cite the importance of export trade to us and say that, in international conferences, in GATT, in our dealings with the European Community, we insist that we are the country that stands for liberalization of trade. Yet over and over again one runs across this kind of thing, which is anything but conducive to the liberalization of trade.

Taking the bill and Senator Everett's explanation together, what this seems to mean is that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce now feels it has an obligation to conduct a kind of witch-hunt or a fine toothcomb examination of all imports coming into Canada and then ask could not some of these goods be made in Canada and, if so, should the government not do something about it. The logical sequence would be that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce would segregate some of these items, would find Canadian manufacturers and say, "Here is an opportunity for you to substitute a domestic product for this imported product." One can see that in due course, by the recommendation of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, this operation would become subsidized by one or other of the government agencies that are in a position to subsidize a new operation of this kind.

This sounds on the surface like an excellent thing, unless one remembers that trade is very much a two-way street. The ideal position for any country, particularly Canada, is a reasonable balance between imports and exports, because you simply do not, in the modern multilateral trade world, continue to exist if you insist that you are just going to export and not import. We have over the years been reasonably fortunate in maintaining at least a stabilized balance of international trade; sometimes we have had a commodity trade deficit, but it is invariably made up in invisible trade.

What concerns me most about this bill is that this kind of operation could become, and would appear to some to contemplate, the setting up of another non-tariff barrier, if the Canadian government were to scrutinize these imports and then consciously subsidize Canadian import substitution. One would have to think what we in Canada would feel if, for example, we were told tomorrow or read in tomorrow's papers that the United States Department of Commerce had decided to examine every single component they import from Canada and had decided that, on a broad plan, they would substitute domestic American production for these Canadian exports. I suggest that we would scream to high heaven if we were faced with that situation; and yet this is exactly what the countries which export to us now may feel they are being faced with with this legislation. For that reason I hope that some of these questions I have raised will be carefully examined in committee.

It would be unfair to say that I know that this is the intent of the legislation or that this is the intent of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. However, this is the way it will be taken around the world, and I am sorry to say that Canada has, or is beginning to get, a reputation for non-liberalization of international trade. We have some examples, as honourable senators well know, in some meat imports and exports, and in one case massive retaliation from the United States to an action on our part—a situation which could easily obtain once again if the changes that are suggested in this bill have certain effects. We should ask in committee just what the exact intentions are. On surface it may be quite simple. They may merely say that they want more analysis of imports in depth, that they want it for statistical purposes. But I think they would have some difficulty in substantiating that position, because Statistics Canada already has that power under an amendment to the Statistics Canada Act. And, as Senator Everett told us, there is a complaint about access, the spin-off access of the officials of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Their problem is that the terms of their access are too broad. They want to be more specific. They want to get down and examine, it would appear, every single import, and we have to realize that this does not mean finished goods, either fully or partly processed goods, but would mean components of manufacturing. If we look to a possible set of retaliations from other countries, we would have to remember that the most important area in which we are attempting to expand our exports is precisely in the field of high technology in which Canada has already built up an important segment of its export trade in supplying components to what would become fully manufactured goods in other countries.

I therefore say that this bill needs to be looked at most carefully. I hope in committee the officials will be asked to explain exactly how far they intend to go. I hope they will be asked if they see any danger of the provisions of this bill developing into further non-tariff barriers. The OECD has already described some 800 non-tariff barriers; the general consensus of those who are negotiating around the world for the liberalization of world trade at the present time is that the non-tariff barriers are a much greater problem than the traditional tariff barriers.

I hope that in committee the officials will also be asked if there is some intention of spinning off this extended access to somebody else. It was done in the case of Statistics Canada. Are they going to do it to somebody else? Are they going to give another department this access by the extraordinary procedure of departmental officials getting together and saying, "Well, you come in under the Statistics Act. ITC officials have absolutely no authority whatsoever at the moment, but come on in. We will swear you in and pretend you do." And that is exactly the situation. Who else is going to come in? What consideration has been given to the importance of the privacy of the import business or the export business, or any other kind of business?

It is true that one of the provisions of the bill is that this information can be given out, even to the officials of ITC, only upon the written consent of the importer. That is an important safeguard so long as the importer is fully aware of where the information may go. The Customs Act stresses the essential principle of privacy and the privileged position of this information. It is provided to the government only for customs purposes—in the original instance. But it is now proliferating. How far will this proliferation go? Is the principle of privacy endangered? I do not know, but it certainly looks like it from the history of the proliferation of the two acts I have referred to.

Honourable senators, in saying that, I would add that it may be that Senator Everett, when he returns, will find it possible to give us some further information along these lines. I hope that he will, because we are, after all, being asked on second reading to pass the bill in principle, and at the moment I am not too clear what the principle is. I hope that Senator Everett in due course, as he can do so well, will enlighten us on that point.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT

VISIT OF CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARIANS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. George van Roggen rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the visit of Canadian Parliamentarians to the European Parliament from 12th to 14th November, 1974.

He said: Honourable senators, before proceeding immediately to the details of the visit of the Canadian Parliamentary Group to the European Parliament two weeks ago, perhaps I might take a little time to review the background that led up to this first formal visit of the Interparliamentary Group with the European Parliament.

On March 16, 1972, the Senate authorized the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs to examine and report upon Canadian relations with the expanded European Community. Shortly after that, I believe it was in October 1972, a summit meeting of the heads of state of the European Community resulted in a communiqué which stated that Canada along with the United States and Japan should be identified as a country with which the Community, and I quote:

—is determined... to maintain a constructive dialogue.

The report of the Senate committee subsequently published went on to say on that point:

Yet given the complexities of the Community's decision-making process, it is difficult to know where or how to approach this dialogue in order to present the Canadian viewpoint more effectively.

Following that mandate from the Senate, and in keeping with the spirit of the communiqué from the heads of state of the Community, the Senate committee under the able chairmanship of Senator Aird, assisted by Senator Grosart as deputy chairman, proceeded to hear witnesses in Canada. In March 1973, when I had the privilege of becoming a member of the committee, we made a one-week visit to Brussels to study the structure and functioning of the European Community and to inquire as to the best methods of establishing a meaningful dialogue between the Community and Canada.

The subsequent report which honourable senators are familiar with, published in July 1973, advocated that several steps be taken and specifically made three main recommendations. The first was that we should establish a permanent parliamentary link between the Canadian Parliament and the European Parliament.

European parliamentarians, or at least those we had met with in Brussels informally since no such permanent link then existed, responded to an invitation extended to them by Senator Aird and by the chairman of the External Affairs Committee in the other place, and some 16 in all came to Canada in November 1973. They had an interesting exchange with a joint parliamentary delegation consisting of the members of our two committees here in Ottawa. This, too, was completely informal. However, as a result of that meeting in November 1973, the European parliamentarians obtained the sanction of the European Parliament to formalize these exchanges. As a result, our visit to Strasbourg from November 12 to November 15 this year was the first formal exchange between the two parliaments.

As they are now formalized, these exchanges are carried on under the aegis of the speakers of the House of Commons and the Senate as opposed to the chairmen of the committees. So, honourable senators, the first recommendation of the committee report of July 1973 has been accomplished. A permanent exchange will now take place between the European parliamentarians and a joint group from the Canadian Parliament, alternating each year between Europe and Canada.

The second principal recommendation of Senator Aird's report was that the European Community establish an external office in Canada. Honourable senators are aware that many nations maintain separate ambassadors in Brussels, an ambassador to the Common Market as opposed to an ambassador to Belgium. Canada now has two ambassadors in Brussels, one to Belgium and Luxembourg, the other accredited to the Common Market. The Common Market, on the other hand, have not responded to this by establishing offices—they cannot establish embassies, not being a sovereign state—in the individual countries which maintain embassies in Brussels. They have established an office, which they term an external office, in Washington, in addition to one in Tokyo. It was their opinion when we first went to Brussels that the office in Washington was sufficient for the purposes of their representation in North America. We pressed on them at that time that one of the problems we hoped to cure by opening broader communications between Canada and the European Community was that of their identifying Canada in some cases as an adjunct to the United States. We pressed on them that it was important that they establish an office in Ottawa in addition to that in Washington.

Our pleas in this connection were resisted by the European Commission, by the Council of Ministers, but we did receive support for our pleas in this connection from our parliamentary confreres in Europe. They have been most assiduous in pressing this matter since we raised it. We raised it again at the time of their visit to Ottawa, and the Prime Minister once again raised it on his recent visit. We were delighted during our visit to Strasbourg that the day before we were introduced as guests to their Parliament, the Council of Ministers, the most powerful body there, approved a budget for the opening of such an office, which will be opened in Ottawa in January or, at least, at the very beginning of the new year. This office, at the embassy level, will be the third of this nature in the world opened by the European Community. The second principal recommendation of Senator Aird's report has therefore been accomplished.

The third principal recommendation of that report was that the Prime Minister of Canada should visit, not just the individual states comprising the European Community but the Community itself. This he did, as honourable senators are aware, in October of this year. The third principal recommendation of the report was thereby accomplished.

These I would submit, honourable senators, are substantial achievements, particularly emanating, as they did, from a parliamentary inquiry launched by a committee of this Senate and later embraced by parliamentarians from the other place associating themselves with it. This initiative is in my opinion the more remarkable because it was wholly an initiative of the parliamentary groups concerned and not of government.

I come now to our most recent visit, being the first formal visit of a Canadian joint parliamentary group to their confreres in the European Parliament, which took place, as I have mentioned, between November 12 and 15 in Strasbourg, the seat of the European Parliament.

I shall not take up the time of the house by going with great detail into the makeup of the European Parliament, other than to remind honourable senators that it is made up of appointees of the parliaments of the nine member countries. All members of the European Parliament are themselves elected to their own parliaments. They are, indeed, all parliamentarians.

Senator Walker: May I ask the honourable senator who is the head of our delegation?

Senator van Roggen: I was about to mention the makeup of our delegation. It is the next item in my notes. The European Parliament consists at the moment of approximately 200 members appointed by the parliaments of the Nine. It has admittedly no great power under the Treaty of Rome. It is a political instrument which the proponents of the Common Market see as slowly taking upon itself more power as the years go by, so that the political development of the market can proceed parallel with the economic development, in order that the market—as is the intention under the Treaty of Rome—will indeed become a political as well as an economic entity.

Our delegation consisted of eight members from the House of Commons, representing all parties, under the chairmanship of Madam Morin. The three members of the delegation from the Senate were Senators Grosart, Bourget and myself. Madam Morin and I were co-chairmen of the Canadian delegation. I should point out that because of the unfortunate death of her mother, Madam Morin had to return to Canada on the day we arrived in Strasbourg. Her place as co-chairman was taken by Mr. John Roberts of the House of Commons, who, I might say, did an excellent job on very short notice.

I should interject that we spent two days in Strasbourg, but our trip took longer in that we went to Brussels for meetings with members of the Commission, and with our ambassador and others. I shall refer to that visit in a few moments.

On another occasion it might be the better procedure for us to go to Brussels first, and then proceed to the meetings of the European Parliament, as the briefings which we received in Brussels would have been helpful to us had we received them before our meetings with the parliamentarians.

I shall now deal briefly with the makeup of the European group. There were 16 in all, of which eight were in Brussels during the first meeting some 18 months ago. Of those 16, 10 were in Ottawa last fall, and those same faces were present across the table during our meeting two weeks ago. By contrast, on our side, Senator Grosart and I were the only members of our delegation who had attended all three meetings. Madam Morin was the only member from the House of Commons who had been at even one of the previous meetings. It is the firm view of both co-chairmen of our delegation and, I believe, of all members of the delegation, that we must develop more continuity and permanence in our delegation if we are to be effective in these exchanges in subsequent years.

Senator Macnaughton: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator van Roggen: Certainly.

Senator Macnaughton: Just to complete the record, who were the other members of that delegation?

Senator van Roggen: In addition to Madam Morin and Mr. Roberts, the members from the House of Commons were Mr. Côté, Mr. Fleming, Mr. Coates, Mr. Baldwin, Mr. Paproski and Mr. Gilbert. Senators Bourget, Grosart and myself represented the Senate.

The delegation we sent on this occasion was structured not more than 10 days or two weeks before departure and had limited briefing compared to that given to what can only be described as a permanent delegation representing the European Parliament. The Canadian delegation was largely made up of people who had not been at previous meetings, and were therefore strangers insofar as the European delegation was concerned. I suggest that it would be quite impossible for Canada to host a delegation from the European Parliament next year with the same hospitality that was extended to us on our visit, unless we know in advance the personnel of the Canadian delegation and have time to properly brief ourselves and make preparations. Madam Morin, Mr. Roberts and I have agreed that in that connection we will immediately make strenuous representations to the powers that be.

A point raised by the European delegation was that in the future they would hold these meetings in a city other than that in which the Parliament of the host country meets. This would avoid the problem that arises when members of the host delegation are required to attend to parliamentary duties of one sort or another in their own Parliament. We feel that that suggestion has merit insofar as the forthcoming visit to Canada is concerned, and that we might well have better attendance and more concentrated business sessions if the meeting is held outside Ottawa. This would not mean that our visitors would not come to Ottawa during their trip. Part of the exchange, certainly, should involve their having meetings and meaningful discussions with Canadian ministers and senior governmental officials while in Canada, and this can only be accomplished by a visit to Ottawa.

I might also mention that our European confreres in this particular group comprise the same group of parliamentarians who make up the European-United States Inter-parliamentary group. So, they have consistency in their group insofar as their contacts with the Parliaments of both the United States and Canada are concerned. The chairman of the European delegation, Mr. Cousté, was eloquent in expressing the view to us that they should like to visit Canada at a different time from that of their visit to Washington, thus making it perfectly clear to Canadians that they were not simply tagging Canada on to a visit to Washington. However, that may prove to be impractical in that, according to their terms of reference, the same group is to visit both countries, and they may have budgetary difficulties in making two separate trips. In any event, they certainly have a degree of permanence and expertise in relation to the subject matter under discussion, which we must try to match. But we cannot do so on an ad hoc basis. In saying that I do not suggest that our group needs to be frozen and concrete, but certainly there must be a substantial number, preferably a majority, who have attended previous meetings, and who can provide some continuity.

Let me now turn more specifically to the meetings in Brussels. We had frank exchanges with our European confrères on a range of subjects—trade, defence, foreign investment, and a number of subjects that came to the minds of individual delegates. At the end of our almost two days of meetings a communiqué was issued.

Before dealing with the communiqué, let me interject that, being in France, we were overwhelmed by their hospitality and their food, which might have been difficult enough for the constitutions of some of us had it been confined to dinner, but they gave us the same sort of treatment at lunch, as Senator Bourget will recall. I hope that by their hospitality they did not succeed in putting us at a disadvantage for our work sessions in the afternoon. Some of us were strong-minded enough to refuse a second glass of wine.

Senator Greene: Did you have pâté de foie gras?

Senator van Roggen: I might have sampled the pâté de foie gras had I not before leaving read an article describing all too vividly the rather unpleasant procedure for force feeding the geese to produce it. Therefore, I did not have it.

I shall not take up your time, honourable senators, by reading the communiqué in detail. The major part of our discussions involved the nuances of what Canadians were really seeking in the way of a trade agreement with Europe, because, as they pointed out and as we agreed, we were not seeking, and could not seek, a preferential trade agreement. In that connection, I should like to take up two or three minutes of your time by reading from page 14 of the report dated July 1973 of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs on Canadian Relations with the European Community:

A Preferential or Non-Preferential Agreement?

In considering what type of agreement Canada might seek, the Committee has concluded that it would be unwise to seek a preferential agreement with the Community. In fact, the Committee was advised in Brussels that Canada would not be successful if it sought one. As several witnesses pointed out, the intent of the Community is to make Europe a cohesive unit. The whole thrust is European, a concept which they feel would be negated by granting further special relationships around the world. (They make an anomalous exception of former colonies). Moreover, the Community has shown itself unwilling to allow efficient Canadian agriculture to jeopardize the Community's high cost heavily subsidized agricultural structure, which has for them an important political and social connotation. Finally the Community would be unlikely to upset its relations with the United States by offering a preferential relationship to Canada.

It would also be unwise of Canada to seek such an arrangement, in view of the importance of its export trade with the United States. The Committee agrees with the realistic assessment of Mr. Forrest Rogers, Financial Adviser to the Bank of Nova Scotia, who stressed "the high proportion of our trade and business relations which is with the United States." When asked if Canada should seek a preferential arrangement with the EC, he replied that he just did not see how we can expect the United States to sit calmly by while we attempt to establish anything in the nature of a significant special relationship with Europe.

Mr. A. F. W. Plumptre, Canadian representative on the High Level OECD trade talks in 1972, brought out clearly that a preferred arrangement with the Community would discriminate against the United States, Japan and other important trading partners with whom Canada had in total an export trade in 1971 of $15.2 billion. By contrast, Canadian exports in the same year to the nine Community countries amounted to about $2.5 billion. Mr. Rogers and Mr. Plumptre both observed that projected growth rates for Europe in the next decade were not as high as those for the United States or Japan. Further, the United States buys 85 per cent of all Canada's fully manufactured exports.

That is, as opposed to Europe, where our percentage of exports of manufactured goods is much lower. The report continues:

Mr. Plumptre concluded:

What I am obviously emphasizing here is the degree of exports which we put at risk if we discriminate against the United States.

There was a suggestion by one Canadian witness that Canada might go beyond seeking a preferential relationship with the EC and try to gain some sort of associate relationship which would resemble the free trade area the Community has recently formed with Austria, Sweden, Iceland, Portugal, Norway and Switzerland. Apart from the same objection which can be made to a preferential trading arrangement, such an option is not open to Canada because such Community arrangements are accessible under the terms of the Rome Treaty only to European states.

Senator Walker: Would the honourable senator allow me to ask a question in that regard? Are there any other preferential agreements with countries outside of Europe?

Senator van Roggen: They do have a number of preferential agreements with former colonies. There are some exceptions to that. They have preferential agreements with India, for instance, with respect to native handicrafts, I understand. There are some isolated agreements of that nature. They started out by having preferential trade agreements particularly with African countries. Some examples they gave us were that 80 or 90 per cent of the exports of some countries, where there was a preferential arrangement, were in one commodity. Those countries would have been completely destroyed if those arrangements were not preserved for them. Generally speaking, these agreements are not with the highly industrialized countries of the world because the Europeans do not wish to get outside of the GATT.

If we are not looking for a preferential trade agreement, what is the nature of the trade agreement we are seeking? Again I cite the report of the Foreign Affairs Committee, page 15:

A Comprehensive Economic Cooperation Agreement.

Instead of pursuing a policy of seeking a Canada-Community agreement on a limited trade basis, the Canadian Government has recently sought to negotiate a comprehensive agreement covering broader areas of economic co-operation. In the continuing talks concerning such an agreement, the long-term prospects for trade in energy and resource materials, including the processing of nuclear fuels, are being discussed. Also included are potential non-tariff barriers such as government procurement policies, countervailing duties, coastal shipping regulations, export subsidies and concessional financing. Additional items in the discussions have been consumer protection, copyright laws, protection of the environment, standards and quality control and the industrial application of science and technology.

Given the movement toward economic integration among the Nine, it is appropriate to seek to establish a framework for cooperation on a Community-wide basis. Many of these subjects are outside the jurisdiction of the GATT, but could become important ways of furthering mutual interests. Such an agreement would complement the GATT, not substitute for it.

Honourable senators, following two further meetings with our European confreres since this report was first published, I can only say that I could not improve upon the words of the report written 18 months ago in connection with that particular subject.

Following our meeting with the parliamentarians and the press conference which followed, we proceeded to Brussels where, in the morning, we received a most competent briefing from the Canadian Ambassador to the European Community, Mr. Langley. We also received briefings from Community officials. Then we had an excellent luncheon, our host being Sir Christopher Soames, the senior British member of the Commission and Vice-President of the Market. In the afternoon we had discussions with senior civil servants of the Commission on the 24(6) trade negotiations, and on energy matters generally. I shall come back to one or two of those matters later.

Throughout these discussions with the parliamentarians, and at Brussels, we were asked on more than one occasion what Canada's attitude was to the European Community and, in particular, to the entry of Great Britain into the Community. Two or three of us in responding to such questions said, I believe accurately, that we did not think the Canadian government had an official position on this, and that it was probably not an appropriate area for the Canadian government to have an official position on. But, speaking personally and, we felt, on behalf of most Canadians, we thoroughly supported England's entry into the Community; we enthusiastically prayed for her remaining in the Community. I went so far as to say that I felt it was an essential step in the preservation of western civilization that the Community succeed, and that Britain stay in.

We made it clear that we were expressing our personal views in that respect. There were few, in our group at least, who disagreed with the sentiments we expressed.

You might then come back with the same question we asked of our European friends: Will Britain stay in? The answer we received might well be coloured by the fact that the men we were speaking to were all dedicated to the European Community and its success, but all of them were convinced that Great Britain would stay in the European Community. They felt that the arrangements among the Nine, particularly the economic arrangements, are in a constant state of flux; that they are being negotiated and renegotiated month by month and year by year; and that a point will come at which Mr. Wilson will be able to say, "If those arrangements had been negotiated in the first place, I would have approved Britain's entry at that time." On the basis of that, at a given moment in time, he will be able to recommend to the British people that they vote affirmatively on the referendum.

Certainly, all the British delegates we spoke to, both at the Parliament and at Brussels, as well as other Europeans, assessed the matter in that fashion, being convinced in their own minds that Britain would stay in. They did point out, however, that because of the uncertainty of Britain's entry, the Market would be marking time to some extent during the next year until that referendum is concluded.

On the question of how the Community is developing in political terms, as opposed to economic terms, I would just observe that it is easy to conceive of the Community as simply a large free-trade area, but that was not the original conception of it. There are those who say, because of the difficult times the Community has been through in the last 12 or 18 months, that is precisely what it is going to degenerate into, but, certainly, none of the people working in Strasbourg or Brussels are willing to accept that. They point out that there is a vast difference between a simple free-trade area and the Common Market envisaged by the Treaty of Rome, and that, eventually, more political union must come, hand in hand with the economic co-operation which has already been so successful. They do not visualize it happening immediately. They suggest it will come in rather slow stages, but they are dedicated to its success. I am sure we all wish them well in this magnificent human experiment, the complexity of which boggles the mind. Certainly, it would have been difficult for any of us to have imagined 25 years ago the successes which they have already had.

At the moment there is one major cloud on the horizon in this connection, and that is the world economic situation. The outpouring of money for oil from all parts of the industrialized world is extremely serious. In the case of Europe it amounts to $20 billion per year. Their favourable balance of trade, before the increase in oil prices, was only $2 billion a year. So the gap is immense. The strains this puts on the Community will be severe, and they will probably be lucky if they can do no more than mark time on the political side of their development until this world economic situation clarifies itself to some extent.

They are, however, determined that they must not try to find solutions to this world problem by looking inward; that trade barriers must be kept down; that the Tokyo Round, the GATT negotiations, must go forward. They are anxious for the United States Congress to pass a trade bill so that the United States can become a full participant in those negotiations. They feel that, if we are to survive the economic problems of the next few years, all of us will be better served if trade doors can be kept open, and trade walls kept down. In the case of the Europeans, this may be a matter of life and death.

Senator Walker: Before you get to the luncheon, may I ask a question? I may have missed a point when he was summarizing, but has the honourable senator set out what Canada has accomplished, or what concessions have been made to Canada, through our four-year association with the European Economic Community? What concessions has Canada received over the four-year period during which we have been connected with the Community?

Senator van Roggen: I do not know what the honourable senator is referring to with respect to "the four-year period," since this study was initiated by the Senate committee only two years ago, and it made its report only 17 months ago. I have described in detail three of the recommendations in the report as methods of starting a dialogue with Europe, all of which have now been accomplished.

I think you will find that specific areas of discussion will now flow from both the establishment of their office here and the acceptance by the Council of Ministers in Europe of the proposition put forward by the Prime Minister during his visit to Brussels, that areas of mutual interest now be discussed between the Community and Canada. It is a slow process of opening the door. The door is now open, and discussions can now start.

Senator Walker: So far there have been no concessions from the European Community to Canada—no agreement, no treaty, no accord? I am not criticizing the honourable senator; I am just asking him a question.

Senator van Roggen: That is right. I should qualify that by saying that Canada has a number of agreements with individual members of the Community on a number of subjects that I read from the report. The objective is to get some of these out of individual agreements with the countries in question, and into a master agreement with the Community as a whole.

Senator Bourget: With the objective, I assume, of achieving a better understanding of our mutual interests.

Senator van Roggen: I do not think there is any question that the main thing that has been accomplished in the last 18 months, as a result of these contacts that have been established—parliamentary and otherwise—is this: there was a tendency that we detected very clearly on the part of our European hosts, at our first meeting in Brussels—although I do not think they would acknowledge that this was the case—to think first of the United States, and then, almost as an afterthought, of Canada, being part of the North American continent. They seemed to think that if they made an arrangement with the United States, that covered the whole of North America. When we went back this time we found that that very clearly has been overcome. They now go out of their way to say how they understand the distinct differences that exist, in so many areas, between the problems of the United States and Canada.

Apart from his duties as host in connection with the social aspects of the visit, Sir Christopher is in charge of the external affairs of the Community, including all of their trade negotiations and arrangements. He expressed himself very forcefully during lunch, to both myself, who was sitting on his right, and Mr. Roberts, who was sitting on his left, in putting forward his side of the case on the negotiations with Canada, known as the 24(6) negotiations. These are so called because of the section in the Treaty of Rome of that number, which stipulates that on the Community expanding, and other countries coming into the Community, and those countries having to adopt a tariff common to the whole Community, the Community as a whole must then bargain with those that are injured as a result, and pay them what the entry of the new member has cost them.

On the entry of Great Britain into the Common Market, at the same time as Ireland and Denmark, the British preference was eliminated, and this resulted in costs to Canada, which were estimated, and agreed to by our side of the negotiating team, at some $600 million. The arrangement is not that a cash payment is made, but that there are concessional advantages from the other side to balance the scale. This becomes very complicated, because as they reduce a given tariff item they reduce it, of course, to all the world, and not just to Canada. So when they are conducting these negotiations to compensate people for the elimination of the British preferential tariff, in this particular case they are trying to find points at which they can reduce their tariffs and compensate Canada in one respect, Australia in another, the United States in yet another, and so on. These are very difficult negotiations.

They have signed with the other principal countries, including in particular the United States and Australia, though not with Canada.

I think here there is evidence of a mistake which gives credence to our view that prior to our visits there they did look upon North America too much as a unit. I think, for example, they made a deal with the United States, and gave certain concessions in citrus fruits, on the agricultural side, and thought, "That will be good for Canada too." Well, it turns out that we are not satisfied with the proposal. We are not prepared to accept the arrangement they made with the United States. Sir Christopher was very forceful in putting forward his case that we were being extremely unreasonable in this connection—so much so that I was concerned enough to make sure that I was fully briefed on my return to Canada by the senior member of our negotiating team, who, I might say, has again gone this week to Geneva in this connection. He convinced me that the Canadian team is not being unreasonable, and is looking after our interests very well.

There is a time limit here, and there are certain complexities with which I will not bore you, but I think the Community in future will be a little more careful to negotiate with Canada directly on a matter of this sort, rather than assume we will go along with an arrangement they were able to make with the United States.

Other than this, our discussions with Sir Christopher during lunch were largely on general questions of world economy—oil, balance of payments, and dollar problems generally. I think that I would rather leave these matters for another occasion, because they comprise a much larger subject.

The only remaining item I might touch on for just one or two minutes—and I realize I have gone on for much longer than I anticipated—is that of energy. The Europeans, of course, apart from the problem they have with the outflow of money—$20 billion a year, as I mentioned, for oil—are very concerned as to the alternatives. They are also very realistic, living as they do in a number of crowded countries with a reasonably high standard of living, few raw materials and little energy. They have to make careful, pragmatic decisions, and they recognize the fact that they are not going to be able to eliminate the importation of oil. I think I am correct in saying that the estimate of their senior man on this subject was that they hoped to reduce their reliance on oil and gas from 65 per cent of their total energy requirements to 40 per cent in the next ten years. They will be doing this by massive development of nuclear plants. They acknowledge environmental difficulties in so far as these plants are concerned. They visualize that once they are able to establish sites, and get them approved by the nations concerned from an environmental point of view, then rather than placing just one plant on those sites, they may have to place several. They are, however, going heavily into nuclear development.

You might ask, "Which process are they going to use?" As you are aware, Great Britain has opted for something similar to the CANDU, which we have developed in Canada, and there will be a technical exchange there. Other countries in Europe have opted for the American process involving enriched uranium. They try to make it very clear, however, that they do not look upon it as a simple choice between buying process A or process B. They say that the development of nuclear energy is still sufficiently in its infancy that they can pursue a variety of alternatives, so that as they go down the years they will be able to see which is the best for their purposes. I believe there is an area of opportunity here for Canada, which controls some 25 per cent of the world's uranium. This will be the fuel for these plants until fusion plants are eventually produced, but that will be some decades, if not some generations, away.

The North Sea oil and gas are important to them, but in world terms, while it is a very large field, it is not really a solution to their problem, in addition to which they are not yet so unified that Norway and Britain are prepared to say that this oil and gas are available for the common pot.

The point I should like to make in closing, honourable senators, is that I feel that the initiative taken by our committee under the chairmanship of Senator Aird has achieved greater than average success up to this point with the accomplishment of the three main objectives I outlined at the beginning of my remarks, and that we must now proceed to new initiatives in our exchanges with the European parliamentarians. Obviously this can now go hand in hand with the negotiations to take place between Canadian governmental officials and the market officials toward an eventual trade agreement between Canada and the Community.

I do not think I have anything further to report at this time, honourable senators. Thank you for your patience.

Senator Greene: I should like to ask the honourable senator whether there is any authority existing in the Community for a joint community energy decision or whether each member pursues its own individual policy.

Senator van Roggen: Each member of the Community pursues its own individual policy. But the commission in Brussels, apart from its political role in being required to initiate proposals and legislation within the Community, which is one of its functions, is also the senior civil service body of the Community and has substantial departments covering all areas, including energy, but it is advisory only. It does not have power to impose its decisions on the Community members.

[Translation]

Senator Riel: Honourable senators, I have a question concerning those particular agreements between the European Community and countries outside the community; but I understand those agreements took place between the Community and some countries that may have been former colonies. Were these agreements reached at the beginning, when the Rome Treaty came into force, or were they reached progressively over the years, as some of those foreign colonies may have become independent? Do you know what the position of the Community was in that respect, and whether the agreement was a joint one?

[English]

Senator van Roggen: In answer to your question, first of all may I say that the agreements were not all entered into at the one time at the formation of the Community, but over a period of years as the colonies gained their independence or as the Community decided to make an exception of one underdeveloped area or another.

In answer to the second part of your question, they are specifically group agreements, in that they are agreements between the Community and the other contracting parties.

[Translation]

Senator Riel: Do you think that the European Community is larger today than, let us say, at the time of General de Gaulle's death?

[English]

Senator van Roggen: If I understand your question correctly, it is as to whether the Community is further advanced today than it was at the time of General de Gaulle. I imagine, honourable senators, it is common knowledge that General de Gaulle, not only in matters concerning the Community but in other areas as well, was somewhat of an individualist. He was not always pushing the development of the Community or other things that he considered might detract from the grandeur of France. I think the present president of France, President Giscard d'Estaing, has made it very clear that France is re-dedicating itself to the Community and the Community concept. I think the best evidence I can give of this great advance is the forceful statement which he made a short time ago to the effect that the Community should press forward with its work toward universal suffrage for the election of the members of the European Parliament. Coming from the President of France, that is a most significant move within the Community, because if they go forward, as they are planning and hoping to do within the next few years, to a method of direct election of members to the Parliament, that in itself will dignify and sanctify that Parliament to a very great degree insofar as its powers are concerned, and will move the political process forward, I suggest, even more than the monetary union would have done that they were talking about before.

On motion of Senator Choquette, for Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

EMPLOYER-EMPLOYEE RELATIONS IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Alexander has been substituted for that of Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton) on the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, December 3, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before the question is put, I should like as usual to give a brief outline of the work program for the next week. It appears that it will be a busy one. First of all, dealing with the committee schedule, on Tuesday the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will meet, and the Senate Committee on Agriculture will meet to hear a delegation of farmers from Nova Scotia.

On Wednesday the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will consider Bill S-15, to amend the Industry, Trade and Commerce Act. It will then continue with its study of competition in Canada. Also on Wednesday the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture will hear witnesses and continue its examination of Bill S-10, to amend the Feeds Act.

On Thursday the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance will start consideration of the supplementary estimates (B), which were tabled in the Senate this week. Our Committee on Foreign Affairs will continue its study of Canadian relations with the United States. Both the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments and the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will sit on Thursday.

With respect to new legislation, I am informed that early next week we should receive from the other place Bill C-14, to incorporate the Federal Business Development Bank, Bill C-15, respecting oil and gas in Indian lands, and Bill C-18, to amend the Fire Losses Replacement Account Act. Later in the week we could have amendments to the Customs Tariff and to the Excise Tax Act.

As honourable senators are aware, on Thursday next the Senate will proceed with second reading of Bill S-19, to amend the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Criminal Code.

While I am on my feet, may I draw attention to the valuable work done by our committees this week. There were many meetings and the workload was heavy, and I think the Senate can expect to be kept busy next week, particularly in our various committees. This heavy schedule results from the fact that a record is being set as to the number of bills originating in the Senate. This explains why our committees have been so busy during the past weeks and will continue to be so during next week.

Senator Flynn: May I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government, when he refers to two or three bills which he anticipates that we will receive from the other place next week, whether it is wishful thinking on his part or whether he has some good reason for expecting these three bills?

Senator Langlois: I should remind my honourable friend of what I have been saying in all the years that I have occupied my present position in the Senate, and that is that I am very reluctant to try to prophesy what will happen in the other place. The program I have outlined is based on information given to me, and it is simply that we expect to be receiving these three bills. This, of course, is subject to the speed with which the other place deals with the legislation before it, and I cannot in any way confirm this prediction. I hope I am right and I shall stand by it to that extent, but I shall not go any further than that. I am sorry.

Senator Flynn: I wish you well.

Motion agreed to.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST BY MANITOBA INDIAN BANDS TO APPEAR BEFORE SENATE COMMITTEE—QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, is the Leader of the Government aware that a conference of Manitoba Indian Band leaders has urged that the Senate conduct an investigation into the problems of native people? Is it the intention of the Leader of the Government to invite these leaders of Manitoba Indian Bands to appear before the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science to explain precisely what it is they would like us to do? Does he plan to have someone launch a debate on the subject? Or, has he already made a decision in the matter and, if so, might we know what it is?

Senator Perrault: Together with other honourable senators, I have noted news accounts of an expressed desire by the leaders of certain Indian bands in Manitoba to appear before a Senate committee. To my knowledge, however, no official request for a hearing has been received. Should such a request be received, I think it will be given sympathetic attention by all in the Senate. I hope that our colleagues from Manitoba in this place will provide counsel on that occasion.

NARCOTIC DRUGS

STUDY OF LEGISLATION BY SENATE COMMITTEE—QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, may I ask another question of the Leader of the Government? I heard on the news this morning that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs would be charged with studying Bill S-19, which Senator Langlois referred to earlier, which deals with marihuana and other "soft" drugs, their use, possession and sale. It was reported that the committee plans a prolonged and in-depth study which might take months. In fact, it was said that one Jack Webster, a West Coast broadcaster, has already been invited to appear before the committee.

Would the government leader know who has been speaking for the Senate in this matter? No committee that I know of has yet been seized with the subject. Therefore, how could anyone have been invited to appear?

Senator Goldenberg: May I answer that, honourable senators?

Senator Choquette: Yes, you are the chairman of the committee.

Senator Flynn: Yes, you are entitled to reply.

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I heard that news item and it rather surprised me. When I made inquiries I was told that a member of the other place spoke to the news media, on television or radio last night, to that effect. As far as I know, no senator made a statement, nor did I as chairman of the committee.

Senator Perrault: May I say, in an attempt to further clarify the situation, that no such statement has been given to the press by the Leader of the Government in this place and, to the best of my knowledge, no other senators have spoken this way with the press in regard to the subject. I will say, however, that it is the intention of the government that a measure of such importance to this country should be given full and conscientious study by the Senate and certainly, I understand, by those in the other place. There is no intention on the part of the government to expedite with inordinate haste the process of dealing with this legislation. It is my view—and one shared by other members of the Senate—that a measure of this importance should see the widest possible opportunity given to interested groups to appear before the appropriate Senate committee. But that is a decision for the committee to make in the ultimate. We are in the process at the present time of determining the most appropriate committee in which this matter should be discussed.

Senator Flynn: Who is "we"?

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Perrault: Members on both sides of this chamber; and I would hope, honourable senators—and more specifically the Leader of the Opposition—that we can discuss this matter. I am sure the Leader of the Opposition agrees that this is an important piece of legislation and that we have a great responsibility to Canada to do the best possible job with it.

So I hope we can discuss this matter between now and next Thursday, and make certain that it is disposed of in the most appropriate fashion. I apologize to honourable senators for the state of my voice.

Senator Flynn: I was going to say to the Leader of the Government that he is even more convincing when using that subdued tone—not that I do not hope that he will recover his usually strong voice.

VISIT OF CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARIANS—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator van Roggen calling the attention of the Senate to the visit of Canadian Parliamentarians to the European Parliament from 12th to 14th November, 1974.—(Honourable Senator Grosart).

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, may I, with leave, yield to Senator Grattan O'Leary?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Thank you, Senator Grosart. Honourable senators, I had not intended to speak on this matter at all until I heard the excellent speech delivered yesterday by Senator van Roggen. Listening to him, I felt that certain things should be said to this house, and cannot be said too often in this house nor too often in this country.

They stem from the fact that there seems to be a great misunderstanding in this country, in the press and in the media, about what the Common Market is about. Many people seem to think that the Common Market was established to promote world free trade. That, of course, is absolutely inaccurate. Those of us who have read the Treaty of Rome know that the Common Market was set up as a regional protectionist organization—a protectionist organization in Europe set up to act as a countervailing force against the United States. It is not a free trade organization. It has free trade among its members, just as the United States has free trade among its states. But it is essentially a protectionist organization, and when I find our people going over there and giving the impression to the country—or, at least, the country seems to get this impression—that they are going there to make some special arrangement with the Common Market—my friend shakes his head. I am not talking about him; I am talking about the country, the press.

Senator Bourget: The press—not our delegation, nor the government.

Senator O'Leary: I am speaking about the impression found throughout the country that we are going over to the European Community to try to find out if we can make some special arrangement with them, and thus to diminish what is called our dependence upon the United States. Well, what is our dependence on the United States? I am sure there are many countries in the world that wish they occupied the dependence on the United States that we have.

I do not think our people realize, as some in Washington do not realize, that the United States today is taking 85 per cent of our finished products; in other words, products which create jobs in Canada. How does that compare with the countries of the Common Market? Well, in the last three or four years the Common Market countries took less than 2 per cent. The United States today is buying more of our finished products than all Common Market countries combined, with Britain, Russia and China added.

I hear people these days talking about this new détente, as they call it, with Russia, and Canada's future with respect to China, and so forth. Well, honourable senators, Russia and China only buy from us what they are compelled to buy in order to avoid famine in their countries. That is the by and large of it. Can any sane person in this country today think or believe that in the foreseeable future the impoverished millions of China are going to buy more of our finished products than the relatively prosperous two hundred million in the United States? I think Canadians ought to keep these things in mind.

I dislike hearing and reading about the necessity of Canada diminishing its dependence on the United States. I am sure there are many countries that wish to God they were in our position of dependence on the United States.

We hear a great deal these days about Japan. Japan only buys from us the raw materials which it needs to process finished products, which they then export to Canada to compete with those of our own industries. Surely, Canadians should keep these things in mind when considering diminishing our dependence on the United States.

A few years ago I attended a meeting in Canada of a delegation from the European Parliament. They distributed their working papers, which I read, and in those papers they stressed again and again that, after all, they in Europe have more in common with us than do the people in the United States. That is nonsense. Most of us are the children of European immigrants, but basically, and inescapably, we are North Americans. For weal or for woe, our future, our fate, our destiny, is with the United States, and I think we had better keep that in mind.

I am not afraid of a Canadian parliamentary delegation going to Europe composed of people such as Senators van Roggen, Grosart, and my good friend across the way, Senator Bourget. Nevertheless, there have been attempts to make special arrangements of some kind with the Common Market, and I venture to say—

Senator Bourget: No.

Senator O'Leary: You say that is not so. That is what Senator van Roggen said yesterday.

Senator Bourget: He did not say that.

Senator O'Leary: I beg your pardon, but I read his speech carefully this morning. What is more, I was glad to see that the financial adviser of the Bank of Nova Scotia made it clear that any special arrangements with the Common Market can only be made with member nations of Europe. Some people know so little about the Market that they think we should even have membership in it. Well, we cannot have membership in it. If you read the Rome Treaty you would know that as far as concessions which the Common Market makes outside the union are concerned, such concessions can only be made to member nations of Europe.

Senator Bourget: Right.

Senator O'Leary: I know it is right. I am speaking now not so much to this house, but to the people of this country. I am trying to tell them to find out, for heaven's sake, what the Common Market is about. If you read the Rome Treaty you will see that it was originally conceived as an organization for political union in Europe. That was the original idea, but it has not worked out. Even if we could do so, we could not afford to go and make any special arrangements with the European Common Market, knowing what the United States means to us in the way of buying our products. I myself often wonder just what the position of Canada would be if the United States were to disappear tomorrow. Where would we sell 85 per cent of our exports—our finished exports, not our raw materials, not our oil, not anything else, but our finished manufactured products—85 per cent of which are sold in the United States? It is a market right at our doors. Surely we should not be crossing continents and oceans to even insinuate to people that we are trying to get away from our dependence on the United States.

We are dependent on the United States, not only for our markets, not only for the jobs that the sales of our finished products bring to Canada, but for our defence, and any Canadian who does not understand that is certainly reading wrongly what really exists in the world today. They are our defence. No nation in the world today is independent. Every nation on earth is dependent on some other nation or some other group of nations for its very existence. But this is more particularly true of us than almost any nation in the world. If there are people in this country complaining about our dependence on the United States, I wonder if they would like to go to Czechoslovakia and ask that country if she would mind being in our position? Ask Hungary. Ask Poland. Ask the Baltic States.

In this Senate we should never miss an opportunity of stressing to our people the wonderful position we occupy with respect to the United States. For 20 years these people have had the power to wipe us out of existence any night they chose. Do any of us go to bed and worry about it? Do any of us feel that if ever bombs are dropped on this country they will be dropped by the United States?

I know we hear about détente. Kosygin and Brezhnev have said fine words about détente. What were they doing in the Mediterranean? What were they doing piling military hardware into Syria and Egypt? What do they have in mind there?

Surely in considering trade with the world we must seek trade wherever we can find it, but we must keep in mind that the real foundation of our prosperity in this country is the markets we have in the United States. We could not sell, now or in the foreseeable future, the 85 per cent of our finished products that we send to the United States.

It is true that we, too, are their best customers. Two or three years ago, when the United States included us in the surcharges they were imposing, I went on my own to Washington. There are some senators who know that I have some very good friends in powerful positions in the Congress of the United States. I went to them and showed them a statement made the night before by President Nixon, in which he spoke of Japan as being their best customer. That is an impression that might be held by millions of Americans. But Japan does not buy a fraction of what we buy from the United States, or what they buy from us.

I feel deeply about this. From what I have heard and what I read in the press, as part of my business, there seems to be a feeling in this country that, just as in the old days we were twisting the tail of the British lion, we are now plucking the feathers of the American eagle. There are people in this country who, unfortunately, are still fighting the battle of Lundy's Lane, the battle of the heights. This is bad for this country. I think, before it is too late, we ought to let our American neighbours know that we are not shying away from any trade problems we have with them. None of us should want that to happen, and it is not going to happen.

When our people go to Europe to see the Common Market countries or other countries, when they go to Russia or China, they should make it clear to those countries, and to the world, that we are not there to supplicate for help in solving problems with the Americans. That is not true, and if you say: "Oh well, O'Leary wants Canada to be a satellite of the United States," I will say, "God forbid, nothing could be further from my thoughts."

As I mentioned a moment ago, I do happen to know some very important people in the Congress of the United States, and I have talked to them about these matters. I have never yet met one important American senator or member of the House of Representatives who had any idea of lording it over us economically or politically.

A few years ago, I had the privilege of speaking to a group of American senators and members of the House of Representatives. In that group there were two men who had been candidates for the presidency of the United States. I told them then that though we were North Americans, though we wished to march with them in the ways of peace, they had better make up their minds and realize that we had problems of our own which we intended to face and solve by ourselves and among ourselves in the indispensable way of a sovereign society. And I added, "My friends, don't you ever forget that there is a little part of North America, which, from earth to sky, we are determined to call our very own." Did they object to that? Not in tribute to me but in complete acceptance of what I said, those gentlemen rose in a body and gave me a standing ovation. That is the spirit I find in Washington. Alas, I fear that, with fault on both sides, our relations with the United States today are not what they should be. I fear it.

I read the comments in the press, and I read the statements of our politicians. I have read statements by the leader of the government of this country, who went to Moscow two or three years ago and said we wanted better trade relations with Russia, and with other lands, to diminish our dependence on the United States. I do not think he should have said it there, or said it at all. I do not think we are going to diminish it, but if we keep on crossing continents and oceans, going here and there, hither and thither, to see where we can get trade, and if we go with the idea that this will help to relieve us of our responsibilities with the United States, then we are in a bad way. We are talking dangerously. As a matter of fact, if that belief exists, and if there is an attempt by any member of this Parliament to bring about what is called the diminution of our dependence on the United States, I say that that sort of talk, with the peril it entails, is treason to Canada itself.

I repeat, we are North Americans, our destiny is on this continent. For weal or for woe, our fate is linked with the United States. It may be weal, it may be woe. Please God, it will be weal; I hope it will be. So let us discourage this other idea.

We have magazines in this country. I know something about them, as I was chairman of the Royal Commission on Publications. In all those hearings I discouraged anyone coming before me and trying to rest his case on anti-Americanism. One of our magazines died recently, and I must say its death has not diminished my spiritual life. It deserved to die. It had died when B. K. Sandwell died many years ago. It was looking for a crutch, a nationalist anti-American crutch, to maintain its life. I do not believe in giving any Canadian magazine a crutch—an anti-American or nationalist crutch. They must stand on excellence, or they must fall. I repeat that.

I certainly thought that there was unfair competition at the time, and I think there still is, from certain magazines calling themselves Canadian when they are not, but I could not convince the government I supported then, and I could not convince the government which succeeded it. I remember the spectacle of a very able member of this house, Senator Hayden, trying to argue that what they were doing was the right thing when it was absolutely the wrong thing. What they did was to confer honorary Canadian citizenship on Mr. Luce so that he could continue to practice what he had been practising in this country. I am against that. But I am equally against providing a sanctuary for mediocrity. We are not going to build up this country by any system, or any set of laws, which enables poor magazines to be produced in Canada. That is something I would never agree to.

I repeat, I have complete trust in members like Senator Grosart, Senator van Roggen and Senator Bourget. I know they do not want to sell Canada down the river. I know they are not antagonistic to the United States. I think I know that they understand what the Common Market is about. But, alas, our people don't understand it. Not long ago a professor at Toronto University wrote a letter saying, "Look, why don't we join the Common Market?" Can you imagine ignorance of that kind? Yet I meet people all the time who say, "What is all this trouble with the Common Market? Why don't we join them? Why don't we let the United States go to the devil? Why should we depend on them?" This is dangerous heresy. I believe that the future of this country is tied inextricably with that of the United States. I do not think anyone would challenge that. That does not mean that we are a satellite, or that we must always do what they say. On the contrary, we must stand on our own so far as we can within the world as it exists today.

But, as I have said before, no nation can stand alone, and we are fortunate that we are where we are. I am sure that all the nations of Europe, including the Baltic states and all the nations that have understood and seen what Russian domination means, understand how happy and how wonderfully fortunate we are to be where we are. We must go on as far as we can, but we must not endanger our relations with the United States. I am afraid that at the present time there are too many things being said and written that do endanger that relationship. If I were an American I would object to some of the things I read in the press of Canada about the United States.

I read all the newspapers. I have spent my life reading newspapers. I cannot recall a single instance of an attack on Canada in any reputable newspaper in the United States, but I am quite often ashamed to read the petty attacks on the United States and the insinuations that I find in the press of Canada.

Honourable senators, I hope I have not kept you too long, but I thought I should say what I have said, and I hope to say it often again.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, it is my intention to adjourn the debate, but in view of the excellent and interesting remarks we have heard from Senator O'Leary, perhaps I might be permitted for a few minutes to reassure him on some of the matters that are causing him concern.

I would like to say, first of all, that I agree with him entirely when he suggests that any interpretation of any special arrangement we might have with the European Communities that is predicated on this concept of diversification of our trade away from the United States is erroneous and, as he says, harmful and dangerous. As a matter of fact, when the then Secretary of State for External Affairs was before our Senate committee, I asked him a specific question along those lines. I asked him, presuming that the present level of our exports to the United States was about 70 per cent, whether he anticipated, within any reasonably foreseeable future, a diminution of that percentage. The minister said no.

As Senator O'Leary has indicated, diversification is a kind of red herring that has been drawn across the path of these discussions. Senator O'Leary is aware, or perhaps he will be glad to have me remind him of it, that the European Community has special relationships with at least 70 countries, not all of which are European countries. Far from it. It has special relationships with all the former African colonies of France, and now has them with the former colonies of the United Kingdom since its entry into the Community. It also has a special relationship with the United States.

I am sure that everything Senator O'Leary has said about what should be the proper Canadian attitude to this matter would be applicable to the American attitude; nevertheless, the Americans have in fact negotiated a special relationship in respect to access to the market of the European Community.

I am sure he would agree that if the Americans have found it important—perhaps necessary—to negotiate such a special arrangement, it makes sense for Canada to do so also; not on the grounds of planned diversification of our trade away from the United States, which has been announced as government policy, and with which I do not agree, but on much more important grounds, that is, with respect to our trading relationships with the Community in the future.

I am sure that Senator O'Leary would agree also that it is of absolute importance that we increase our access to the market of the European Community, particularly, as he mentioned, in the special field of finished goods. At the present time, taking our exports to the Community, not more than 10 per cent consist of finished goods. This contrasts, as Senator O'Leary has pointed out so significantly, with the very different position in relation to our exports of finished goods to the United States, which he suggests amount to 85 per cent. I have some doubts as to whether it is that high, but I know the figure he is referring to, namely, that perhaps about 85 per cent of our total exports of finished products do go to the United States.

When we use the word "special" in connection with the discussions we are having with our European friends concerning our relationships with them, we are referring to a very wide spectrum in those relationships. One of the most important of the current irritants, or current unresolved problems, is the compensation Canada is entitled to under GATT as a consequence of British entry. GATT is an international agreement, article 24.6 of which provides that where a country has already a preferential arrangement under—

Senator Bélisle: May I ask a question of the honourable senator? Is he making a speech, or is this a preamble to the question he is going to ask, or is he adjourning the debate? I do not think it is fair to Senator O'Leary for the honourable senator to make a speech.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps I should, then, in deference to the question asked by my good friend with whom I have just had lunch—

An Hon. Senator: Who paid for it?

Senator Grosart:—point out that I said on starting that it was my intention to ask leave to adjourn the debate, but that first of all I would make some preliminary remarks. These remarks are part of the speech that I intend to make, but I suggest that it is not beyond the scope of our rules that I be permitted to begin a speech, and to conclude it on another day. I also said that I felt, in this particular circumstance, that I had a duty to reassure Senator O'Leary on some of the matters he has raised. That is what I am now attempting to do. I am making a speech. If the Senate allows me to do so, I may adjourn it and ask permission to conclude it at a later date. The Senate, of course, can refuse, and probably would be wise to do so.

I have said that there is an unresolved problem under article 24.6 of GATT, and this was the main subject of our specific discussions with our opposite numbers in the European Parliament, with representatives of the Commission, and with some members of the Council of Ministers.

The situation is approximately this. We are entitled to compensation from the Community for the loss of preferences in the British market, and the dollar amounts are very substantial. At the moment the European Community has made a "final offer", and if that offer is not accepted by Canada (as it has not been thus far, because we regard it as completely inadequate) the possible result, under the GATT rules, can be retaliation by Canada, which would, of course, lead in turn to retaliation by the Community. It would, in other words, be the start of a trade war. This is one of the things that we sought to avoid, and I am quite sure that one of the results of our visit to Europe will be significantly to reduce the possibility of that kind of trade conflict starting between Canada and the European Community, possibly sparking an international trade war.

Senator O'Leary has generally lumped all kinds of arrangements that can be made between trading partners in the world today under this one general term, "special arrangement". Of course, some special arrangements are more special than others. In the Community there are non-Community members who are actually associate states. The Community has some special arrangements with countries behind the Iron Curtain. It has special arrangements with some 70 countries of the world at the moment. As Canadians, all we should really be seeking in this market is a higher degree of access to it, since it is the largest import market in the world, and much larger than the American market. It seems to me that it is not necessary, as Senator O'Leary has so well pointed out, to put this on the basis of diversification, but rather that we should put it on the basis of access. One of the matters that will be paramount in any negotiations is the very matter that he mentioned as being so important, that is, the increasing of our exports to the European Community of finished goods from the present very low level of 10 per cent. It is these kinds of things that are the subject of negotiations leading to, if you like, a special relationship. As Senator van Roggen pointed out, we have already achieved a significant step forward in this matter of a special relationship, in the undertaking by the Community to open in Canada what they call a "délégation," a Community office here at the ambassadorial level, so that Canada will now be in the big league of special relationships with the European Community, which has established exactly the same kind of office or délégation in Washington and Tokyo. Canada is now number three. This is the kind of special relationship which, I am sure, Senator O'Leary would be the first to applaud.

Again, I agree with him entirely on the diversification issue, which I think is utter nonsense. As some honourable senators will remember, going back a good many years now, under a former administration there was the same talk of diversification. The suggestions made in those days failed, and it is my view now that any suggestion of a deliberately planned diversification of our trade with the United States will be equally unsuccessful. I hope that that statement will give the reassurance sought by my friend and former seat-mate, Senator O'Leary, and that my explanation will satisfy my colleague, Senator Bélisle, as to my purpose in rising at this time.

And now, honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I would move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, October 22, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Croll, calling the attention of the Senate to the anatomy of a special Senate committee report, and in particular to

- (a) its evaluation,
- (b) its beneficial results, and
- (c) as a follow-up, to a suggested future course of action for the Senate.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators, when Senator Croll placed his inquiry on the Order Paper several weeks ago to the effect that he would call the attention of the Senate to the anatomy of a special Senate committee report, I hardly knew what to make of it or what to expect. But after listening to Senator Croll, and having read the report on the implementation of the recommendations in the report of the Special Committee on Aging, I should like to commend him for bringing to our attention the research done respecting the implementation of those recommendations. I should also like to declare my strong support for his suggestion that some means be found of carrying out similar research with respect to recommendations in other Senate committee reports, and reports commissioned by the federal government.

The question of whether this should be done by a special committee of the Senate, a subcommittee of one of the Senate standing committees or by research staff of the Senate whose report, in turn, might be studied by a Senate committee is, in my opinion, a matter for further consideration. In any case, I think it would be a very well worthwhile exercise because every inquiry conducted by a Senate committee creates a greater public awareness of the importance of the problem or issue being studied by that committee. A follow-up inquiry would not only keep that awareness alive, or rekindle it in the public mind, but it would also focus attention on the implications and ramifications of the recommendations and on the impact of those recommendations that have been fully or partially implemented, and the reasons why other recommendations were not or could not be fully implemented.

The more informed the public becomes on the problems we face, the goals we are trying to achieve and the obstacles that must be overcome in order to achieve them, the better will our democracy work. A committee engaged in this kind of inquiry can, in my opinion, perform a great public service for Canada.

Both Houses of Parliament and the general public owe a great debt of gratitude to Senator Croll for developing this idea, and for his persistence in getting the necessary research carried out. As can be seen from his speech at page 146 of Senate Hansard of October 22, it was not easy.

There were no funds available to hire the qualified staff necessary to do this kind of work. Fortunately, the parliamentary librarian, Mr. Spicer, came to his assistance, and assigned one of the library research staff to this work. Unfortunately, I gather from Senator Croll's remarks, there were no funds available to permit this researcher to travel around Canada and see at first-hand the results of those recommendations that had been implemented, and to discuss in depth with the appropriate authorities the problems encountered and the reasons why some recommendations had been only partially implemented while others were not implemented at all. Despite these limitations, the report resulting from the research carried out is an excellent one, and reflects great credit on the researcher, and indicates the high qualifications and abilities of our library staff.

Senator Croll's speech brings up the need for highly trained, highly qualified research personnel on our own Senate staff in addition to those who might be already employed by Senate committees. The other place makes provision for research staff on a party basis, but as far as I know we have no comparable staff for senators. I do not know how other senators make out, but I find it necessary to do most of my own research, and I find it to be a very painstaking and time-consuming task.

I would not think of trying to make use of the research staff available to party members in the other place or to the party caucuses because I know they cannot meet the demands being made on them now. Besides, I believe the Senate should have its own research staff, and here I should make it clear that I am talking about specialized researchers to carry out in-depth studies on projects that may require research for, perhaps, periods of months and which might involve travelling from one province to another. I am not referring to what I would call reference-research, in which the sources are checked and xerox copies of pages of reference material are made; I am speaking of in-depth study. Such researchers could still be attached to the parliamentary library, but they would give priority to the requirements of senators.

Like Senator Croll, the only research assistance I have been able to obtain has come from the parliamentary library, and I should like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to their never-failing co-operation, and to the high quality of their work.

Until I read the findings of the researcher who investigated the results of the report of the Special Senate Committee on Aging, I had no idea whatsoever of the wide impact that that report had had throughout the length and breadth of Canada. I knew in a general way that the committee had recommended a guaranteed income maintenance program for people aged 65 and over, but that was about all. When the federal government implemented this recommendation, it was regarded as a tremendous leap forward. We all thought of it as a milestone in the development of our social security program. My whole attention however, had been focussed on what the federal government had done following the report. I knew next to nothing about what had been done by the provincial governments and municipalities. I had forgotten the impact that the Senate report had had on nursing homes, home care, health care, recreation and housing for elderly people, most, if not all, of which comes under provincial jurisdiction.

The researcher found that of the 92 recommendations contained in the Senate report, 25 had been fully implemented and 54 partially implemented, of which a fair number had been almost completely implemented and others had been implemented in spirit, if not in the actual letter. Thirteen recommendations had not been implemented.

In some cases the reason for partial implementation or non-implementation was because the programs advocated or envisaged in the recommendations were already in existence and being carried out, but the underlying philosophy of the province or federal authority responsible for the programs was such that the programs had been organized to include all age groups, rather than being geared specifically to the age group of between 45 and 60.

In other cases constitutional difficulties arose which prevented direct contact between federal and municipal authorities, because the necessary authority lay with the provincial government rather than with the municipality to which the recommendation was directed. Some of the Senate recommendations listed as partially implemented, such as sheltered workshops, crafts, et cetera, are now being carried out under the Heritage and New Horizons Programs. Thus some recommendations are being implemented, but perhaps in a different way from that envisaged by the committee.

The same is true with respect to educational and recreational programs. I was happy to learn recently that in my own province a number of elderly people in their late sixties, seventies, and even eighties are taking credit courses at Memorial University at St. John's. These people are attending regular classes along with the other students, and doing extremely well.

Other recommendations, such as the provision of ancillary services, community services, neighbourhood information centres, and a change in housing philosophy whereby elderly people remain as an integral part of their community instead of being segregated and shunted off into special developments all by themselves, are all being implemented in different ways but in varying degrees by the ten provinces. The report, however, indicates that more progress in this direction, and in extending these services to rural areas, is being made in the western provinces than in the rest of Canada.

However, in spite of this there were many recommendations at which a sober, second look, as advocated by Senator Croll, might be beneficial. For example, research indicates that very little has been done about recommendation 33, which is that the provincial health departments establish special branches to concern themselves with the health problems of older people, and that there be a continuing liaison between such branches and the corresponding branches in the federal Department of National Health and Welfare. This recommendation has been generally disregarded, although the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and New Brunswick have made some moves in this direction.

In my opinion it is also regrettable that with respect to recommendation 36—that data related to the aged which is provided by provincial hospitalization and health insurance schemes be more fully analyzed and made more readily available—the only action so far has been by Statistics Canada, but on a coordinating basis only without any analysis or interpretation.

Until I read the research report I was not aware to what extent the Senate report has influenced for the better the prevailing attitudes concerning the employment of older workers, their training and even rehabilitation. Perhaps most important of all was the change in the approach to this problem whereby the emphasis was shifted from age to skills. As a result, five provinces—British Columbia, Newfoundland, Ontario, Alberta and New Brunswick—have enacted legislation that provides that no employer shall refuse to employ, refuse to continue in employment, or otherwise discriminate in employment because of age. The Ontario law also requires that trade unions shall not exclude from membership, expel or suspend a person in the age group of 40 to 65 years. These provisions, however, do not apply to the operation of bona fide retirement or insurance plans. Unfortunately, the Canadian Labour Code requires only that employers must not discriminate on the basis of race, national origin, colour or religion. It makes no mention of discrimination on the basis of age.

This is the type of question on which the committee proposed by Senator Croll could focus attention, find out the reasons for this omission and, hopefully get some action. It could also find out why there is no federal policy with respect to pre-retirement programs of counselling and planning for retirement, and why little or nothing is being done in the private sector, although there are at least four federal government departments active in this field—the Departments of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Public Works, Statistics Canada and Supply and Services.

The Department of Indian Affairs sponsors retirement programs, not only at headquarters, but also at the district level. This department collaborates with universities in Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia to provide their employees with programs on retirement.

Two very important recommendations that have not been implemented are No. 89, that consideration be given to the establishment of a national council on social research with specific provision for research in gerontology, and No. 92, that the government establish a national commission on aging for the purpose of giving leadership in all matters concerned with a fuller life for older people in Canada. Recommendation 92 goes on to list a large number of functions which the national commission might perform.

It is difficult to understand why no action has been taken on these two recommendations, particularly No. 89, as a national council on social research had been recommended many times in the past by such national organizations as the Social Science Research Council of Canada and the Commonwealth Institute of Social Research. Many of our most pressing problems today are social problems. Problems of housing, crime, drugs, and social behaviour are all social problems and are all interrelated. They are calling out for attention, and a Senate committee inquiry into the implementation of this recommendation would at least create public awareness about them, and pave the way for remedial action.

As one studies the report on the implementation of the recommendations of the Special Senate Committee on Aging, one cannot help but wish that similar studies were available on the implementation of recommendations of other Senate committees.

For example, the recommendations of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty in Canada come to mind immediately. One thing that committee did was to create an awareness in the public mind of the terrible problem of poverty. As Senator Croll told us in his address, there has been a tremendous demand for this report, Poverty in Canada—20,000 copies were sold; thousands more were xeroxed. It would not be surprising if it turned out to be the most widely read of all Senate reports. It has been studied in universities and schools, by churches and individual congregations, and by all manner of groups and organizations.

A number of the recommendations have already produced results. For example, recommendations with respect to economic policies, social services, health care and manpower have been partially implemented. Full employment or, at least, maximum employment, has become the main factor in government fiscal and monetary policy. The recent budget makes it clear that when faced with two alternatives, the government will choose inflation rather than mass unemployment. Federal grants for legal aid have enabled the provinces to extend this service and make it more easily available. Society as a whole is more conscious of those below the poverty line, and much more thought and consideration is given by other segments of society as to how their programs will affect the poor.

Best of all, the poor themselves are becoming organized. Neighbourhood committees have been set up to deal with local problems. A national anti-poverty organization has come into existence, and by this and other means the poor are seeking to make their own input into the solutions of their problem.

The main recommendation of a guaranteed minimum annual income for everyone has not yet been realized, but it is going to come. The government at first rejected it out of hand on the ground that it was too costly. They estimated it would cost an extra $4 billion, and at that time the Senate committee estimated the total cost at around $1 billion over and above the total expenditure, which was then approximately $6 billion. Today we are spending a total of around $12 billion on social income maintenance programs, and we still have all the evils of the old system. The impact of that recommendation is such that there is a growing consensus in the public mind about it, and the government too is now making references to the guaranteed annual income as a goal towards which they are striving. At any rate, it is no longer considered an impossibility, and Cabinet ministers are now also talking openly about the necessity for a more equitable distribution of wealth, as indicated in the Poverty report.

Honourable senators, this is only a very superficial appraisal from the standpoint of federal action. Only a thorough study by qualified researchers can tell the whole story, particularly the provincial and municipal parts of the story, and where follow-up is necessary. The same, of course, would apply to other Senate committee reports. For these reasons, I think Senator Croll's suggestion of a sober, second look is a good one, and I am happy to give it my support.

On motion of Senator Fergusson, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, December 3 at 8 p.m.

THE LATE HON. THOMAS J. KICKHAM

TRIBUTES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, as I am sure you are all aware, the Senate suffered a great personal loss over the weekend in the passing on Sunday of one of our colleagues, Senator Thomas Kickham, in Prince Edward Island.

Senator Kickham made a great contribution to his community. He was active in the import and export trade, in credit union activities, in the field of agriculture, and throughout his career he endorsed, supported and worked tirelessly for a wide range of good public causes. In the course of his career in public life he was a member, for a time, of the Prince Edward Island Legislature. He also served in the other place and was summoned to the Senate on July 8, 1966. Until the illness which led to his passing over the weekend he was very faithful in his attendance here and he will be greatly missed.

To Mrs. Kickham and to his family, I know I speak on behalf of all honourable senators when I offer them our deepest condolences.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government was quite right in saying that we on this side were equally grieved to learn of the death, last Sunday, of Senator Tom Kickham.

Senator Kickham was one of those solid Islanders of whom one can justly say he was a fine and honourable gentleman. He was a mild, retiring man who never spoke harshly of others and kept an open mind on every subject. Senator Kickham had enviable careers in politics and business, as was mentioned by the Leader of the Government. He sat in the Prince Edward Island Legislature from 1943 to 1949, and in the House of Commons from 1949 to 1957. By profession he was a farmer, but that did not prevent him from being active in banking and in the import-export trade.

His career is proof of the fact that men of quality will always be recognized. A quieter, humbler, more self-effacing man I had never met. It is quite obvious from looking at his career that the people of Prince Edward Island recognized his wisdom and ability and were well satisfied with the representation he gave them both in Charlottetown and in Ottawa. Politics should have more people like Senator Kickham.

To his Liberal colleagues, and to his wife and family, we, of the Opposition, extend our most heartfelt condolences.

Hon. F. Elsie Inman: Honourable senators, it is with a feeling of great sadness that we are called upon to mourn the passing of a highly respected colleague and member of this chamber, the Honourable Thomas J. Kickham. Senator Kickham's death is a distinct loss to Prince Edward Island, especially King's County, whose interest and welfare were so dear to his heart. Senator Kickham was born at Souris West, a member of a prominent Prince Edward Island family, his father and grandfather both having been members of our legislature.

In his early life, Senator Kickham conducted an export business at Rollo Bay, near his home, until he inherited his father's farm, where he engaged in farming. The Kickham homestead has always been the epitome of hospitality, and both the senator and his wife wore a smile and extended the hand of friendship to all who came to visit them there.

I knew Senator Kickham for many years and found him always a true and sincere friend. He could not be otherwise, for he was fair, generous minded and big hearted. He loved people and was loved by people. He was a popular and highly esteemed personality of whom his province can be justly proud.

I wish to join with honourable senators in extending deepest sympathy to Mrs. Kickham and her family in their great bereavement.

Hon. James Duggan: Honourable senators, I wish to associate myself with the previous speakers in paying respect to our colleague and my close friend, Senator Kickham. We were very close friends, our friendship beginning on the very day of our initiation as members of this chamber, and it continued and grew from that date onward. I had the opportunity to know Thomas Kickham intimately, having lived with him for a number of years, sharing the same apartment with him. I found him to be a real no-nonsense, down-to-earth type of person.

I wish to join with all my colleagues in extending my profound sympathy to Mrs. Kickham and her family.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, if I may I would like at this point to raise a question concerning the business of the house. Last week we received a notice that the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration would meet this afternoon at 4 o'clock. This afternoon we received a further notice indicating that the committee would meet when the Senate rose tonight. I must say that some of us were here ready to attend the meeting this afternoon. However, the fact that we have—and this was not foreseen—a large amount of business to attend to tonight does not suggest—

Senator Molson: What business?

Senator Flynn: Though all the items may not be of interest to Senator Molson, there is a lot of business to deal with tonight. The fact that the committee will have to commence its sitting at 9.30 or 10 o'clock does not suit most members. I would suggest that the chairman give notice that the committee will sit at a more appropriate time. Thursday morning has been mentioned and I think that would be more convenient for most members of the committee.

Senator Laird: Honourable senators, naturally I am in the hands of the committee. I am wondering how long this sitting of the house will last. If it will not take too long, I think we should at least meet for a few minutes. However, if honourable senators decide that they do not wish the committee to sit tonight, that is fine with me.

Senator Flynn: At least two members from our side will be speaking tonight. If an equal number of members from the government side speak, it will probably take quite some time.

Senator Langlois: We always match you. I should perhaps explain that this afternoon's sitting was cancelled because of the cancellation of flights out of Montreal and Quebec City. That was the only reason. When I was consulted this morning by the officials of the Senate about changing the sitting of this committee, I agreed to the sitting of the committee tonight, not knowing that we were going to have as heavy a schedule as we now anticipate. I have no objection to following the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition, that we postpone the meeting of the committee until Thursday morning if there is no time for the committee to sit this evening.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I wonder if that could be made a little clearer. Senator Langlois indicated that the committee would sit on Thursday if there was no time for it to sit this evening. I am a member of the committee and I find it difficult to attend a meeting tonight because of other arrangements. I think the situation should be clarified, that either we meet on Thursday or tonight.

Senator Laird: A number of committees are meeting early Thursday morning. Might I suggest that our committee meet at either 10.30 or 11 a.m.?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Laird: Is it then agreed that I should decide as between 10.30 and 11 a.m.?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

ALBERTA-BRITISH COLUMBIA BOUNDARY BILL, 1974

COMMONS AMENDMENT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill S-13, respecting the Boundary between the Provinces of Alberta and British Columbia, and acquainting the Senate that they have passed this bill with one amendment, to which they desire the concurrence of the Senate:

Page 4: Strike out line 8 and substitute the following therefor:

"to the Commission under section 5, and to offer to hold at least one public hearing on the reference before establishing any boundary line for that part of the boundary that the problem or dispute is related to."

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this amendment be taken into consideration?

Senator Carter: Honourable senators, I move that this amendment be now concurred in.

Senator Molson: What is the hurry?

Senator Flynn: Explain.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Molson: Is there unanimous consent?

Senator Grosart: Explain.

Senator Flynn: Senator Molson has asked whether there is unanimous consent. I do not know if it is required; I have not checked that, but as he is Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders he should know.

Senator Molson: I think at least we have to know what we are consenting to. Personally, I have not a clue. Perhaps I am alone, but I think we should know what is going on.

Senator Flynn: What is the purpose of the amendment?

Senator Carter: We are asked to concur in an amendment made to this bill by the other place. I am told that the rules do not require leave to move concurrence now.

Senator Langlois: What is the amendment?

Senator Carter: The Clerk Assistant has just read it. All the amendment does is provide that the commission should offer to hold at least one public hearing with respect to any problem or dispute.

The Hon. the Speaker: Under rule 46(i) no notice is required of this motion.

Senator Flynn: Is that the only explanation Senator Carter wishes to give?

Senator Carter: This is the only explanation I have. I have the amendment before me. The Clerk Assistant has read the amendment, and that is all it says. It adds these words:

—to offer to hold at least one public hearing on the reference before establishing any boundary line for that part of the boundary that the problem or dispute is related to.

It is a very simple amendment.

Senator Flynn: At what stage of the proceedings? I heard the amendment, but I would like to know the context.

Senator Laird: It is a simple amendment.

Senator Flynn: I know it is a simple amendment.

Senator Walker: Like your bill, Senator Laird.

Senator Grosart: You made that mistake before.

Senator Walker: I do not think Senator Carter should be embarrassed. I am sure he would not mind waiting until tomorrow.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Flynn: No, certainly not. I have to understand the amendment.

Senator Croll: Adjourn the debate.

Senator Flynn: I move that the debate be adjourned. I will read the bill in the meantime, and if Senator Carter wishes to speak tomorrow I will give him the opportunity; if not, I will explain the amendment for him.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

Joint Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Forsey: Perhaps I may explain, honourable senators. It is merely a matter of these infernal translators and legal experts getting at odds about the precise wording of French texts. There is no change in principle involved at all. I hope that this is positively the last appearance of this document. I am getting sick of coming back here as a sort of messenger boy to the translators. I do not want to speak disrespectfully of them, but I really am getting tired of it and I think that the next time they get in a hassle over this sort of thing, I am going to say, "Look, send a wire to the French Academy and get them to settle the thing and be done with it." This is really a nuisance. I think it is perhaps in part the obstreperousness of certain officials in the other place who have set themselves up as incarnations of the French Academy in North America.

Senator Forsey moved that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

EMERGENCY SITTINGS

AUTHORITY TO CONVENE SENATE DURING ADJOURNMENTS

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h), moved:

That for the duration of the present session of Parliament, should an emergency arise during any adjournment of the Senate, which would in the opinion of the Honourable the Speaker warrant that the Senate meet prior to the time set forth in the motion for such adjournment, the Honourable the Speaker be authorized to notify honourable senators at their addresses registered with the Clerk of the Senate, to meet at a time earlier than that set out for such adjournment, and non-receipt by any one or more honourable senators of such call shall not have any effect upon the sufficiency and validity thereof.

The Hon. the Speaker: The house has heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Senator Flynn: I should like Senator Langlois to put on record the reason for this motion.

[Senator Forsey.]

Senator Langlois: The reason for this motion is quite obvious from the very wording of the motion itself, honourable senators. It is a routine motion which is usually moved at this stage in any session in order that, during any prolonged adjournment, if any emergency arises the Honourable Madam Speaker is authorized to send notice to honourable senators of any change in the proposed adjournment thus recalling the Senate earlier than proposed in the adjournment. As I have said, it is merely a routine motion which is usually presented at this stage of a session, but the reason why leave is required is that the motion is a substantive motion within the meaning of rule 45(1)(h), not by reason of its substance as such but because it is one which is not related to anything presently before the house.

Senator Asselin: Dispense!

Senator Langlois: It has nothing to do with the substance of the motion itself.

Senator Asselin: Dispense!

Senator Perrault: You asked for it. Now you are going to get it.

Senator Langlois: It has nothing to do with the substance of the motion itself. But the fact is we have this rule and we have to live by it.

Senator Flynn: I did not want to offend Senator Langlois by asking him to explain. I merely wanted him to put on record the reasons for the presentation of this motion now. I think we all know that it is usually presented at the beginning of a session; but this time it was forgotten and I wanted him, first, to acknowledge that the government side had forgotten to present the motion at the beginning of the session, and, second, to admit that, despite the fact that the motion authorizes the Speaker to recall the Senate at an earlier date, in fact the Senate is usually recalled at the request of the Leader of the Government and not the Speaker. Quite often it has happened that this has been done without consultation with this side of the house. I hope that if Madam Speaker uses this power she will not only consult the Leader of the Government—or, to put it mildly, acquiesce to the wishes of the Leader of the Government—but will consult with this side of the house.

Senator Grosart: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

MEETING OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE CANCELLED

Senator Argue: I should like to inform the Senate that the meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture called for 9.30 tomorrow morning has been cancelled. The pet foods industry said they wanted to appear before the committee, and in response to their request we set a meeting for tomorrow morning. Since then they have informed us that they do not wish to send a witness, but instead to mail their submission to us. That is the reason for the cancellation.

VISIT OF CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARIANS—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, November 28, the debate on the inquiry of Senator van Roggen calling the attention of the Senate to the visit of Canadian Parliamentarians to the European Parliament from 12th to 14th November, 1974.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, when I adjourned the debate at the last sitting I was discussing the kinds of relationships that might be developed between the European Economic Community and Canada. I suggested some reasons why it might be important to both Canada and the Community to institutionalize those relationships to some extent.

In addition, of course, my purpose was to complement Senator van Roggen's comprehensive account of, and full commentary on, the visit of Canadian parliamentarians to the European Community in the first part of November.

I should say that Senator van Roggen himself made an outstanding personal contribution to this visit to the European Community, which I consider to be a most useful and successful one not only in terms of our contacts with the members of the European Parliament, who were most helpful to us, but also with other officials in high positions in the Community in both Strasbourg and Brussels.

I should like to say that Senator Bourget also made an outstanding contribution. We are all aware of the very practical approach that he frequently makes to issues that arise from time to time between countries in the general field of science and technology. On many occasions he was the lead speaker and the lead questioner on our side, and he set a tone of conciliation which resulted in what I consider to be some important progress that we as parliamentarians were able to make towards solving some of the problems that might be regarded as outstanding between Canada and the Community.

Senator Bourget: You are very generous.

Senator Grosart: Senator van Roggen has already paid tribute to the members of our group from the House of Commons. I wish to say at this time that I concur entirely with the tribute he made to them.

There are many good reasons for restructuring and institutionalizing our relationships with the Community, for example, in the quantitative sense of increasing our percentage of that market. It is quite fair to say that this in itself is of great importance, because the evidence is that over the years since the beginning of the Community, a good many years ago, the Canadian performance in that market has not been very good. We have been outstripped in achieving an up-graded percentage of the market by both the United States and Japan, and I think there is general agreement that the time has come for Canada, without worrying about diversification of trade or anything else, to up-grade its percentage. After all, the Community is the largest import market in the world; it is one and a half times the size of the United States import market.

Leaving aside the quantitative aspect for the moment, there are important reasons why we need essential and fairly immediate improvements on the qualitative side. There are many unresolved problems between us. To indicate a few, there is first the problem of procurement policies. This is a kind of non-tariff barrier that is one of the rather important obstacles to international trade. It has been said of Canada that we are boy scouts in that we have not insisted on high procurement standards in favour of Canadian content or Canadian tender. On the other hand, the European Community, as a Community, and particularly the nine nations of that Community, has raised very high procurement barriers against tenders from outside the Community, and this has greatly affected Canadian access to that market.

There is also the question of standards. Here again we have another kind of non-tariff barrier that is operating very much against Canadian trade, and this is particularly so in the area of electrical goods. The raising of standards—or, as I put it, the precisising of standards—is, in many cases around the world today, just another way of shutting out goods from other countries. In Canada we have very high standards, as I think we are all aware, through the Canadian Standards Association, particularly in the field of electrical goods. Our standards are as high as, if not higher than, those of any other country in the world and yet we are coming up against artificial standards very often specifically designed to keep out Canadian and other goods from the market.

We also have the problem of agricultural exports. You know that as a result of our problems of access to that market our exports of agricultural products to the Community are lower today than they were a decade ago—that is in terms of the percentage of the market.

There is the further problem of differentiating Canada from the United States in the considerations by the Community authorities on many of these issues. It was quite obvious to those of us who went over there a year and a half ago that we were completely lumped in with the United States, and the evidence of that came up not long ago when the Community reached an agreement under some of the rules of GATT regarding access of certain American products to the market and assumed, having reached agreement with the United States, that Canada would automatically sign. We have not done so for the very good reason—and we pointed this out to the Community—that the American interest lay largely in citrus fruits and corn whereas our interest was in barley and cheddar cheese, and that in respect of hard wheat we had a very different attitude towards access problems from that of the United States.

I am glad to say that as a result, to some extent, of the Senate committee's work and, to some extent, of the work done by the Canadian group to which Senator van Roggen has referred, and particularly of the visit of the Prime Minister, some of these problems are being resolved.

Then, of course, there is the question of the extension by the Community of its agreements of various kinds with different countries. As recently as July of this year the Community extended a very special agreement to some 44 developing countries, 20 of which are Commonwealth countries. We have a definite interest in the effect of these agreements on our trade. In this particular case I think that in the Caribbean alone the total trade involved is about $100 million. So we can make out a very good case showing that the agreements made by the Community with some of the Caribbean countries are quite contrary to the existing arrangements under the Canada-West Indies agreement.

In addition, we have the problem of the multinationals. The multinational corporations have been the main strength of the United States, and to some extent of the Japanese, penetration into this market. In Canada we have not yet developed that kind of multinational structure, and one of the impressions I certainly brought back was that the time has come for Canada, with or without government assistance—perhaps on the initiative of industry itself—to begin to develop a multinational position or posture in these markets, because until we do it is very doubtful that we shall be able to obtain the kind of access, or match the increasing share of that market, that the Americans and the Japanese already have.

There is also, of course, the particular problem of our manufactured goods. At the present time the percentage of total Canadian exports of finished goods to the Community is no more than 11.9 per cent—a very low percentage—which indicates that it is very important for us to negotiate rather better terms of access than we have now. It is true that the Community's industrial tariff is, on the average, fairly low, and actually lower than the Canadian industrial tariff. On the other hand, it has peaks, and some of those particular peaks hit directly at Canadian access to that market. We have to look at the strange position of the market which applies to some extent to Canada in that the European Community's approach to world trade generally is, to some extent, ambivalent. On the one hand, they are talking, as we are, about liberalization of multinational trade while, on the other hand, they are continuing to negotiate preferential trade agreements with various countries from all of which Canada is at the moment, and will be for the foreseeable future, excluded. However, in the current year on the balance of trade we have done rather well. Our total exports to the Community last year were $3.152 million as against imports of $2.481 million, so we had a favourable trade balance with the Community of $671,000.

Honourable senators, as we look to the future we have to be concerned about this whole network of international agreements that the Community is concluding more and more with other countries. At the present time they are considering new special agreements with Syria, Jordan and some other countries, which will extend this whole network of special agreements to a very large sector of the countries involved in GATT, with the result that when we face GATT negotiations again we will find that more than 50 per cent of all the members of GATT are in some kind of association with the European Community. Whether that will create new difficulties or not, I cannot say, but it is certainly something our negotiators and policy makers have to take into consideration. We have to remember that whatever our attitude may be to the Community, it is our second largest trading partner at the moment, next to the United States, and the second largest investor in Canada.

The kinds of agreements that I have mentioned are many. There are direct association agreements with some countries, there are special commercial agreements with other countries. There are preferential agreements and situations in which reverse preferences are definitely affecting our entry to that market, and there are rather generalized co-operative agreements.

Senator von Roggen stressed the role of parliamentarians in this problem of improving the relations between Canada and the Community. I am very glad that he did so, particularly because he laid some stress on the role that a committee of this Senate under the chairmanship of Senator Aird, now under the chairmanship of Senator van Roggen, had played in this important game, if you like. I say this because when that committee of the Senate went to the Community approximately two years ago we were told on this side and on the other side that there was no way that there would be any kind of special relationship between the European Parliament and the Canadian Parliament and that there would be no special relationship between the Community and Canada. We came back with the very small concession that the Community might consider setting up an information office in Canada. In fact, it was indicative of the climate at that time that that was all we felt we could ask for, and we merely had general approbation of the principle from our opposite numbers in the European Parliament, that is to say the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Parliament.

This has now progressed to the point where, instead of merely an information office, there is to be set up what the Community calls a délégation. It cannot be called an embassy, because they are not a national entity in the international sense. However, it is a délégation at ambassadorial level and if anyone asks what progress has been made, what concessions have been made, the only answer I can give is that it is a very, very important thing that Canada has an ambassador to the Community, Mr. Jim Langle, and that the Community will now have an ambassador to Canada. As I said earlier, this puts Canada in the position of succeeding Washington and Tokyo and now becoming the third nation in the world to be accorded this important concession.

It has been asked what progress has been made by these exchanges of parliamentary delegations. I have mentioned this one very important one. Certainly equally important in my opinion is that we have completely differentiated our interests from those of the United States. From all the conversations we had at all levels in Strasbourg and in Brussels, there is now no question of our being lumped together with the United States in the minds of the negotiators and authorities of the Community. This is important to Canada, because our interests in many ways are quite different from those of the United States.

There was, of course, the visit of the Prime Minister. There was some comment around the world that this visit had failed, that the Prime Minister had come away disappointed. We were able to say to our friends over there that this was not the Canadian viewpoint, that we were quite satisfied that the Prime Minister's visit had definitely increased the possibility and probabilities of greater access by Canada to that important market. Then, of course, since the early days when we were told that there would be no kind of structural or institutional relationship, we have had continuing discussions between our officials and the officials of the Community on matters concerning specific commodities.

I would then merely say, of course it takes time. Some may be impatient that we have not made more progress in our relations with the Community. My own feeling is, having seen the attitude taken on both sides two years ago, that we have made great progress. The Community has its problems, very great problems, at the moment, as Senator van Roggen has pointed out. The oil crisis has set back the development of the Community perhaps many years. They were looking, of course, according to the communiqué at the last summit meeting, to a monetary union and a political union by 1980. It is very unlikely that they will achieve either a monetary or a political union by that time. However, I think in Canada we can have some sympathy with them, some understanding of the great problems which they are facing in endeavouring to weld together these nine national communities into a single unit, because we have gone through it in Canada ourselves.

In Canada we are today a customs union, a free trade union, a monetary union and a political union. We have achieved it amongst ourselves, amongst 10 or 11 units, all of them to some extent sovereign in their jurisdiction. We still have our strains and our stresses. Some might quarrel with my statement that we have, for example, a free trade area. Between provinces we have had some problems related to eggs and chickens and various things, but I think it is worth remembering that after a hundred or more years of our experiment we are still having some of these problems. We have them in micro, the Community has them in macro, and I would suggest that our best posture at the moment is one of patience. We must be understanding, and wish them well, having some assurance that they now wish us well in our relations with them.

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Bourget: Honourable senators, during the week of November 10 last and more specifically from November 11 to 15, I had the privilege to be part of the group of Canadian parliamentarians who visited Strasbourg and Brussels. The purpose of that visit was to give Canadian delegates an opportunity to continue the dialogue initiated upon the previous meetings with members of the European government and authorized representatives of the Commission, an important agency of the European Community.

Honourable senators doubtless remember that it is following a very important study made by the Senate Standing Committee on Foreign Affairs on the relations between Canada and the European Community that this dialogue was initiated between the interested parties. It was agreed, as has already been mentioned, that such meetings would be held every year, alternating between Europe and Canada.

Honourable Senators van Roggen and Grosart have already conveyed to you their impressions and the results of that visit. May I be allowed to add that, thanks to the experience they had acquired during this study in committee and the previous meetings with European Community representatives, they were in excellent position to take an active part in the discussions both in Strasbourg and Brussels.

I would add that they were the ones who, most of the time, had the affair under control.

That is why I do not hesitate to say that they deserve the gratitude of the Senate for the leadership they have demonstrated throughout our trip.

When Senator Aird tabled the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs respecting Canada's relations with the European Community, he said that the first question he asked himself was: Does it matter? Is the report of relevance and of use? Answering his own question, he said, and I quote:

I believe it can, does and must matter. But it will only be of relevance and use if the public interest is served by it.

As did other members of our delegation who attended this type of meeting for the first time, I realized how right was Senator Aird's answer and also the use and importance given this report by the sectors concerned. The report was profusely distributed and every member of the European Parliament received a copy which enabled them to better understand and grasp the fact that Canada is a different entity in North America, that it has its own interests, that it may establish cultural links, markets and exchanges from a technological point of view with the European Community and its member countries.

The report also recommended that our Prime Minister make an official visit to the European Community and if possible to the member countries, a visit that would be of prime importance for the continuing development of relations between Canada and the Community. This visit, as we know, was made during the week of October 20 last. There were two phases, a stay in Paris and another one in Brussels. It was in Paris, following discussions with the President and the Prime Minister of France, that the decision was reached to form two study groups responsible for finding out where a fruitful cooperation could, in future, increase our trade. These two groups will have to make their reports to the Canada-France economic joint commission, at the meeting which this organization will hold at the beginning of 1975.

In Brussels, our Prime Minister, after meeting with his counterparts from Belgium and Luxemburg, had the opportunity of a long discussion with President Ortolí, Vice-President Soames and other commissioners of the European Community. Following these talks, it was also agreed that representatives from Canada and the Community be asked to start holding immediate meetings with a view to better defining the nature and scope of the negotiations whose purpose will be to define the form and content of our relations.

These are, I think, some of the results of the Prime Minister's visit. Though they are not tangible, they are promising for the future and for tightening the relations which we will have to keep with the Community. I mention that visit because during our stay in Strasbourg and Brussels that matter came up on several occasions and it had the effect of showing once again how important Canada considers our relations with the Community.

If I remember well, honourable senators, the first two meetings between Canadian parliamentarians and those of the European Community which took place in Brussels in March 1973 and in Ottawa in November of the same year were what could be called introduction meetings or, better still, exploratory meetings. Both delegations recognized that there were many ways of improving the relationships between Canada and the Community—that a separate dialogue should be maintained between the European Community and Canada and that, furthermore, a different statement of principles should be drafted for the relationships between both parties.

During our last meeting with the Community parliamentarians in Strasbourg, the purpose of the discussions that took place was mainly to explain and clarify the interests both parties could have in the different areas of our economic activities. It was then agreed, following the discussions, that it was now necessary to find a form of contractual relationships acceptable to those parties and aiming at promoting cooperation in the economic area and at increasing trade and investments between both parties.

Senators van Roggen and Grosart gave you a rather full report on the discussions that took place. I think it is unnecessary for me to come back on that subject at this time. However, I would like to stress two points that were raised on several occasions by the representatives of the Community during our meetings in Strasbourg and Brussels.

The first one had to do with our energy resources. We know that all the countries that make up the Common Market were hit, as everyone elsewhere, by the energy crisis. In the past the Community's main sources of primary energy were, in order of priority, oil, coal and natural gas. Now, since the oil crisis, the member-countries of the Community have realized that they will no longer be able, in the future, to rely only on their oil supply, as they thought at the beginning. By the way, the oil requirements of the Community amount to approximately 1000 million tons a year. It is not without reason that, within the near future, they will have to cut their consumption by 10 to 15 per cent. This is the reason why they must think about generating the major part of their electricity with the help of nuclear power. Knowing that Canada is one of the uranium-exporting countries, they showed some interest in this energy resource. As you know, this matter was discussed during the Prime Minister's visit to France and Belgium.

This would therefore, in my opinion, be an area in which close collaboration between Canada and the Community could very well be induced. We have the resources, they have the technology. As we know, the output of Churchill Falls will be over 7 million hp and the hydraulic resources of the James Bay rivers will produce millions more. We might use part of that abundant supply of electricity to develop a plant that would produce enriched uranium needed by our friends in the Community. The development of that plant would therefore provide the Community with an opportunity to participate in the project, either through investments, or through joint projects, in which they would contribute their technological expertise.

[Senator Bourget.]

I know that, in some spheres, there will be some objections concerning the development of plants to make enriched uranium for exportation, based on the assumption that this would hinder the sales of our CANDU reactor. However, we must admit that if the members of the Community do choose a different kind of reactor than ours, we cannot help it. As a French senior civil servant said: we have our own technology for our own reactor, therefore why should we turn to somewhere else. Besides, and I think this was mentioned by Senator Grosart when he took the floor last week, we must not forget that if we want to increase our trade relations with that important partner, the Community, we shall have once more to admit that trade patterns between nations must not be one way only.

Let me therefore hope that the preliminary talks which took place during our Prime Minister's visit to Europe and those to be held with Mr. Bourassa will have a successful issue.

Another point which I found interesting in our talks, either in committee or on the occasion of informal talks with members of the European Community, is the question relating to our trade and investment relationships and the possibly important part to be played by private industry in that respect. Now that we have an ambassador to the European Community, that a Canadian Consulate General will open soon in Strasbourg and that an information office will be established by the European Community in Ottawa, I think it will be easier for our Canadian businessmen to take a more positive interest in these European markets which offer Canada the best export-developing opportunity.

In the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, we can read the following, and I quote from page 37 of the report:

The Committee is convinced that Western European markets offer Canada the most important prospect for diversification of its exports, particularly of semi-processed and manufactured goods.

The efforts of Canadian exporters could be facilitated by the development of export partnerships or consortia among various small Canadian firms to help handle marketing, transportation, warehousing or distribution problems.

A little further on the same page, the report reads as follows:

It is also of interest to note the new techniques of engaging economic and industrial interests in Canada and the EC in long-term joint production and joint development ventures involving capital sharing and technology trade-offs.

The Committee considers that such enterprises will undoubtedly play a major role in the future expansion of Canadian trade with the Community. Companies within the Community with Canadian links are far more likely to import familiar Canadian products than those from another source.

And further on, the report of the committee goes on as follows:

If Canada is to change or modify its traditional role in Europe as a supplier of resource-based exports and become an acknowledged source of semi-processed and manufactured goods, it will have to come about through the efforts of Canadian exporters as well as by imaginative investment initiatives such as joint ventures on the part of Canadian investors.

Honourable senators, these are in my opinion excellent suggestions and valuable advice which the committee gave our businessmen and manufacturers. With the help of the various government promotion programs made available to them, they could develop interesting and profitable relationships with the countries of the Community.

When Senator O'Leary took part in this debate on Thursday the 28th of November, he suggested that his opinion was different from ours concerning our future trade relationships with the Common Market. He suggested they could endanger our trade relationship with the United States which, according to him, and I must admit it myself, are our most important clients and import 85 per cent of our finished products.

In this respect, I would indicate that current negotiations are in no way aimed at affecting or harming relations between Canada and the United States, because we all realize how important these are to our economy.

Indeed our committee's recommendation is quite clear on the matter. If Senator O'Leary did not read it, he can do so tomorrow on page 36. It is stated:

The Committee has concluded that Canada should not try to seek a preferential relationship nor any special association with the Community which would be discriminatory to other Canadian trading partners. The Committee considers the Government's concept of seeking a comprehensive non-discriminatory economic co-operation agreement with the Community to be a valid one.

So, honourable senators, I cannot see how our action up to now could harm our relations with the United States. Indeed our American friends do the same. They have diplomatic representation to the Community, and the E.E.C. has a delegation in the United States. Representatives of the E.E.C. and the American administration meet twice a year, in Brussels and in Washington, to discuss questions of common interest in the areas of trade, the monetary situation and the energy crisis. To my knowledge nobody in Canada accuses the United States, in so doing, of harming relations between our two countries. All we look for, just as do the United States, is keeping perspective of this new kind of Europe, already absorbing 20 per cent of world trade with its 250 million population.

Before concluding, honourable senators, I would like to support the suggestion made by Senator van Roggen concerning the character of continuity and permanence that should be our Canadian delegation's in the future. I believe as he does that in order to ensure the efficiency of those exchanges, the great majority of delegates appointed as members of the delegation should be senators and members of Parliament who will have had in the past the opportunity to acquire experience during previous meetings. It would also be very useful that these delegates be contacted several weeks in advance so that they might have more time to get informed and prepared as concerns the various matters they will have to discuss in the course of those meetings.

I for one had approximately one week's notice only before we left for Europe and there were, in fact—and Senator Grosart remembers this well—three meetings, three briefing sessions which lasted an hour each at the most and half of that hour was devoted to questions asked by the Canadian delegates. I hope that in the future those who will be members of these delegations will be chosen several weeks in advance.

Finally, I would like to thank all of those who in Strasbourg and Brussels welcomed us with such cordial and generous hospitality. I must also thank Mr. Dobell, the adviser to our delegation, and Mr. Marleau, our secretary, whose advice and services proved to be invaluable throughout our trip.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other honourable senator wishes to participate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, December 4, 1974

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

THE HONOURABLE JOHN B. AIRD

TRIBUTES ON RESIGNATION FROM SENATE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, with the resignation of Senator John B. Aird on November 28 the Senate has lost one of its most distinguished and popular members. I do not believe there is one member of this chamber who has not learned with regret of Senator Aird's resignation. Senator Aird is a modest man of many talents. He had a distinguished career in the Royal Canadian Navy during the war. He is an outstanding lawyer and businessman, and he had already established an enviable record of public service by the time he was appointed to the Senate at the age of 41 on November 10, 1964. Incidentally, he was the last member of this chamber to be appointed for life.

One of his great contributions to the Senate was, of course, his work as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs. The outstanding reports issued by that committee on Canada-Caribbean relations, Canadian relations with the expanded European Community, and Canadian relations with the countries of the Pacific region, were milestones in the work of the Senate. They have certainly led the way for future committees and future committee work of all kinds. Last session, Senator Aird instituted a study of Canadian relations with the United States. This work is now being continued by the Foreign Affairs Committee.

As well, as honourable senators know, Senator Aird was a valuable member of other committees while with the Senate, particularly the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

He has been a member of many parliamentary delegations to countries abroad. He assumed the chairmanship of the Canadian section of the Canada-United States Permanent Defence Board in 1972, and he has been a member of the Committee of Nine since early 1973.

His election as chairman of the two-year old Institute for Research on Public Policy was announced last week, but at the request of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister he will continue as Chairman of the Joint Defence Board.

None of us can have any doubt that Senator Aird will continue to provide outstanding service to the people of Canada in his new capacity. It is to be regretted, however, that the terms and conditions of his new duties make it impossible for him to continue his valuable work in the Senate. We shall all miss him. He is a very good man.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I can feel nothing but profound disappointment at the resignation from this chamber of Senator John Aird. His departure represents a serious depletion in the stock of talent which this body has at its disposal, but his departure also represents a personal loss to me.

John Aird has, over the years, become a close personal friend, and although our friendship will not be affected by his leaving, I am to be denied the pleasure and privilege of working with him and exchanging ideas with him on a regular basis, and this is a significant loss.

John Aird is a mild-mannered unassuming man of exceptional ability. His counsel is much sought after and his opinions enjoy the respect of everyone. His influence was strongly felt all the time he was here. John Aird is not a man of words, but a man of ideas and action—one of the best, in fact.

If the Senate's Foreign Affairs Committee today enjoys a fine reputation for excellence in all of its very worthwhile and significant undertakings, it is thanks to the guidance and inspiration of John Aird. So thorough were that committee's investigations, so incisive its analyses, and so avant garde its recommendations, that thinkers throughout Canada have turned to it seeking counsel in matters of international relations. The Senate bathes in the reflected glory which the Foreign Affairs Committee achieved under the chairmanship of John Aird.

He leaves us to take over the administration of the federally sponsored Institute of Research on Public Policy. The task he faces is not an enviable one, but we are certain that he will be more than equal to it. As is characteristic of him, he will contribute far more than would be expected of any ordinary man. He will excel in this undertaking, as he has in everything else to which he has turned his mind.

There is no telling what the future holds in store for John Aird, but I find it interesting to dwell on what happened to his predecessor in the post which he is to assume. Ronald Ritchie left the Institute and later became senior adviser to the Leader of the Opposition in the other place.

Senator Perrault: A fate worse than death.

Senator Flynn: Is it possible that the Progressive Conservative Party's policies were the fulfillment of the ideals set down by the Institute for Research on Public Policy?

All of us on this side, and I, in a very personal way, want John Aird to know that we will miss him and that we wish him well. We sincerely hope that he will find the time to keep in touch. We will always value his friendship, for it is the friendship of a genuinely uncommon man.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, in spite of my comparatively recent appointment to this body, I might be permitted to say a few words on this occasion. I knew John Aird for many years before being appointed to the Senate as a friend, as a lawyer, and as a political ally. In seeking an order of reference for the Foreign Affairs Committee from this chamber a few weeks ago, I had occasion to comment on the job that John Aird had done as chairman of that committee. At that time we were aware that he would be resigning as chairman of the committee, but not that he would be resigning as a member of this chamber. Similarly, last week, in giving the Senate a review of the most recent visit of the Canadian Parliamentary Group to the European Parliament, I was able to review and summarize the culmination of the work of the Foreign Affairs Committee under the chairmanship of Senator Aird in connection with Canada's relations with the European Community and the outstanding success which he enjoyed in achieving all the main objectives of the initial report of that committee. I do not intend to repeat the remarks I made on those two occasions; I simply remind honourable senators of them.

John Aird must surely be one of the most outstanding men in Canada when it comes to quiet public service, and he has contributed this service at the expense of his own time and personal interests. The number of positions he has held in recent years, all of which were enumerated by the Leader of the Government, in addition to his outstanding work in the Senate, amounts to a remarkable record of public service. I am pleased, as I know all senators are, that he will be continuing to serve the public in future years. Every citizen of this country is indeed fortunate to have men such as John Aird who are willing to take on responsibilities and duties such as he has undertaken. Certainly, our future thinking in this country, through the new duties he is assuming, could not be in better hands.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, when John Aird returned from the war he could not decide whether to be a counsel or a corporation lawyer. At that time he came to me and asked me whether he could devil in a few cases for me. Well, after devilling and watching the performance in court in two or three cases, he decided to be a corporation lawyer. It goes without saying that he is one of the leading corporation lawyers in Canada today.

John Aird's family has a proud background of public service going back to his father, Hugh Aird, and his grandfathers, Sir John Aird and the Honourable Mr. Black, and many others, and all of this has been impressed on his mind. It is for that reason that he came to the Senate in 1964 and that he is now vacating the Senate to take on the new responsibilities which he will be assuming.

Senator Aird is a delightful person, and an unusual person to be in politics. He is shy and modest, two characteristics very seldom seen in political figures, and never seen in myself. He is conscientious. Think of that, honourable senators. He works hard at whatever he does; he calls a spade a spade, and there is no verbiage to anything he says. As a matter of fact, he thoroughly dislikes making speeches, which you have probably noticed over the years.

I think of him as a young lawyer still. He is only 51. But think of his accomplishments. They have been gone into in detail and I will not go over them again. He was head of the Canadian delegation to NATO, and when the Canadian Forces in NATO were cut, it was against his thinking and he resigned. To some people that would be the end of their career. But not John. He was then, on the suggestion of the Prime Minister, made Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. He was then picked up again by NATO, by Senator Javits of New York, and became one of the "think tank," if you want to call it that, one of the nine great men of NATO. He has always been achieving, and achieving quietly. Now he has completed that job, and with Javits and the others he wrote a magnificent report on the future of NATO and the future of Europe.

He has now gone on to something else. I asked him, "Why couldn't you have stayed on in the Senate? We would like to have you here." He replied that he could not properly do his job and still be a member of the Senate, that he has to be completely non-political. When he told me that, I thought, "Well, well, well. There is another asset he has that the ordinary politician has not got." In his new job he will be a very great asset. He will do a good job, and when he has been there long enough he will go on to something else.

He has a complete lack of self-interest while in the Public Service, a tradition of his family, and he is one of our great corporation lawyers. I am sure that everyone in the Senate on both sides will deeply regret his departure, and will wish him the very best in the future.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I should like to make my brief comment on the departure of Senator Aird, because I was for a number of years his deputy in the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs. I can say that of all the learning experiences I have had in my life—and I have had many—this was one of the most outstanding. To serve under Senator John Aird was a learning experience, and I certainly learned a great deal about how to approach great problems of state in a manner that would possibly produce efficient results.

He will be remembered in the Senate for, amongst many other things, having developed a concept which may not have been new, although it certainly was in my time, namely, the concept of using the facilities and capabilities of the Senate standing committees to go beyond the immediate reference of a bill from the Senate and seek from the Senate authority to make a thorough investigation of one particular major problem that he regarded as of concern to Canada, and to which the Senate might make a useful contribution.

Reference has been made to some of the reports of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs. I can say personally that in the Caribbean, in the European Community, in the Pacific Region, the name of John Aird is well known and his reports are known and quoted as the Aird Committee Reports.

Reference has been made to his capacity for friendship. I did not know John Aird as Senator Walker and others did before he came to the Senate, but he has been good enough from time to time to say that I had become a friend of his. As far as I am concerned, that is one of the best compliments that has ever been paid to me at any time in my life, because to be a friend of John Aird is to be part of a continuing process of personal discussion, assistance and guidance in many ways. He has the great capacity of carrying out that axiom of Dr. Johnson on the essence of friendship:

A man should keep his friendship in a constant repair.

John Aird, although he has so many friendships all around the world, does work hard at keeping them in repair. Only yesterday he said to me on the telephone, "I am already getting lonely for some of my friends in the Senate, but you can be sure it is my intention to keep those particular friendships very much in repair."

Honourable senators, we therefore congratulate him on the decision that has been made by the Prime Minister and by the Institute for Research on Public Policy, to appoint him as chairman of that institute. It is an institute which in its work generally comes very close to some of the work of Senator Lamontagne's committee, the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy. Senator Lamontagne is directing that committee now into the general problem of futures, and this is exactly the area in which this very important institute will be spending a great deal of its energy. As we had his predecessor working very closely with us in that committee, I am sure that Senator Lamontagne will make sure that, busy as Senator Aird is, his knowledge, wisdom and expertise will from time to time be available to that committee.

Senator Lamontagne: It will be our first branch plant.

Senator Grosart: If I heard Senator Lamontagne correctly, he said it will be our first branch plant. It is difficult to make any comment on that, as I was not aware that the committee might be moving to some of the places we would have to go to find John Aird in the immediate future.

Honourable senators, I am sure I can say to John, for all of you, that we will miss him, that we know he will continue to further his distinguished career, and that we hope he will come back once in a while to see us.

LABOUR RELATIONS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF SETTLEMENT OF GRAIN INSPECTORS' DISPUTE

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, with your permission I should like to make a very short statement on the grain inspectors' dispute. I have just been informed that the dispute has been settled. Thus, no additional action will be required.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I am quite sure that we are as happy as the Leader of the Government is, but will the government eventually think of finding a method of solving these disputes other than that of emergency legislation?

Senator Perrault: I think honourable senators are aware that in the earlier dispute, which at that time involved the grain handlers, not the inspectors as is now the case, an announcement was made by the government that a study would be initiated to determine the best way of keeping our grain commitments around the world, and keeping the grain flowing from the ports of Canada. I would think that the status of the grain inspectors would be very much a part of that study. So, action will be taken.

Senator Flynn: Can you report much progress on this study?

[Senator Grosart.]

Senator Perrault: I have no immediate progress to report.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

ALBERTA-BRITISH COLUMBIA BOUNDARY BILL, 1974

COMMONS AMENDMENT CONCURRED IN

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Carter, seconded by the Honourable Senator Buckwold, for concurrence in the amendment made by the House of Commons to the Bill S-13, intituled: "An Act respecting the Boundary between the Provinces of Alberta and British Columbia".—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.)

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I am willing to yield to Senator Carter.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators, perhaps I should begin by saying a word in my own defence as to how I came to introduce the amendment yesterday evening. Bill S-13 is not my bill and I did not sponsor it. It so happened that yesterday I was filling in for our Whip, Senator Petten, who was away and, in the absence of the sponsor, Senator Prowse, I was asked to move this amendment, which I did. I was not given any explanation and assumed that because it was a very simple amendment everyone would agree to occur. However, since an explanation is required, I suppose the starting point will be the bill itself.

Bill S-13 is an act respecting the Boundary between the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia. That boundary line was drawn up and declared by two previous acts of Parliament, one in 1932 and another in 1955. The legislation described the boundary in rather general terms as following one height of land between the two provinces. The purpose of Bill S-13 is to establish a committee to manage and maintain this boundary, particularly to define those parts of it which have not been surveyed and laid down on the ground by markers or other demarcation devices.

Clause 4 of the bill sets forth the duties of this commission and the amendment merely adds one more duty, namely, that the commission should hold at least one public hearing on the reference before establishing any boundary line for that part of the boundary to which the problem or dispute is related. As I explained yesterday, this amendment simply adds this additional duty to the duties of the commission.

As to the merits of the amendment, it is my opinion that it resulted from those deep, dark suspicions entertained by certain people with respect to appointed bodies. It seems to be based on the premise that the commission, being an appointed body, might some day hold a secret meeting and determine to make changes in the boundary without any public knowledge or public input into the decision. So, ostensibly the purpose of the amendment is to safeguard the public interest in that respect. That argument overlooks the fact that the public interest is already safeguarded because the commission cannot do anything without the approval of the legislatures of both provinces and of the Parliament of Canada. Apparently, however, that did not seem to be sufficient safeguard to some and this amendment was put forward.

The amendment was debated at length in committee, and the government spokesman there argued against it on the grounds that it compelled the commission to hold public meetings when in fact no public meetings were necessary. He said that these meetings would involve extra expense which, incidentally, would be borne by the two provinces concerned, not by the federal government.

Another argument against the amendment was that it might lead the public to believe that they could have more input into decisions of this nature than is actually the case. Decisions made by this commission are of a technical nature and any disputes are between professional people, such as surveyors, engineers, geographers, et cetera, and it is not very likely that the ordinary public could have much input into such professional problems.

In any event, the government saw fit to accept the amendment in committee. The committee adopted and recommended it to the other place, which accepted the amendment. Personally, I see no reason why we should change it.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I think we all, I personally more than others, are grateful to Senator Carter for his explanation. In my opinion it is a useful amendment, even if there were some objections to it, because it will give private interests an opportunity to express themselves, private interests which may differ from those of the provinces, which are political interests.

This is a good amendment. In any event, given that full explanation by Senator Carter, which is fuller than I would have been able to give, I cannot but support concurrence.

Motion agreed to and amendment concurred in.

INDIAN OIL AND GAS BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald moved the second reading of Bill C-15, respecting oil and gas in Indian lands.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-15, an act respecting oil and gas in Indian lands, deals with exploration, drilling and production of oil on Indian reserves.

To the best of my knowledge, all the oil presently being produced in Canada on Indian lands is in Alberta. There could be one exception to that, in that there could be some oil produced on Indian lands in Manitoba. But if there is, it is a very small amount. In any case, if not 100 per cent, then almost 100 per cent of this production takes place in the province of Alberta.

Most of the wells that were drilled on Indian lands in Alberta were drilled between 1947 and 1955. During that period the governing body of the regulations concerning the exploration, drilling and production of oil came under the Indian Act. The regulations in the Indian Act for all production of oil on Indian lands were similar to the regulations of the Province of Alberta concerning the production, exploration and drilling throughout the entire province. The regulations provided for a very low royalty rate and long-term leases running from 10 to 21 years.

The Indian bands received revenue from this oil exploration, drilling and production through cash bonuses, royalties on production, acreage rentals, and compensation for surface rights, and all of those regulations were subject to the year 1966. They served the purpose of the Indian bands very well indeed until the oil crisis occurred about a year ago, when it was found that the royalties were very much out of line with world oil prices. It was found that the Indian Act was no longer a suitable piece of legislation to deal with this particular problem in respect to oil development and production, and that new legislation was needed.

As we are aware, all oil-producing provinces changed their regulations with respect to the royalties paid to them by oil companies. But this being on Indian lands, which is a federal responsibility, it was felt that rather than try to make adjustments in the oil royalties under the Indian Act, new legislation should be brought in. Fortunately, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development had commenced a study with respect to this matter prior to the oil crisis of approximately a year ago. There was set up a study team that consisted of a solicitor for the producing bands, a solicitor for the Alberta Indian Association, and experts in the production of oil and gas.

They had made some recommendations to the department, and on March 28, 1974, an order in council was passed which set new royalties and established a number of variable royalties either up or down as the world market for oil fluctuated. It had been hoped, just prior to the dissolution of the last Parliament, that legislation could have been brought in to deal with this matter and put it on a permanent basis rather than by regulation. However, that was not possible and that is why Bill C-15 is now before us. The bill provides for adjusting oil royalties as world oil prices fluctuate, and this may be done by way of regulations made by the Governor in Council rather than by Act of Parliament, which as we all know is a slow process when one considers the very wide-ranging fluctuations in oil prices today.

To give honourable senators an indication of what the oil royalties mean to the Indian bands of Alberta, last year the bands collected something in excess of $9 million. Because of fluctuations in the world price of oil, this year the same bands will receive about $40 million. At one time it was anticipated that oil production on Indian lands in Alberta would continue for perhaps the next 20 to 25 years, but because of the heavy demand for oil and the increased volume of oil being pumped from those fields, it is now estimated that a good percentage of this oil will be depleted in the next three to five years. However, there are huge quantities of very heavy crude oil under the Indian reservations of Alberta. At the moment, because of the problems associated with the pumping, production and refining of very heavy crudes, this oil is not being utilized, but in all probability in the not too distant future it will come into the oil pipelines of Canada and will be utilized. Of course, this will provide additional revenue for the Indian bands of the province of Alberta.

This bill is of extreme importance to the Indian people of Canada, and indeed to all Canadians. The bill is—I was going to use the word “simple,” but that is a dangerous word—uncomplicated, and in my opinion deserves the support of us all. The sooner this bill is passed, thus obviating the necessity of having to deal with the matter by order in council, so much the better.

On motion of Senator Choquette, debate adjourned.

FIRE LOSSES REPLACEMENT ACCOUNT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald moved the second reading of Bill C-18, to amend the Fire Losses Replacement Account Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-18 an act to amend the Fire Losses Replacement Account Act, is again—I must not use the word “simple,” but it is even shorter and more readily understood than Bill C-15.

The bill makes provision for the Yukon and the Northwest Territories to have their property covered under the the Fire Losses Replacement Account Act. I am sure that all honourable senators are aware that the federal government, and I believe most provincial governments, do not carry fire insurance on public buildings. As a matter of fact, there are many large private institutions which do not carry fire insurance on their buildings. The reason for that is self-evident. The federal government, and the provincial governments, own a great many properties, and it can be readily understood that it is much cheaper for them to carry their own insurance than to have their properties covered by the commercial insurance companies.

The federal government, therefore, is proposing to extend the provisions of the Fire Losses Replacement Account Act to properties owned by the Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

The amount of property to be insured has grown considerably over the last few years, in both the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. The last year for which I have figures is 1971, and I find that at that time the value of property in the Yukon that can be covered by the extension of this act is $75 million; the value of property in the Northwest Territories is $200 million. To give honourable senators some idea of the cost of insuring those properties through the commercial insurance industry I would say that, in the case of the Yukon, coverage of $75 million would cost $80,000 a year in premiums.

This measure is to extend the provisions of the act to cover properties owned by the Yukon and Northwest Territories. It is in the interests of the federal government and the people of Canada that this should be done, because of the fact that large federal grants are provided to the Yukon and Northwest Territories for the purpose of covering their losses in administering their affairs. Indirectly, the people of Canada are paying a portion, at least, if not all, of those premiums, amounting to $80,000 per year as far as the Yukon is concerned. Honourable senators can well imagine what the cost would be, as far as the Northwest Territories is concerned, on properties valued at $200 million.

● (1440)

I think this is a move in the right direction, and I commend this bill to honourable senators for their approval.

On motion of Senator Bélisle, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEPHONE COMPANY—COMMONS AMENDMENT CONCURRED IN

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the amendment made by the House of Commons to Bill S-11, respecting British Columbia Telephone Company, which was presented yesterday.

Senator Heath: Honourable senators, I move that the amendment be concurred in now.

Senator Grosart: Explain.

Senator Heath: Honourable senators, some explanation seems to be called for. I believe that this amendment will simply make it possible for the British Columbia Telephone Company to use the French language version of its name, being “La Compagnie de Téléphone de la Colombie-Britannique,” in conducting its business transactions. That is the sum and substance of the amendment, as I understand it.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps Senator Heath can tell us the reason for the change from the original name. Was there a reason for this change being made by the other place?

Senator Heath: Not to my knowledge, Senator Grosart. I imagine that it follows the practice whereby a company incorporated under a federal act of Parliament can use either the French or English version of its name in conducting its business transactions. That is the only explanation that comes to mind.

Motion agreed to and amendment concurred in.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, which was presented yesterday.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I do not think any further explanation is necessary. As I mentioned yesterday, it is a mere matter of a correction, one hopes, a change, at all events, in the translation to make it conform better with what apparently is, I hope, the final opinion of the various lawyers and translators concerned.

Therefore, I move the adoption of the report now.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THE WORK ETHIC IN CANADA

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, November 20, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Senator Croll calling the attention of the Senate to the status of the "work ethic" in Canada today, and the need for the establishment of a Senate Committee to examine and report thereon.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, when this motion was placed on the Order Paper of the Senate, I was somewhat struck by its title. In French, it is called "l'éthique du travail" and in English "work ethic". As my knowledge of the humanities did not enable me to grasp the full scope of this title, I had to look up the dictionary to really understand its meaning.

So I went to the library and I tried to find out what the expression "éthique du travail" or "work ethic" could mean. I found rather interesting definitions. Lalonde says:

It is a science having for immediate object the opinions, the appraisal and the acts called good or bad.

I went further and looked up Camu where he gives a general description of man. Camu says:

In ethics, it has to do with morals, ethical science, it is a claim for justice which results in injustice if it is not based first of all on a justification of the ethics of justice.

Senator Bourget: Quite confusing.

Senator Asselin: I went still further and looked into Sarrazin who says that:

Political ethics has two main objects, culture in the intelligent nature and education of the people.

For a young senator to see such a high sounding title, it is obvious that I was somewhat hesitant to tackle the subject now before us. But I told myself that senator Croll could measure up to that title, that it somewhat describes his character, ambitions, working abilities and all that.

Besides, having read and heard his speech, having read it over and over again, I can tell you that he did commendable research work to be able to submit such an approach to the Senate. Therefore I must congratulate Senator Croll for his efforts and for having called the Senate's attention to an important matter that deserves our attention.

However, I do not want to say that I agree entirely with what he said on that subject. Of course, he said things everybody wished to hear especially when he talked about the guaranteed annual income; it is obvious that this is not a new idea. All countries in the world have studied that question. Moreover, if you watched the last American campaign for the Presidency, you must have noticed that the Nixon clan, as well as the McGovern clan, offered the American people suggestions as to that principle of guaranteed annual income, while here in Canada, I believe all the political parties were equally interested in that principle. As far as our party is concerned, in 1969 we held a congress in Niagara Falls, where a thorough study of the principle of a guaranteed annual income was done. We spent three days studying that principle with experts and delegates from all provinces in order to consider the possibility of such a guaranteed annual income being established in Canada.

It is obvious when one reads the report of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty in Canada—chaired by the Honourable Senator Croll—that it did deal rather specifically with that aspect of a guaranteed annual income plan.

Over the years, all political parties have often made an election issue out of it because they all know that nobody is satisfied with the present social security system. All political parties are seeking a new formula.

If I may refer to the report of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty in Canada, at page 176:

As the executive director of the Canadian Council on Social Development pointed out in his brief to the Committee.

it is important that we recognize [the guaranteed annual income] as an ideal—a socio-economic objective—perhaps a political, social, and economic philosophy or doctrine; as such it should be sharply differentiated from a specific legislative program either in existence or being proposed at this time by any political party.

The committee went on to give the prerequisites to a possible guaranteed annual income. It was said that it should be fair, it should be effective, and it should improve on the present system.

I think the committee met the objectives of all political parties who want to change the present system and replace it with a formula which would give a balance more acceptable to the different social classes.

It was also said that such a system of guaranteed annual income should be flexible, not too costly for both the government in power and those paying taxes to keep that system going. It was said that it should be acceptable both politically and socially.

I do not oppose out of hand the guaranteed annual income plan but what was not clarified by Senator Croll, and the proponents of such a system in this country, what the taxpayers want to know, is whether that guaranteed annual income plan will replace the present system, or whether it will be added to the present system, another so-called social scheme which will further erode the taxable incomes of our taxpayers. That matter has not been clarified yet.

If we want to add to this social security system all kinds of pensions paid by the government to certain classes of citizens, if we also add the guaranteed annual income plan, then as a taxpayer, I wonder, as you should too, where we shall find the funds required for the implementation of such a program.

When the report Poverty in Canada proposed some prerequisites to the implementation of such a system, it was said we should make sure that this system is not too expensive; the direct and indirect costs of a guaranteed annual income plan should not exceed reasonable limits.

Direct costs represent the funds paid out of the federal budget for the implementation of the system. Indirect costs represent the necessary expenses for managing and regulating the program. However, nothing in this report indicates that those who have studied the matter wished the present system to be set aside and replaced by a guaranteed annual income plan.

This is obviously why people are reluctant, because we think that those who have to bear the costs of social security were not given clear and accurate explanation about the way this new formula could apply.

Obviously, the present social security system might not reach all planned objectives. Several pension plans are covered by the term "social security." Of course, the matter of old age security, the disability pension, a pension for mothers in need and family allowances paid by the federal government has been settled. The Province of Quebec has also established its own family allowances system. We have social welfare payments which are made by the Province of Quebec where tremendous amounts are allocated to this budget item.

This morning, I read in the newspapers the statement of the Quebec Minister of Social Affairs, the Honourable Mr. Forget, who claims that this budget item is going to exceed all the estimates made by the government in its last budget.

Furthermore, there is an uncontrollable wasting of money due to overlapping jurisdictions between the federal and the provincial governments in this field of social security since, as I said before, the federal government makes family allowance payments. The Province of Quebec itself also contributes family allowances, social welfare benefits and pensions to mothers in need. All this results in a tremendous waste of money which we have no means of controlling due to overlapping jurisdictions. I have always thought the various governments of the country, federal and provincial, should some day come to an agreement once and for all and concentrate the management of public funds at one level of government so that a closer watch might be kept on expenses and on the taxpayers' dollar. Yet I regret to say that people realize every day that their money is being wasted in the most shameful way. I wonder if the time has not come for the federal government to review its position and put the whole area of social security under the jurisdiction of provinces, which have a constitutional right to legislate on family matters, and also on matters relating to individuals, since social security equally relates to families and individuals. This, in my opinion, would enable us to set up more adequate control procedures to try to avoid, as I said, that shameful waste of public funds which we are witnessing in the implementation of that social security program.

Some people say that we should not set up that selective control, that it cannot be done because it would be too humiliating for people applying for social security benefits. Unfortunately we are still in a situation where one third of the people derive their means of existence, through this social security system, from the other two thirds on the labour force. We have implemented a socialist system which will not be easily wiped out. I admit that the state must help people who live in dire conditions. But the problem is that too many people today are being paid social security benefits and thus deprive of that help other people who need it badly. We are facing a kind of imbalance which, in my opinion, must provide people who manage public funds with food for thought.

I think the new Unemployment Insurance Act is preposterous. Senator Croll wants to set up a committee which would meet people and urge them to go back to work, to care and apply for new jobs, but on the other hand the Unemployment Insurance Act induces people to do exactly the opposite of what Senator Croll is advocating.

Indeed, honourable senators, under the Unemployment Insurance Act provisions, when people stop working after they have qualified they can receive between $100 and $115 a week so how many can you find who have applied for unemployment insurance benefits who will accept a job which will give them between $100 and $115 a week? I would say not even one per cent.

We also have a situation where they report to unemployment insurance and swell the statistics of unemployed in Canada, and every month Statistics Canada reports that there are 500,000 or 600,000 people who are out of work while there are probably no more than 200,000. This is because the government passes legislation which encourages them not to work. I believe that this government was taught a lesson in 1972 because if it had electoral problems in 1972 when it lost its majority in the House of Commons it is surely because the businessmen and the population were blaming it for having passed legislation which, according to me, was antisocial.

The facts to be considered are sad, as there are 500,000 unemployed in the country and maybe more than half of them receive unemployment benefits to the tune of $100 a week while we must import foreign labour for our harvests in Ontario, in the West and in Quebec. I know that this year, in the province of Quebec, the apples were not picked because Quebec did not have the labour to do it. The apples are rotting on the branch. During that time people are staying at home and drawing $100 or $115 a week and refusing employment. Honourable senators, is this the way we are going to build and help build the country we want to have, economically and politically? Of course not. I am under the impression that we are going the wrong way and that the present legislation should be changed precisely to force those in good health, those who do not need unemployment insurance benefits, to accept jobs when the manpower centres ask them to. In my opinion, it is not by implementing a guaranteed annual income system that the situation will be improved.

There is a system which impresses me enormously and I think that all countries and all governments should study it quite seriously. The Committee on Poverty in Canada discussed it and many countries are now studying it. It is called negative income tax. I think that it would be the only formula which could correct the situation we are now facing.

Under this type of plan, benefits are payable only to those in need as established by a simple declaration or statement of income. It is therefore selective and not, like the demogrant, universal. Allowance levels are established as a proportion of a "poverty line." These allowances are reduced as other income increases, at a rate that provides an incentive to increase income through earnings.

In other words, it means that everybody should file an income tax return, even and especially the needy, under this new negative income tax approach. They would file their income tax return and it would then be possible to determine the degree of poverty of heads of family and their children. They would be told that below the poverty line, they would be paid so much in welfare benefits, but that they should also look for a job to supplement their income. Of course, some people say, and I have read books to the effect, that this practice would be too humiliating. It would be, as I said earlier, for those who are not in need of assistance; but those who need it, who are still eager to work, could complete those income tax forms and the government could then determine their poverty level and grant them benefits. As their earnings increase, their welfare benefits would be reduced, thus resulting in a considerable saving of taxpayers' money.

Recently somebody recommended to me a very interesting book. I think Senator Croll knows about it. One of his advisers, whose name I do not remember, handed it to me. This book is entitled Vaincre la pauvreté dans les pays riches, by Lionel Stoleru.

The author analyzes every system extant, those used in France, Britain, the United States, Germany, Italy. At the end of this study he draws no conclusion, but rather the idea seems to be conveyed that the best system that could be used by governments is the negative income tax. This would be fair both to the needy and to the taxpayer, who would know where his money goes.

In this book entitled, as I said, Vaincre la pauvreté dans les pays riches, the author describes, in a somewhat extraordinary chapter, two kinds of poverty: real poverty and fraudulent poverty. Those who are interested in looking at the book will find on page 245 his definition and his understanding of real and fraudulent poverty. He goes on to indicate two ways of finding where real poverty is. First, the revenue test, which is done through negative income tax. He also describes the work test, that is the attitude of people toward work. He states that human nature being what it is, people do not like to work. This is no novel thing. It is the old story of work being a duty imposed from above, a sacrifice which people must make, but thank God there are still people who like to work. But human nature is such that work is a burden.

The author also quotes the work of Leonard Goodwin who asks:

Do the poor want to work?

Senator Choquette: Do they?

Senator Asselin: The answer is simple: they do not want to work anymore than anybody else. But if we give them a social security system which invites them not to work, they will work even less. In his book, Leonard Goodwin said—and this is a study of the various groups of people who live in poverty—that it is rather difficult to find systems to urge them to work. He says that the state must arbitrarily establish strict and rigid systems to stop all those generations, even if they are poor, from slipping towards idleness and from depending for several years on the state to survive. He says that it is senseless to force someone to accept a job, if he must relinquish a comfortable living on social welfare for a low salary, and that people will always find a way to avoid this.

The best way to implement a work test is probably to adopt two systems simultaneously: strong financial incentive in the assistance mechanism and efficient action on the part of employment and professional training services.

To those who are interested in this matter and who wish to take part in the famous debate started by Senator Croll, I recommend the study of Lionel Stoleru's book entitled Vaincre la pauvreté dans les pays riches.

In summary, the present system satisfies no one. The governments of all countries in the world have tried to find a more efficient system because nearly all countries have a system similar to ours, perhaps less advanced in certain countries, and more progressive in others. But the fact remains that the present social security system does not satisfy any government. Another formula must be found.

On reading carefully the speech of Senator Croll, I asked myself certain questions. I wondered on reading his speech, unless I misunderstood it—I followed it carefully in the Senate, and read it at home, at my leisure, over the weekend—I wondered what Senator Croll really meant by "work ethic." Does he want to go out and evangelize the poor, or go out to meet them and tell them, "Listen, you must have jobs" or perhaps ask them why they are not satisfied with the jobs they now have or how we could help them? Did he also want to meet some groups of our society and ask them what they think of the annual guaranteed income? Well, everyone is familiar with that formula.

As I said earlier, those questions have been discussed by all political parties and also in all the countries of the world. But a formula has yet to be found that could be both applicable and applied in our present day society.

Does Senator Croll want to set up a committee which would be a continuation of the committee on poverty in Canada? In his mind, the notion of "work ethics" is certainly an abstract one. Does it mean that we should try to alter the attitude and way of thinking of beneficiaries of social security program? I must admit that I was somewhat lost trying for a moment to find the meaning of this definition, and also deciding whether it would be practical for the Senate to embark upon such an enterprise. Indeed, we must commend Senator Croll for his dedication to work. He had already given evidence of this as Chairman of the Committee on Poverty. However, if we examine—I do not have it—the speech he has made, especially his last remarks about the recommendations on the creation of his committee, I feel he has not been clear enough for me to decide. This, of course, is my own problem because I must decide whether or not to support the setting-up of another Senate committee which would study I do not know what yet.

As I was saying earlier, we cannot go and tell the people, "Listen, you are going to go back to work and we will put forward a new social security system. Are you not satisfied with your working conditions, are you not satisfied with your jobs, are you not satisfied with the mechanisms of collective bargaining available to you?" All these questions have been raised by Senator Croll. But in my opinion he has not dispelled my hesitations to the point that I would be ready to give him a blank check and tell him: "Set up your committee and explain its purposes and objectives".

I am not against the idea that we should set up a committee; the Senate has indeed shown its mettle in the past, and its committees have, of course, contributed to enlighten the government on legislation introduced in various fields. On the other hand, there should not be too many committees. Committees should not be set up for the sole purpose of travelling across Canada and saying to people, "Here is an exceptional question we want to discuss with you." We must also make sure that this committee can come out with valid and adequate findings because, of course, we are spending public funds.

I do not want to play politics, and my honourable friends opposite will understand that with the small number of senators we have on this side of the house, we cannot afford to sit on each and every committee, especially committees at large bound to travel across the country, such as the one Senator Croll is suggesting. We cannot afford on this side of the house to leave every day to go and work either in Montreal, Winnipeg or Toronto, on a committee such as the one Senator Croll is suggesting. Certainly, Senator Croll has enough influence to have the Prime Minister appoint more Conservatives to the Senate. Then we might speak differently. But for the time being, we must restrict our activities to what the Senate is asking us to do. It is not that we wish to shirk the activities of the Senate: we are ready to co-operate entirely. It will be recognized, of course, that because of our few members we must restrict our activities. I hope the government got my message.

I do not reject straight off the comments of Senator Croll. As I said a while ago, he is quite deserving because he has worked very hard. But the matter had to be raised in the Senate, because, as I said, too many people are wondering about our social security system. Too many people are saying: We are overtaxed for those who refuse to work. Too many people are saying: How come that in a society such as ours, the two thirds who work have to look after the other third who refuse to work?

All those questions are being asked at the present time by our workers, and senators have every opportunity to meet the workers who are heavily taxed. They are often shocked when they see a neighbour on welfare, or drawing unemployment insurance, driving a big car and living comfortably in his own house—for weeks and months on end—while the individual who is willing to work has to get up every morning and go to work for eight, nine or ten hours daily.

Those are questions being asked by the people. Those questions have also been well discussed in the speech delivered by Senator Croll.

I am therefore saying that we must develop a system which could compensate for the shortcomings of the present system,—whatever name we want to call it—because the majority of the taxpayers are overtaxed, and they cannot pay out more. Otherwise, we shall get the other side of the picture. The working people will organize themselves in order to receive social security benefits, because they can no longer pay their taxes and make both ends meet because of their family responsibilities.

Therefore, before launching a broad committee like the one Senator Croll suggested, why should we not first suggest to the government a social allowance system which would take into account the work incentive factor, and which we could put forward in this debate?

In short, we should set up a social allowance system which would help the real poor while assuring the taxpaying workers that their income will be more equally distributed, thus bringing back into our society the true basic principles of a distributive justice which we are too often led to ignore.

[English]

On motion of Senator Carter, debate adjourned.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

TWENTIETH ANNUAL SESSION, LONDON, ENGLAND—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Twentieth Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly, held at London, England, from 11th to 16th November 1974, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Session and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada, and to the visit of the delegation from Canada with Canadian Forces in Germany.

He said: Honourable senators, in rising to speak on the subject of the inquiry which I placed on the Order Paper a few days ago, I would first like to remind you that this year marks the twenty-fifth anniversary of NATO, and the twentieth anniversary of the North Atlantic Assembly. In my view, any time is a good time to assess the benefits and the effects of organizations such as NATO and the North Atlantic Assembly, but perhaps the twenty-fifth anniversary of one, and the twentieth anniversary of the other, is an even better time.

I should like to commence by reviewing what took place in Europe during the period from 1940 to 1945, and then consider the period from 1945 to 1948. I am sure all honourable senators will recall that at the end of the last World War in 1945 the only country involved in that world conflict which came out with territorial gains was the Soviet Union. Their territorial gains from 1940 to 1945 were really colossal. I repeat, the U.S.S.R. was the only power which subjugated people, and caused large areas of land in Eastern Europe to disappear inside the Soviet Union; they were just gobbled up.

Let us look at those areas. First of all, there were three large areas carved out of Finland and gobbled up by the Soviet Union. The entire countries of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania disappeared from the face of the earth. They are now inside the Soviet Union. In addition, parts of East Prussia, Poland, Czechoslovakia and Rumania were carved out of those countries, and taken inside the Soviet Union.

As a matter of fact, from 1940 to 1945, 183,000 square miles of territory in Eastern Europe were taken out of the countries concerned, apart from Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania, and incorporated into the Soviet Union. In those 183,000 square miles were 24 million people who disappeared from their countries to be absorbed into the Soviet Union. Then, from 1945 to 1948, the Soviet Union took control of the remaining zones of East Germany, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Rumania, Hungary, Bulgaria and Albania, which comprised another area of some 394,000 square miles containing about 92 million people.

I emphasize that the Soviet Union was the only nation that gained territory and brought people under her subjection as a result of the last World War, either during that war or immediately after in the period from 1945 to 1948. The total of those territorial gains in those two periods was some 577,000 square miles, containing 116 million people, all of whom came under the heel, the domination, of the Soviet Union.

Is it any wonder that in 1949 the countries of Western Europe banded themselves together in an effort to prevent the spread of the Soviet Union westward throughout Europe? I think, after what had happened, they had every right to concern themselves. I refer back to the area subjugated by the Soviet Union, and the numbers of people involved—577,000 square miles and 116 million people.

From the Russian border to the English Channel the area of those countries in Western Europe that now belong to NATO is 690,000 square miles, only slightly larger than the territory the Soviet Union had already subjugated, with about twice the population. In other words, there were 116 million people in those areas that Russia took under her control, while there are about 208 million people in those countries that bound themselves together into what is now known as NATO.

I am one of those people who is convinced that if it had not been for NATO—if the countries of the Western world had not bound themselves together, with the support of the British Isles and the North American continent—the Soviet Union would have arrived, many years ago, at the English Channel, and God knows whether she would have stopped there. I do not think there can be any doubt in anyone's mind that NATO has been an effective force in stopping the spread of the Soviet Union throughout the whole of Western Europe.

Honourable senators, for the past 25 years we have had peace in Europe—one of the longest periods of time in history that there has been peace in Central Europe. I admit that it has been a trying peace, and a costly peace. Many people in Western Europe, in common with people in North America, are beginning to question the need to continue spending taxpayers' dollars to maintain forces in Western Europe to protect us from the westward spread of the Soviet Union. I believe that this money has been well spent. When an aggressive force and an aggressive people have been stopped from spreading their influence at a given line, west of which not one square foot of territory or one person have been subjugated by the Soviet Union since NATO came into being, need anyone ask whether NATO has fulfilled its duties, functions, or purposes during its 25 years of life? I think not.

I recall an old friend of mine, Congressman Mendel Rivers, who unfortunately has passed away. He used to make speeches at least once a year, perhaps twice a year, at either NATO committees or in the Assembly, asking the nations of the free world to commit 5 per cent of their gross national product to the defence of freedom. Of course, he never was able to get the Assembly to adopt his motion. I think his intent was right, and I am one of those people who believe that if it costs 5 per cent of the GNP to keep peace in the world, it is a bargain.

We in Canada have been able to play an extremely important role, both inside and outside NATO, while committing much less than 5 per cent of our GNP. As a matter of fact, we are committing less than 2 per cent, but I repeat that I believe Canada has played a major role, both inside NATO and outside NATO, in maintaining peace throughout the world. But I am one of those prepared to spend 5 per cent, if need be, to maintain freedom. What is 5 per cent of the GNP compared to the alternative?

I have described what the Soviet Union was able to accomplish prior to NATO's coming into being, and have said that the alternative to spending whatever is necessary to maintain peace is war. I would then ask: How do you measure the cost of war? Can you measure that in percentage of the GNP? No, if we get involved in another war, it will take the total GNP—and then some. But that is not all, because the cost of war cannot be measured in dollars and cents. Human suffering and destruction cannot be measured. I suggest that that is the alternative to being strong and able to defend yourself.

Sure, we have played a major role—when I say “we” I mean both Canada and NATO—in bringing about détente between the Western World and the Warsaw Pact nations. We have had some success, and I suggest that that success has been possible only because the Western World has been strong. You do not negotiate with a weak neighbour; you bring him under your influence, as the Soviet Union brought other countries under its influence in the period from 1940 to 1948. Faced with a united effort on the part of the Western World, the Soviet Union has been prepared in recent years to talk. We have not accomplished all we would have liked as far as détente is concerned. There is, however, some progress, and as long as people are talking they will not fight. If those negotiations ever break down then, in my opinion, we will be in a much more dangerous position than we are at the moment. I repeat, we can only negotiate and bring about détente through strength and a combined effort on the part of the free peoples of the Western World.

People today wonder what will happen after détente? If we are able to bring about mutual and balanced force reductions in Western Europe, and if we are able to settle the differences which now exist in the Middle East and other areas of the world, then where do we go from there? NATO has been chiefly a military force in Western Europe. It has drawn the attention of the Soviet Union and, I believe, caused them to stop and consider whether they want to become involved in a military conflict with a force of that type. But today there are other means of bringing about chaos in the free world which perhaps, if pursued to their ultimate, would allow the Soviet Union to spread to other parts of the world without firing a shot.

I refer, on the one hand, to the oil crisis. I am one of those who believe sincerely that the Arabs never dreamt of increasing the price of oil on the world markets themselves. They had a good teacher which, in my opinion, was the Soviet Union. Senator van Roggen, speaking a day or two ago in another debate, referred to the fact that Western Europe has to import $20 billion-worth of oil annually, chiefly from the Middle East, but they have a favourable trade balance of only $2 billion. How are they to pay that additional amount of $18 billion, and how can NATO and its military machine operate without oil? No army, navy or air force can move without oil. I consider oil to be one of the strongest military weapons in the hands of a potential enemy today.

Of course, oil, together with other influences, has brought about world inflation which is almost wrecking the economies of huge sections of the free world today. Again, how can we be defended militarily with inflation as it exists today, and with the possibility that it will be worse tomorrow? So long as we have an energy crisis in this world then, in my view, we will have inflation, and that is the view of many who are privy to a good deal more information than I. Here, however, we are faced with an entirely new situation. I repeat that NATO has been successful for the past 25 years in maintaining the peace. Can it be successful in fighting a different kind of war—an energy war, an inflation war? I do not know, but I believe that as long as those countries of Western Europe and the North American continent are united in an effort to maintain the peace, whether it is against bullets, an energy policy, or inflation, our chances of success are much greater than if we attempt to do this unilaterally, one at a time and on our own.

The Canadian delegation attended the North Atlantic Assembly meetings in London from November 11 to 16. The same delegation then travelled on to Europe and into Germany to visit the Canadian Forces stationed there. We had an excellent delegation. It was made up of three members of this house—Senator Lafond, Senator Yuzyk and myself—and from the other place there were Mr. Paul Langlois—who led the Canadian delegation and to whom I shall refer again in a moment—and Messrs. Caron, Carter, Ethier, Guilbault, Kempling, McKinnon, Patterson, Stewart, Trudel and Woolliams. Alternate delegates were Messrs. Bawden, Demers, Fortin and Railton. I repeat, it was an excellent delegation, and there were at least three Canadians on each of the five standing committees of the Assembly.

Mr. Langlois has led the Canadian delegation now for two years, and in the period of time that I have had the privilege of being one of the representatives of the Senate

[Senator McDonald.]

I can quite honestly say that we have never had a better leader. His leadership has been recognized not only by Canadians but by the delegates generally, from no matter what country they come. This year the position of Treasurer of the North Atlantic Assembly became vacant by reason of the fact that Senator de Chevigny of France, who had been Treasurer for many years, was defeated in the last French general election. Mr. Langlois decided that he would like to present his name for this position, and was prepared to fight an election, if need be. The election of the Treasurer took place, with one of the Belgian delegates running against Mr. Langlois. I shall not reveal the figures, but will tell you that Paul Langlois won that election with a very substantial majority.

Senator Bourget: He must have had good organizers.

Senator McDonald: He did. Apparently elections are fought a little differently in Canada from other places. In any case, I mention that fact to illustrate that Mr. Langlois' leadership was recognized not only by Canadians but by the Assembly in general. My congratulations, and I am sure those of all honourable senators, go to him.

Before leaving Ottawa, we were briefed by officials of the Department of External Affairs and the Department of National Defence. On many occasions, when I have had the opportunity of representing Canada abroad, I have found that briefings before leaving home were of not too much advantage. That is certainly not the case as far as delegations to the North Atlantic Assembly and its committee meetings are concerned. The officials of both departments have given the Canadian delegation excellent briefings, which have enabled us to represent Canada in a much better fashion than if we had not been briefed prior to leaving Canada.

I would also like to thank the secretary of the delegation, Lieutenant-Colonel Tom Bowie. Many of you know Lieutenant-Colonel Bowie, and I do not think a delegation could go from Ottawa, to London, to Dover, to Calais, to Rheims, to Strasbourg, to Lahr and back, and no one lose his luggage or his wife, without him.

Senator Flynn: Did you say "his bags or his wife"?

Senator McDonald: I did not say "bags"; I said "luggage."

• (1550)

As I have been a member of the Military Committee for some considerable time—and I sat on this committee during this session—I would like to spend a moment on the agenda that was dealt with during the meetings, and on some of the recommendations that came from the Military Committee and which were presented to the General Assembly and accepted.

The first item on the agenda, and one of great importance, was MBFR—Mutual and Balanced Force Reductions. It is the wish of NATO and the North Atlantic Assembly that no nation should unilaterally withdraw forces from the NATO structure without consultation with NATO, and without giving NATO and the North Atlantic Assembly the opportunity to discuss the withdrawal of those troops with our opposite number, namely the Warsaw Pact.

Of course, we Canadians were guilty a few years ago of having done this. I shall not comment on whether it was right or wrong to have unilaterally withdrawn part of our troops from Europe, but I am convinced today that no country in NATO at this moment should withdraw one man, one tank or one truck before we have completed negotiations with the Warsaw Pact countries, in an effort to have them withdraw at the same time some of their men and equipment from the battlefield of Western Europe. How are we going to negotiate mutual and balanced force reductions if our people unilaterally pull out soldiers, airmen, sailors and equipment? We have nothing else to bargain with.

Therefore, NATO and the North Atlantic Assembly are determined to keep every man and vehicle in place until such time as agreement can be reached with their opposite number, so that both will withdraw men and armaments from Western Europe at the same time.

We believe we shall be successful in getting this done, because of the fact that people in Eastern Europe today are no longer blind to what is going on in the Western World. They know the standard of living that is available to citizens of the Western World, whether they live in Western Europe or the North American continent. They are demanding more and more that their governments supply them with the everyday needs of life. In other words, they want refrigerators, cars, bicycles, radios, and all those things that we take for granted but which they do not have.

I suggest to honourable senators that the Soviet Union and her satellite nations will have to provide more of those ordinary goods of everyday living for their people in order to keep the lid on. If they do, then the percentage of their gross national product spent on their armaments and armed forces will have to be reduced. They are, therefore, going to listen to good arguments in respect to mutual and balanced force reductions.

The second item on the agenda was a joint meeting with the Committee on Defence of the Western European Union, which perhaps has as much interest in defence and the procurement of weapons as the North Atlantic Assembly. It was helpful to have a discussion with them because, as I said, they are involved in much the same activities related to the procurement of weapons as the North Atlantic Assembly.

Another important item discussed was a replacement aircraft for the F-104, used by four countries in Europe and by Canada which is reaching the stage of obsolescence. Aircraft under consideration are the French Mirage, the Northrop S-17, the General Dynamics S-16, and the Saab Eurofighter, the multi-purpose aircraft which is built in Sweden.

I do not know anything about the Saab Eurofighter but when we were talking to a Canadian general and discussing the Centurion tank, which it is suggested might be replaced by a Swedish tank, he said, "Well, you know, the Swedes have a wonderful tank. It will stand up, lie down, and do all sorts of funny things. But will it fight?" Nobody knows, because it has never been called upon to fight. In my opinion, the same thing is true of the Swedish multi-purpose aircraft. Will it fight? I do not know, and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization would be rather foolish to invest in an aircraft or a tank that has never been tried.

That was followed by a paper presented by Admiral Sir Peter Hill-Norton, the chairman of the Military Committee, who is also on the international staff of NATO. His paper dealt with the growing threat of the Soviet maritime forces, and the fact that since the Cuban crisis they have built what is probably the second largest navy in the world, and undoubtedly the most modern navy in the world. They are able to hold exercises at any given time in any ocean of the world simultaneously, which is causing great anxiety, especially on the northern flank of NATO, the southern flank through the Mediterranean, and the shipping routes around the Cape by which a good many supplies, including oil, for Western Europe must go because of the closing of the Suez Canal.

An item respecting energy supplies was on the agenda. I have already said a few words about that, and I do not think I should say more now.

The fifth item concerned the setting up of a subcommittee to study the southern flank. This was brought about by the conditions prevailing in Cyprus, Greece, Turkey and the Middle East, and the fact that the Soviet Union now has a marked presence in the Mediterranean with the strongest fleet that has ever entered what used to be known as "that British sea." With the new problems that are concerning NATO in this area, it was thought that a subcommittee could bring us up to date on the threat which prevails, and the action which NATO may take, or might be wise to take, towards greater protection of the southern flank.

I can only repeat that NATO has served us well. The North Atlantic Assembly is the parliamentary body of NATO, of the ministers. The Assembly to which we belong is a debating society. We have no powers, except the power to recommend. In many instances our recommendations are accepted, and in equally as many instances they are not. But the public debate that takes place in the Assembly gives parliamentarians from the various nations an opportunity to discuss with their counterparts the problems that have existed, which exist today, and which are expected to exist in the future, and to return home and endeavour to give their colleagues and their respective peoples a knowledge of NATO that will provide support in money and other ways, and thus guarantee the continuation of an organization which has been successful.

The hour is late and I shall say no more about the North Atlantic Assembly, but before concluding I should like to say a few words about our visit with our troops in Lahr and Baden.

In Lahr we now have the Fourth Canadian Mobile Brigade, which consists of the Royal 22nd Infantry Battalion, the First Royal Canadian Horse Artillery Unit and the Royal Canadian Dragoons, which is an armoured regiment. The Canadian Air Group at Baden has three squadrons equipped with F-104s.

We hear a great deal of talk, particularly in Canada, to the effect that the Canadian Forces are the best in the world. There is no doubt about that. I am not speaking as a Canadian; I am repeating what Europeans have said to me and to other delegates. They say there are no better soldiers in the world than the Canadians in Europe.

● (1600)

Many Canadians are of the opinion that our troops are not sufficiently well equipped. In some respects, that is true, but in others it is not. Let us look at the Royal 22nd Regiment, the infantry battalion.

Senator Flynn: The best in the world.

Senator McDonald: As far as the men are concerned, there is no doubt about that. If I had to run into an infantryman I would pick any one other than a member of the Royal 22nd. As far as their tracked vehicles are concerned—that is, the armoured personnel carriers, and so forth—they are first class and can compete with the equipment of any army on earth. The wheeled vehicles, however, are old. When I talk about wheeled vehicles, I refer to everything from a jeep to what they call a deuce and a half, or a two and one-half ton truck. Those vehicles are old, some of them being as old as 20 years. I must congratulate the repair and maintenance division in that these vehicles in spite of their age, are operating well. Nevertheless, the sooner we can replace those wheeled vehicles the better, but the tracked vehicles are excellent and are capable of operating against any combatant.

All of the equipment of the First Royal Canadian Horse Artillery is tracked—all of its support equipment, including ammunition carriers, kitchens, hospitals and so forth, is tracked. Again, this equipment is amongst the finest in the world. I do not think that division is in need of any new equipment. Many Canadians are not aware of that fact. Most Canadians are of the opinion that that equipment is old and worn out, but that is not true. That unit has good equipment, which is well serviced. In addition, it has well trained men to handle it.

The Royal Canadian Dragoons, which is an armoured division, has the Centurion tank. We have been told a good deal about tanks of late. I spoke in this chamber on a previous occasion about tanks. The Centurion, though it is old, is one of the best tanks on the face of the earth in 1974. Its main structure is good, and its guns are among the best in the world. There are, however, two faults, those being its Rolls Royce gas engine and the power train that goes with that engine. If the gas engine is replaced then, of course, the clutch and the rest of the power train have to be replaced. At the present time 24 Centurion tanks are being rebuilt in either Belgium or Holland. The existing motors in those tanks, as well as the power trains, are being rebuilt, so that when they are returned to the unit they will have the same motors and power trains. These rebuilt tanks will give us a capability in the tank field until 1976.

If we were to rebuild the Centurion in the manner the Israelis have, by installing diesel motors and the complementing power trains suited to the diesel motor, as well as giving it a night capability or red eye, thus allowing it to operate by both night and day, and some additional electronic equipment, it would cost in the neighbourhood of $200,000 per tank. However, we would then have a tank that is as good as anything in the field and on the horizon, until some time in the 1980s. In other words, such a refitting program would probably carry us through the next 10 or 12 years at a cost of approximately $200,000 per tank. If we were to buy new tanks, they would cost in the neighbourhood of $750,000 each.

I am one of those people who believe that you cannot fight a land battle without tanks. Many are of the opinion today that tanks came to the end of their use in the Yom Kippur war. That is utter garbage. What happened in the Yom Kippur war? Egypt crossed the Suez Canal into the Sinai Desert moving, first of all, scores of infantrymen with anti-tank weapons. When the Israelis counter-attacked they went into what they thought was a tank battle. Instead, they walked into hundreds of anti-tank weapons, with the result that they suffered colossal losses of tanks. But how would the Israelis have counteracted that thrust across the Suez Canal without tanks? How did the Israelis cross the Suez Canal and enter Egypt to the south? They did so by moving tank divisions across. There is no other way they could have done so. Without tanks, artillery and infantry divisions are of no value. How can you move infantrymen forward without an artillery barrage to knock out the enemy, and without tanks to provide protection for the infantrymen as they are moving forward? I do not think you can fight a war without tanks now any more than you could in 1940.

The Centurion tank, I repeat, modified to the extent of installing a diesel motor and the complementing power train as well as day-night capability, is one of the best tanks in the world today. And those modifications can be made without any great expenditure. I strongly recommend, when a decision is made on what to do with our forces over the next 10 years or so, that consideration be given to modernizing the Centurion tank in the way the Israelis have. The modernized Centurion tank has already proven itself to be far superior to anything the Russians now have in the field.

I want also to say a word or two about the Canadian Air Group stationed in Europe. This group is equipped with F-104s, and is involved in close support, low level flying. The F-104 is a good aircraft. There are probably better aircraft available in the world today, but our air group is quite satisfied with the F-104. They feel the F-104 can do the job as well as any other aircraft in the world today, and they are happy with it.

The sensitivity of our troops, including officers, non-commissioned officers and the enlisted men, to the problems that are confronting Canada, as well as every other Western nation in the world, today with regard to defence budgets is probably greater than our sensitivity to their problems. They understand the problems that we, as parliamentarians, are facing in endeavouring to get more dollars for better training and equipment for our troops. I think they understand the problems more than some politicians and a good many of the general public.

In conclusion, I would like to express our thanks to the officers and men that we have in Europe for the job they have done and the job they continue to do—and not only militarily, for in my view our best ambassadors abroad are the Canadian Armed Forces personnel in Europe. If we hope to improve our relations with the European Economic Community, then one of the best ways of doing it is to maintain our forces in Europe in the state of readiness we have in the past. I trust we can continue to do that in the future.

Honourable senators, I have had the opportunity of being a delegate to the North Atlantic Assembly, or the committees, for several years. I appreciate the support the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and the Whip, have given me in this regard. I cannot but feel sympathetic to the plea of Senator van Roggen who asked for continuity in the make-up of the Canadian delegation that deals with our counterparts in the EEC. I recall, when I first went to an Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly, that there were delegates from other countries who had been attending for ten or fifteen years. They were professionals in the field and, to be quite honest with you, I felt like a jackass, a rank amateur. I had had absolutely nothing to do with the military—knew nothing about them—since the end of the last World War, and here were people talking about problems, techniques, and equipment that I never heard tell of.

If Canada wants to make a maximum contribution to NATO, to have fruitful discussions with the European Economic Community and the United States, or to obtain real benefit from these various parliamentary organizations, then I strongly believe there must be continuity. I do not think the entire group should be retained year after year, but there should be a hard core of almost permanent delegates with a few new people brought in each year.

We have played a magnificent role in Europe. Our efforts have been appreciated, probably more than the efforts of any other single country. I like that. I am sure that Canadians, if they were exposed to the opportunities that I have been exposed to, would have less reason and less cause to be as niggardly as we are in the dollars we spend on the defence of our country and freedom in the Western World. I only wish it were possible for more of us to experience, on the one hand, the horrors of war, and on the other, the joy of peace.

On motion of Senator Flynn, for Senator Yuzyk, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Senator Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-15, to amend the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce Act, and had directed that the bill be reported with the following amendments:

1. Page 2: Strike out lines 10 to 12, both inclusive, and substitute therefor the following:

“(4) Except for the purposes of a prosecution under subsection (6) or (7), but subject to subsection (5)”

2. Page 2: Immediately after line 51 add the following:

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Hayden: I move, with leave of the Senate, that the report be adopted now. Before the question is put, I feel it is necessary that there should be an explanation of the purpose and scope of these amendments. These amendments were developed as a result of points raised in committee by Senator Everett, the sponsor of the bill, and they were drafted by officials of the Department of Justice. The actual scope and effect of the amendments can best be explained by Senator Everett, so I would now call upon him to give that explanation.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, as you will recall, during debate on second reading of this bill I made the point that the bill permits the examination of confidential customs documents by officials of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce designated by the minister, having taken the appropriate oath, for the purposes of import analysis. As a result of examination of this bill in committee, two amendments were proposed. The first adds clause 7, which makes it an offence for any officer who has been designated and sworn for the purposes of import analysis to use any information that he obtains from the customs invoices for speculative purposes. The second amendment adds clause 8, which prevents a court from compelling a designated officer to give evidence as a result of his examination of these confidential customs documents. I think the second amendment answers Senator Beaubien's concern that this bill, as originally drafted, might have allowed confidential customs information to be disclosed. There are now sufficient safeguards within the bill prohibiting this information from being disclosed.

Finally, in passing, I should like to briefly mention the remarks made by Senator Grosart. Senator Grosart was concerned that import analysis might act as a form of non-tariff barrier. Both Senator Buckwold and I asked the departmental officials who appeared before the committee whether or not that would be the case, and we were informed by them that import analysis is used extensively by countries such as the United Kingdom and the United States, and in no way does it offend the present rules of GATT.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I was in committee yesterday when the question dealt with by Senator Everett was discussed, and I am quite sure that in substance these amendments are improvements to the bill. However, I was not in committee this morning, as I am sure many other senators were not, since we had five committees sitting. Therefore, in order to give honourable senators, including myself and those who are not members of the committee, an opportunity of considering the amendments, I move the adjournment of the debate on the consideration of the report.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) PRESENTED

Senator Everett, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, presented the following report of the committee, to which was referred the supplementary estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1975:

Thursday, December 5, 1974.

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, to which the Supplementary Estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1975 were referred, has in obedience to the order of reference of Tuesday, November 26, 1974, examined the said Estimates and reports as follows:

1. In obedience to the foregoing, the Committee made a general examination of the Supplementary Estimates (B) and heard evidence from the Honourable J. Chrétien, President of the Treasury Board, and Mr. B. A. MacDonald, Assistant Secretary, Program Branch, Treasury Board.

2. These Supplementary Estimates total $1,749 million and bring the total Estimates tabled for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1975 to $25,951 million. It is to be noted that the original Main Estimates for the year ending March 31, 1975 total $23,296 million and have been increased by Supplementary Estimates (A) and (B) by an amount of $2,655 million, approximately 11½ per cent. For some time your Committee has been concerned about the size of the increases in the total Estimates as a result of Supplementary Estimates, but in the case of the Estimates for the year ending March 31, 1975, the increase of this magnitude is largely due to the effects of inflation. Seventy-two per cent of the total of these Supplementary Estimates (B) contain measures to combat the effects of inflation.

3. The budgetary expenditures provided in these Supplementary Estimates (B) total $1,603 million, of which $801 million represent statutory expenditures required by law. Some of the major items are:

- a) $315 million for fiscal transfers to the provinces;
- b) $172 million to meet the cost of the $500 annual increase in rates of pay granted to most Government of Canada employees effective April 1, 1974 to meet the effects of unusual rises in costs;
- c) $169 million for additional subsidies on milk for manufacturing purposes and for the beef quality premium;
- d) $118 million in payments to the railways in compensation for revenues foregone during 1974 as a result of the rate freeze; and
- e) $195 million for payment of higher interest rates on the Public Debt including bonus interest payments to holders of Canada Savings Bonds.

4. The Treasury Board has supplied your Committee with a list explaining the $1 items in the Supplementary Estimates (B).

5. A poster recently published by the Law Reform Commission was examined by your Committee. Questions were asked of the President of the Treasury Board as to whether or not this might be a frivolous expenditure of public monies. The President indicated that when such expenditures were brought to the attention of the Treasury Board they were examined by officials and this would be done in this case. The President of the Treasury Board stated that the Treasury Board reviews the budgetary requests of each department when the Main Estimates are made up and from time to time when the Supplementary Estimates are made up. It does not conduct an ongoing examination of the manner in which the budgeted expenditures are made provided they can fit within the amounts approved in the Estimates. In this respect the Treasury Board largely relies on the work of the Auditor General.

6. Your Committee is of the opinion that Treasury Board should improve its control procedures to eliminate frivolous spending, even though the expenditure might be included in the approved budgetary item. In this regard, your Committee referred the President of the Treasury Board to its report on Information Canada and most particularly to recommendations 4 and 5 of that report, which are as follows:

"In the Blue Book of Estimates, the cost of information services should be fully and clearly shown for each program of each department and for all government agencies. Treasury Board should publish a definition so that departments will know what items should be included in information services. This definition should be developed for Treasury Board by Information Canada.

Information Canada should act as the agent of the Treasury Board in screening the information budgets of all departments and agencies and advise Treasury Board regarding expenditures on information programs proposed by departments."

Your Committee is of the opinion that if the recommendations of its report on Information Canada were followed that frivolous expenditures in the information sector of government could be brought under much better control. Your Committee also drew the attention of the President of the Treasury Board to similar recommendations on the control of government expenditures in the scientific field made by the Senate Committee on Science Policy.

7. Your Committee expressed concern about the growth both in the size and cost of the manpower requirement of the Federal Government.

8. Appendix A to this report shows the growth in man-years and salaries and wages over the last five years. Authorized man-years has increased from 272,000 man-years in 1970-71 to 333,000 man-years in 1974-75. Salaries and wages have increased from $1,987 million to $3,124 million. This represents approximately 57% increase in the cost of Federal Government manpower over the last five years. These figures do not include the salaries and wages of a number of federal departments and agencies including military personnel. Your Committee has asked the Treasury Board to provide these figures for the entire manpower complement of the Federal Government.

9. Appendix B shows a comparison of the mean salaries for categories and selected groups in the Public Service between 1972-73 and 1974-75, a period of two years.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators I think it would be useful if Senator Everett gave an explanation of the report at this time.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I can save the time of the house by explaining briefly some of the highlights of the report.

First of all, supplementary estimates (B) total $1.749 billion, bringing the total expenditures so far for this fiscal year ending March 31, 1975, to $25.951 billion. I am sure you will be able to get most of the highlights out of the report itself.

There is one point that we brought up with the President of the Treasury Board. Honourable senators may have received in a cardboard tube today two copies of this poster from the Law Reform Commission. It has a blue design on it.

Senator Asselin: It is a nice colour.

Senator Flynn: There is nothing wrong with the colour.

Senator Everett: That is a matter of opinion.

Senator Lang: It makes it worse.

Senator Everett: The poster says in English and French, "Law reform concerns you." That is the extent of the language on the poster. We brought this matter to the attention of the President of the Treasury Board, because you will recall that the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance made a rather extensive report on Information Canada. In our examination we found that the information services of the federal government were costing in the neighbourhood of $200 million per year, but they were not really under anybody's control. We recommended that Information Canada, amongst other things, act as the agent of the Treasury Board in controlling expenditures on information in the federal government. We brought to the attention of the President of the Treasury Board the fact that the report existed, and as he is a new president we got his undertaking that he would read it.

We hope the government will find a way to implement the report and our recommendations.

While this poster may be a legitimate expenditure, one would rather wonder whether it is, and we would certainly have to say that an examination of this sort of expenditure on information would be useful in keeping down the cost of government.

As I say, the rest of the report is self-explanatory. There is some interesting material in the appendices to the report, relating to the increasing cost of personnel in terms of man years and salaries and wages over the last five years. I think you will find it extremely interesting.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is the honourable senator moving that the report be adopted?

Senator Everett: I so move.

Senator Flynn: No, next sitting. With the explanation that has been given we can wait until the next sitting for the motion to be put.

Senator Everett moved that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, December 10, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, before the question is put, I should like to give the usual brief outline of the work program for the next week. First of all I shall deal with the committees. On Tuesday the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will meet at 9.30 a.m. Also at 9.30 a.m. there will be a meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture to consider further Bill S-10, to amend the Feeds Act. I am informed by Senator Hayden that he is planning a meeting of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee for Tuesday also.

On Wednesday, the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will meet to continue its study of competition in Canada and of the Combines Investigation Act. The Special Senate Committee on Science Policy will meet when the Senate rises on that day.

On Thursday, our Foreign Affairs Committee will continue its examination of Canadian relations with the United States, the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will hold a meeting, and there will be a meeting of the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service.

Also, of course, should any of the bills now on the Order Paper be referred to committee, the appropriate committees will meet to deal with them.

With respect to legislation, it is expected that, in addition to the bills already before the Senate, the bill to amend the Customs Tariff will reach us by Tuesday, and we should have the bill to amend the Excise Tax Act later in the week. I am informed that the appropriation bill dealing with supplementary estimates (B) will reach the Senate on Wednesday.

I should add that the Senate will sit on Friday of next week.

Senator Flynn: Most likely.

Senator Langlois: Most likely. There is work.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL FINANCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO ENGAGE SERVICES

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be empowered to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purposes of its examination and consideration of such legislation and other matters as may be referred to it.

Motion agreed to.

INDIAN OIL AND GAS BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator McDonald for the second reading of Bill C-15, respecting oil and gas in Indian lands.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, I must first thank the sponsor for his usual good effort to explain the bill. I do not want to put the Indian sign on Senator McDonald, but we do not propose to walk Indian file behind him. I want to choose this opportunity, honourable senators, to say this about a matter that is not directly connected with this bill. I want to say that yesterday the account that we received from the honourable senator of his visit to our Canadian troops overseas and of his meeting at NATO was one of the most interesting I have heard in this chamber since my appointment in 1958.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Choquette: I cannot fully share his enthusiasm for this legislation. It purports to be for the benefit of the Indians affected, but its terms do not appear to have satisfied them. It is, of course, paternalistic in that the Indians themselves will have little or no say in the disposition of the royalties to be derived from the gas and oil, or in any related matter, and there is only one provision in the bill, namely, clause 7, which appears to provide for consultation with representatives of the Indian bands affected.

I would like to read into the record the said clause 7:

7.(1) The Minister, in administering this Act, shall consult, on a continuing basis, persons representative of the Indian bands most directly affected thereby.

(2) Notwithstanding anything herein contained, nothing in this Act shall be deemed to abrogate the rights of Indian people or preclude them from negotiating for oil and gas benefits in those areas in which land claims have not been settled.

However, the native Indian brotherhood complained before the Commons committee that there had not been full and complete discussion with them even prior to the introduction of this bill. There would appear to be no reason to believe that the consultative process will be any more effective in future as a result of clause 7. What price consultation?

I should like to read to you what was said by Mr. Linklater, one of the main spokesmen for the native Indian brotherhood, when the House of Commons Indian Affairs and Northern Development Committee were hearing representations. At page 620 of issue No. 6 of that committee's proceedings for November 5, 1974, Mr. Linklater had this to say:

We mentioned earlier the manner of consultation, and even the bands sent in a telegram, and in my conversation with them they said that the process was not completed. In the discussions that took place in Alberta there was agreement that the department would come back to all the chiefs and say that they have worked out some recommendations, which the committee, with some of their legal advisers, had been on and that they would come back once more to finish the procedure. They now tell us that that procedure in Alberta, at least, was not finished, that the people did not come back to do the wrap-up to the consultation, but, as far as our organization was concerned, that there was some discussion they had had at the time of the task force on minerals, or whatever it was called, that was travelling about the country, but to say that we sat down and worked it out and had a chance to read all the legislation proposed, et cetera, the matter was not concluded. This is not the only instance, by the way, where that has taken place, and maybe we run into difficulty in what we mean by consultation. I could also cite many other areas where we had discussions and we had joint working agreements between ourselves and the Department of Indian Affairs and then, before the matter was brought to a satisfactory conclusion, the recommendations that were then made to Parliament or to the Treasury Board, or someone else, were not the same as we had agreed upon, and this is what our complaint is about.

I believe we are entitled to some further explanations of the effect of the bill, particularly as to clause 3 thereof, which appears to validate certain regulations which were invalid to begin with. Also, I think that the very wide powers given to the Governor in Council in clause 4 in respect to oil and gas amount to a perpetuation of the paternalistic approach to Indian affairs.

Perhaps it is too much to expect that in this limited bill the government would abandon its traditional approach. Perhaps we can only hope that in the projected overall revision of the Indian Act our Indian peoples will be given a greater voice in, and some real control over, the administration of their day-to-day affairs, as well as in the pursuit of their legitimate aspirations. If we do not express confidence in them, there will be no confidence generated in them, and they will continue to be less than full and free citizens of this country.

I believe there are sufficient question marks attending this legislation to warrant its reference to committee, where the appropriate questions may be asked.

As Senator Williams usually says: "I have spoken!"

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator McDonald speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator McDonald: Honourable senators, I am quite aware of the situation that Senator Choquette has referred to. Whenever you talk about consultation, you never know exactly where you start, and you certainly have no idea where you are going to end. I suppose consultation could go on forever. I think, however, to be fair, that I should place on the record the procedure that is followed as far as consultation is concerned, because I do believe there is a limit to this process, whether it happens to be with Indian bands or with any other group in our society.

There was considerable consultation with the Indian bands before the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development took any action, or before Bill C-15, that we now have before us, was proposed. I would like to point out that no disposal of oil or gas rights may take place without the approval of the band, and the band concerned must vote on this matter before there can be any disposal or surrender of gas or oil rights. Before the band council surrenders a piece of land to be leased it is consulted about the terms of that lease. Band council approval must be received before surrender is accepted by order in council for a parcel of land, and it has been advertised. There is then further consultation. Only after the band has been consulted can an agreement be signed.

There is always band representation. The band is represented at all sales of gas and oil rights, and in many instances the department pays the expenses of the band representative who attends these sales. Then, after the prices have been offered at the sale, there is further consultation with the band council to get their approval before an agreement can be entered into and signed.

Honourable senators, I could go on in this way, but I think, as Senator Choquette has suggested, this bill should be sent to committee. There the departmental officials will be available to answer, far better than I can, questions posed by Senator Choquette and others. I simply wanted to place on record the statement that the department in the past has never dealt, nor does it intend to deal in the future, with Indian lands insofar as oil and gas are concerned without full cooperation from and full consultation with the bands concerned. Perhaps Senator Choquette's remarks referred to Indians residing outside of bands who were owners of tracts of land to be leased. I cannot say about that situation, but I do know that where an Indian band resides on a property or owns a property to be leased, there has been and will continue to be full consultation.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator McDonald: Honourable senators, I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

The Hon. the Speaker: Should it not be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science?

Senator McDonald: Honourable senators, if you look at the responsibilities assigned to each of our committees under our rules you will find that normally the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science deals with matters concerning Indians. However, matters assigned to our Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce include royalties and natural resources. This bill deals with royalties and moneys being transferred to Indian bands, and for that reason I think that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is the appropriate committee.

Motion agreed to and bill referred to Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

FIRE LOSSES REPLACEMENT ACCOUNT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator McDonald for second reading of Bill C-18, to amend the Fire Losses Replacement Account Act.

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, knowing that Senator McDonald has had many years of experience, both in the provincial legislature and in this house, it is quite obvious that he has the ability to summarize with facility and clarity a bill such as the one we are discussing.

In speaking briefly to this bill, I should like to say that I have perused the limited debate on this bill in the other place and also the pertinent discussions in their Indian Affairs and Northern Development Committee. Those discussions were very limited and the bill was passed without amendment.

The Fire Losses Replacement Account Act was enacted speedily in 1954, encountering very little opposition in Parliament. The purpose of the measure was to establish a fire losses replacement account in the consolidated revenue fund. When a loss occurs through fire and the replacement or repair of the destroyed or damaged property is urgently required, the fund provides the necessary amount of money for that repair or replacement. Treasury Board must approve any withdrawals from the fund, and such approval is given only when there is not sufficient money available in the appropriation for the department suffering the loss.

A government hospital, a customs office, a fish hatchery or a garage housing government automotive equipment may be destroyed by fire. Such property must be replaced immediately if essential services are to be maintained with the least possible disruption. The act is intended to cover such situations. When such an incident occurs, the balance available in the appropriation for the particular service concerned might be insufficient to cover the costs of repairs, because such an item had not been foreseen in the estimates. Even contingency votes in the estimates of a department, when such exist, might not provide enough to replace property destroyed by fire.

Without the Fire Losses Replacement Account, necessary repairs could have to be postponed until Parliament approves the disbursement. The delays in such a procedure are obvious. However, such delays could occur even though Parliament voted the original allotment for the erection of the property. Parliament would also have voted annually a certain amount for the upkeep of the property. Should that sum prove inadequate for the replacement of the property, the fund can be resorted to in urgent circumstances. Funds from the account are advanced temporarily on the understanding that the amount will be recouped subsequently by charges to the appropriation for the service concerned.

There is authority in the Financial Administration Act for the use of Governor General's warrants authorizing payments out of the consolidated revenue fund when accidents occur and money for repair or renewal of property is urgently required. However, such a procedure is available only when Parliament is not in session, or is adjourned sine die or for a period of more than two weeks. There is no such restriction in the Fire Losses Replacement Account Act.

At present the act authorizes advances from the fire losses replacement account for the restoration, rebuilding or repair of property under the administration or control of government departments. Bill C-18 would extend the application of the act to property used by the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

We on this side of the house feel that, in view of the clarity of the explanation of the sponsor, we would like to see this bill passed as soon as possible.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator McDonald: Honourable senators, there does not seem to be any desire to have this bill referred to committee. That being the case, I would move that the bill be read the third time at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT NARCOTIC CONTROL ACT CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Joan Neiman moved the second reading of Bill S-19, to amend the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Criminal Code.

She said: Honourable senators, on Tuesday of last week the government introduced Bill S-19 in this chamber, by which it proposes to transfer the legislative provisions relating to cannabis from the Narcotic Control Act to the Food and Drugs Act and, in order to regulate those provisions more appropriately, to make certain amendments to the Criminal Code. I cannot stress too strongly that this bill does not make possession of the substance Cannabis sativa legal, nor will it, I am sure, when the implications of these proposals are studied and fully understood, tend to encourage in any way the use of the substance in any of its forms.

You will see, honourable senators, that this bill retains stringent penalties for the offences of trafficking in cannabis, and possession for the purpose of trafficking, cultivation, importation and exportation of cannabis. It contains no extraordinary departures from the carefully considered position which the government took with respect to the use and control of cannabis, and which it stated publicly on July 31, 1972 through the then Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Honourable John Munro. I should like to review very briefly the background to that statement of policy and to this bill which it embodies.

Honourable senators will recall that, because of the growing concern in Canada over a steadily increasing incidence of the non-medical use of drugs and other substances, with all the social implications which flow therefrom, the government appointed a commission on May 29, 1969, under the chairmanship of Dean Gerald LeDain of Osgoode Hall Law School, to inquire into the non-medical use of a wide range of psychotropic drugs. The commission was given broad terms of reference and directions to make recommendations, as a result of its findings, on actions the government might take, either on its own or in conjunction with other levels of government, to reduce the dimensions of the problems involved in such use.

After a most intensive and extensive review of the material and evidence then available, the LeDain commission published its interim report in April 1970, in which there is a detailed analysis of the use of cannabis and of its apparent effects on users. Later, in May 1972, it published a substantial volume on cannabis alone, while its final report, which was published in December 1973, contains the commission's final conclusions and recommendations with respect to cannabis as well as other drugs. It also published a fourth volume on treatment, with which we need not be concerned in considering this bill.

There can be no argument that the LeDain commission had conducted a most thorough and comprehensive examination of the drug problem in Canada. It offered carefully documented, rational arguments for the conclusions it drew and the recommendations it made. Nevertheless, the reactions to its recommendations, particularly with regard to cannabis and, above all, marihuana—which is by far the most commonly used of all drugs—ran the gamut from acceptance to grudging acquiescence and then to rejection, on the one hand because they appeared too lenient, and on the other hand because they appeared too severe.

It is highly dangerous to attempt to over-simplify a very technical and complex matter but, if I may venture to do so, the commission came to the conclusion in its interim report, on the basis of all the evidence and research then available to it, that the moderate use of cannabis did not appear to have any excessively dangerous or lasting ill effects. Nevertheless, it would appear that as a result of its further in-depth study in preparation of its special report on cannabis, and the accumulation of further research over the two-and-half-year period which transpired until the publication of its final report, the general attitude of the commission toward cannabis became somewhat more cautious and restrained.

Finally, it must be said that while there was not complete agreement among the five members of the commission, three of them, including the chairman, did give a majority opinion, while a fourth, Dean Ian Campbell, differed in his recommendations in some small degree only with regard to the simple possession of marihuana. The fifth member, Miss Marie-Andrée Bertrand, took an entirely different approach in recommending that the use of cannabis be legalized and controlled in a way similar to that which we now employ for alcohol.

I believe the lack of complete agreement on the part of the commissioners was indicative of society's dilemma. Their interim report, made public in June 1970, was an important document, not so much because of the solutions it suggested but because it served as a lightning rod for the emotionalism and polarization which had dominated attitudes to drug abuse in general, and the use of cannabis in particular.

The cannabis report in 1972 received international acclaim for its thoroughness, reasonableness and accuracy, and it was accepted in an atmosphere of much less dogmatic opinion and overreaction than existed when the commission first began its work. Today, in part because of the commission, there is less misinformation and overreaction in Canada, although there probably never can be complete public agreement on the issues involved in drug use or abuse. I do believe, however, that there is now enough common ground to reach a satisfactory consensus, one that would not have been possible four years ago.

Honourable senators will recall that while the commissioners themselves were not in complete agreement in their recommendations with respect to cannabis, they did arrive at complete consensus that cannabis did not belong under the Narcotic Control Act; that its presence in that act undermined the credibility of drug legislation in this country; and that the system of mandatory severe sentences for simple possession under the Narcotic Control Act was out of proportion to the seriousness of the offence.

I might say that that is one area in which all the commissioners agreed in their recommendations—that the act of simple possession should not be considered an offence. As honourable senators will see from the bill, that is not a position with which the government can now agree.

The government has accepted the pharmacological fact that Cannabis sativa is not a narcotic, nor is it as potent a substance as heroin. For that reason, the bill removes it from the Narcotic Control Act and places control of the substance in a new section of the Food and Drugs Act. I might add, that is the act under which we have other equally or more dangerous substances, such as LSD.

While this bill seeks to make the legal characterization of Cannabis sativa more realistic, both pharmacologically and in terms of the credibility of the law, this will not in any way derogate from Canada's international obligations or domestic commitments with respect to cannabis.

Canada is a signatory to the 1961 Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs, which places upon us an obligation to control cannabis and other drugs from both domestic and international standpoints. The government remains firm in its intention, which it enunciated in its policy statement in 1972, not to legalize possession of cannabis in any form and, although the effect of this bill will be to lessen the impact of the law for the offence of simple possession, simple possession nevertheless remains an offence.

I emphasize these points because I want to make certain that no one misunderstands or misinterprets what this bill does. I do not want persons who are against any use of marihuana or hashish, or any drug, to mistakenly believe that Cannabis sativa is being made legal; it is not. On the other hand, I do not want proponents of the use of the substance to claim that this bill condones the use of cannabis, or somehow gives it a clean bill of health. The bill does neither of these things. It is designed to continue to restrict availability and use of cannabis, but to provide a greater flexibility in the enforcement and administration of the law regarding the simple possession of it.

I believe there is general acceptance that the law has been unnecessarily harsh on persons involved with simple possession. Much has been said and written about this, especially about the severe penalties imposed on many young persons. That is why this bill modifies penalties for simple possession.

I am in possession of some statistics. I shall not give them in any great detail, but they are provided by the Health Protection Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare. They are statistics on which all law enforcement agencies rely to obtain a total picture of the use and abuse of drugs across Canada. The RCMP has its own statistics, but this department collates, or puts together, the various statistics.

It might be of interest to honourable senators to know, with regard to simple possession, that last year there were 18,603 convictions for simple possession of marihuana or cannabis. The number of those who went beyond that in the use of cannabis—in other words, were involved in trafficking or possession for the purpose of trafficking—was 19,929. So there were roughly 1,300 more convictions for the serious offences related to the use of cannabis. The point is that of the 18,603 convictions for simple possession, the courts imposed fines of one kind or another in 13,170 cases, or, roughly, in 70.8 per cent of the cases.

The courts also made use of the provisions in our acts regarding probation, absolute discharge and conditional discharge in some 4,500 cases. A relatively small number of convicted persons were given jail sentences by the courts.

The figure to keep in mind is that of all convictions, 9,504 persons were under the age of 20; in other words, roughly one-half of all convictions were of persons under that age.

There is one other figure that perhaps honourable senators should keep in mind. Last year it was estimated that this year well over one million people in Canada will have used, or tried to use, cannabis. I am not referring to those who constantly use it, but those who will have tried some form of cannabis. So the law is, in effect, reaching perhaps one per cent of those who try this drug. That explains to a certain extent why the government is trying to achieve a more balanced and rational approach to this problem.

In the case of a charge of simple possession, a prosecutor will not, under this proposed legislation, have a choice as to the manner in which he shall proceed. Under the Narcotic Control Act as it now stands, the prosecutor has no choice other than to proceed by way of indictment. This bill provides that the offence be dealt with by way of summary conviction only, and it sets out the limits of a possible jail sentence, which can be imposed by a court only in default of payment of a fine. It limits the amounts of any fines imposed, as well as the length of jail sentences in default of payment of any fine, with respect to first and subsequent offences.

While the government is deeply conscious of the fact that many conscientious and concerned citizens take an opposing point of view, there has been a great deal of criticism that penalties for other offences involving cannabis have been too harsh. That is why, for example, this bill proposes to alter the former mandatory penalty of life imprisonment for conviction, on indictment, of trafficking to a maximum of 10 years, or, upon summary conviction, to a fine of up to $1,000, or up to 18 months imprisonment, or both.

Bill S-19 introduces a further flexibility in the administration of the law regarding cannabis in that it provides an option to prosecutors of recommending to a court that it deal summarily in respect of charges involving trafficking, possession for the purpose of trafficking, cultivation, import or export. Charges of this nature, without this proposed legislation, can be dealt with only by way of indictment. Here, again, I think the government is trying to differentiate between cases where someone may be caught coming across the border with two, three, or even half a dozen cigarettes, and the person who is, in fact, importing on a large scale for purposes of trafficking.

This bill maintains stringent penalties in respect of convictions for importing or exporting. The maximum sentence on conviction by way of indictment is 14 years, and the minimum is three years. This retains the deterrent intent against dealing in drugs, while providing punishment for those who do so. However, as honourable senators will note, if a person convicted on indictment establishes that he imported or exported the cannabis for his own consumption only, the minimum three-year term does not apply.

Senator Choquette: Perhaps the sponsor of this bill would explain the difference between a summary conviction and a conviction on indictment for those laymen who do not practise law. I am sure a good many people are not aware of the difference.

Senator Neiman: On summary conviction, the provincial court judge himself proceeds to deal with the offence and, of course, sentences on summary conviction are much less severe than those that might be imposed on conviction by indictment. Also, if the prosecutor decides to proceed by way of indictment, then a somewhat more formal and lengthy proceeding follows. If the prosecutor decides to proceed by way of indictment, then the accused person may elect to be tried by a magistrate without a jury, or by a judge without a jury, or by a court composed of a judge and a jury. As I said, this proceeding generally results in much more severe sentences. It follows that an indictment is generally used where the offence is considered to be a serious one involving, perhaps, a more complex prosecution.

I trust that that explanation meets Senator Choquette's request. If it is deficient in any respect, it is because I am not really a criminal lawyer.

Another point which I think should be brought to the attention of honourable senators is that a more severe penalty is provided under this bill than is the case under the Narcotic Control Act in respect of conviction for the offence of cultivation. The reason for that, of course, is that the government is becoming increasingly aware of the ease with which people can now cultivate cannabis in their backyards or on their farms for purposes of distribution or sale.

While some may feel that these provisions are too light, I think one has to keep in perspective the relative dangerous qualities of this particular drug and other drugs, such as LSD, speed and heroin. There are, of course, much more severe penalties in respect of conviction for offences relating to those drugs. There are also far greater social implications in respect of offences in relation to those drugs as they relate to the full range of crimes. So that society, generally, takes a much more serious view of offences involving such drugs as LSD, speed, heroin, and so forth. I think in that context the penalties proposed in Bill S-19 in respect of cannabis are sufficiently severe to serve as a deterrent, and provide us with a measure of how the particular offences dealt with under this bill compare with all other offences.

Senator Greene: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Neiman: Yes, certainly.

Senator Greene: As I recall, the interim report of the LeDain commission found alcohol to be the main drug problem in Canada. Yet, some offences involving alcohol are still treated as a crime under the Criminal Code. Is there any reason why alcohol is not being treated in the same manner as cannabis? Why should a person who commits an offence involving alcohol have a criminal record, while the person who commits an offence involving cannabis is to be dealt with under the Food and Drugs Act?

[Senator Neiman.]

Senator Neiman: An individual committing any of the offences set out in this bill will have a criminal record, senator, unless the court takes advantage of its discretion to grant a conditional or unconditional discharge.

The public has criticized some practices in relation to personal searches of persons suspected of carrying drugs. Under this bill, a law officer can conduct a search of a person only when he or she reasonably suspects that that person is in possession of an illicit substance. This reasonable suspicion would not extend to indiscriminate searches upon a number of persons who happened to find themselves involved in a police drug raid. A police officer acting beyond his authority in this regard could be subject to civil proceedings.

Honourable senators, I submit that Bill S-19 would give prosecutors a selection of legal procedures better suited to deal with particular offences in respect of cannabis, while providing further protection to accused persons against misinterpretation or misunderstanding of the law. I have already mentioned—and we are all aware of this—the still rapidly increasing use of marihuana. You may have seen the report in this morning's Globe and Mail of a study released by the Narcotic Addiction Research Foundation in Toronto. That report mentions that the use of cannabis is continuing to increase but, strangely enough, in the slightly older group of people—I think in the group over age 25. However, they still represent a fairly small portion of the total number using this substance.

Although the government will continue to treat the use of cannabis as an offence, it is deeply concerned, as we all must be, with the distressing social and legal consequences which fall particularly on young offenders and their families, and which can perhaps unalterably affect the lives of those youngsters.

Juveniles can, of course, be dealt with more leniently and with more flexibility in our juvenile courts, but our adult courts also have had alternative dispositions available to them—in effect to make the punishment more appropriately fit the crime.

Senator Davey: Would the honourable senator permit a question? She referred to an article in this morning's Globe and Mail. I may have missed something, in which case I apologize, but I would like to know whether the article contained any information on the use of alcohol by teenagers.

Senator Neiman: No, it dealt essentially with the use of cannabis in the schools.

Senator Davey: I saw the article, and I thought there was some reference to alcohol.

Senator Neiman: I am sorry, there was—to the extent that in its use by what I may call the younger age group, the teenagers, they seem to be switching over to alcohol to some extent rather than staying with marihuana. I have the article here, and I know it does make the point that there seems to be a move from marihuana to alcohol.

Senator Choquette: Would you say that is farther on the way when going on a "trip"—that is, graduating from cannabis to alcohol?

Senator Neiman: I would not, no. I think it is just that the teenagers seem to think that having a beer is more the thing to do these days than smoke a bit of pot.

The Criminal Law Amendments Act, which became law on July 15, 1972, makes it possible for judges to direct that a convicted person be discharged absolutely or under probation conditions. A person who receives this kind of discharge is not considered to have been convicted of the offence. We also have the Criminal Records Act, under which any person convicted of offences involving cannabis is eligible to apply for pardon after prescribed periods of good behaviour.

While this bill would alter penalties respecting cannabis offences so that they are not excessive, let me stress again, honourable senators, that they are still penalties. They are still vital to the entire process of discouraging the use of the drug as much as possible, but one wonders, after reading this article this morning, whether in fact any of these approaches will solve this very large problem. I believe we have to face the fact that there will always be those who choose to use, or at least to try, some form of cannabis, but this bill emphasizes the government's determination to control availability of the substance by dealing severely with those who attempt to promote its use in any way in our society.

This determination to restrict as much as possible the availability of cannabis reflects the concern the government shares with many Canadians that long-term heavy use of the substance may have several kinds of serious consequences, physical and mental. The cannabis report of the LeDain commission documented these concerns more than two years ago, and research since then has done nothing to relieve those concerns. I must hasten to add that research has not proven that long-term heavy use of cannabis does cause serious physical and mental consequences. Nevertheless, the government is aware that much more study, lasting perhaps for several years, is needed before anyone, or any group of experts, will be able to bring in a verdict. That is one reason why this bill does not make possession of cannabis legal.

Let me describe briefly some of the unanswered questions about the effects cannabis may have, to illustrate why the government is being cautious in the legislative changes it proposes.

The frustrating aspect, for us as legislators, of dealing with these unanswered research questions is that highly trained experts with years of specialized experience are amassing contradictory bodies of evidence, and coming to contradictory conclusions. I recall reading in the final report that the commission had collected over 2,600 papers and documents, out of many more hundreds it has looked at and studied, simply to commence a library on cannabis alone. This is just a small portion of the work and research that has been done on this particular drug.

Obviously, we would like them to tell us the simple truth about cannabis. But the simple truth is that as yet there is no simple truth, and we are left with the problem of formulating legislation that will make sense in an area where challenge, contradiction and refutation seem to be occurring in the scientific community.

For one thing, there is no conclusive evidence that cannabis use results in chromosome abnormalities which could have adverse effects on an unborn child. There have, however, been studies which indicate the substance has had adverse effects in unborn rodents. Effects such as these cannot be extrapolated from animal experimentation to humans. However, it would be foolhardy for any pregnant woman to use cannabis, at least during the first three months, during which time a wide variety of chemical substances are known to affect adversely development of the foetus.

Under certain experimental conditions, it has been shown that cannabis intoxication can distort perception and impair cognitive and psychomotor functions. Such effects can be seen with moderate doses of the drug, and tend to be more apparent when complex tasks such as operating machinery are performed. I have recently read of experiments which indicate that cannabis tends to impair motor functions in most people in much the same manner, and to much the same degree, as would a comparable amount of alcohol. The most disturbing finding, however, is that the ingesting of both of those drugs at the same time or sequentially tends to have a much greater cumulative effect than had been anticipated. In other words, one and one do not necessarily add up to two; it could be three in terms of negative reaction. This, of course, has serious implications for drivers of automobiles.

Researchers are widely divided in their opinions regarding whether long-term cannabis use can cause brain damage. Some claim that long-term heavy use of cannabis can produce apathetic, sloppy-appearing beings who seem to be mentally dull, confused and have poor memories. More worrisome are a few observations that heavy cannabis users do not always seem to return to complete normalcy even many months after use has stopped. This has resulted in contentions that the drug may cause irreversible brain changes. Such claims are vigorously disputed by other experts, leaving us as legislators with no clear idea of the real extent of the danger.

Another area of health concern relates to the possibility of the smoking of cannabis causing lung cancer. While no evidence has yet been provided which would tend to substantiate such a result, it seems logical to assume that cannabis tars are at least as harmful as tobacco tars, and we should all be aware of their demonstrated record of harm.

Another long-term concern includes a general agreement by many, adults at least, that regular use of cannabis by adolescents probably has a harmful effect on the maturing process. The special nature of some psychedelic experiences that can result from cannabis use may leave a psychological mark on a 12- or 13-year old. As the cannabis report of the LeDain commission noted:

It seems completely unrealistic to assume that adolescents, beginning as early as the age of twelve, can persistently resort to cannabis intoxication... without seriously interfering with development of the capacity to cope with reality that is an essential part of the process of maturation.

Finally, much has been said and will be said in an attempt to prove or disprove the idea that the use of cannabis invariably, or almost always, leads to the use of more potent drugs—notably heroin. It must be conceded that for many people cannabis use is another part of a complex pattern of drug-using behaviour, and that experimentation with one drug might reduce inhibitions about trying other drugs. That possibility alone, honourable senators, should be a sobering thought.

After a great deal of research on this matter, the LeDain commission came to the conclusion, however, that the progression of use from cannabis to heroin was relatively infrequent—and I stress “relatively”—and the statistics we have would seem to confirm this observation.

I refer again to the table I have before me, and I quote the figures for just the year 1973. The total number of convictions involving cannabis under the Narcotic Control Act was 19,929. The total number of convictions for all drug offences under the Narcotic Control Act was 21,469. In other words there were approximately 1,500 convictions for other offences—convictions for offences involving heroin.

The commission noted that the progression from amphetamines to heroin appeared to be much more frequent. One reason suggested, among many complex reasons, was that users of amphetamines—for instance, those who shoot speed—had overcome their fear or distaste of using a needle, and so it was a relatively small hurdle for them to try heroin.

At this point we should not be stampeded into a panicky response by what are admittedly real and unsolved problems. We must try to keep some sort of perspective when considering the results of scientific experiments which are continuing, a perspective which places the relative risks of cannabis use alongside the potential harm of many other drugs—and it is generally considered alcohol and tobacco are both far more dangerous when used excessively—and many other activities which are legally condoned and often highly regarded by our society.

It is worthwhile to emphasize that the existing laws respecting cannabis have not prevented many thousands—in fact, millions—from using the substance, to experiment, to defy authority, or whatever the user's reasons may have been. But far more than that number have not used the substance simply because they respect the law as the law, not because the penalties are severe or moderate. These people—and they are the majority—are unwilling to transgress the laws of the land because they regard the law as an important force in society, and these people will observe and hold this new form of the law in as high regard as they held the former law.

I do not think, honourable senators, that we should expect this bill to alter overnight the ratio of use and non-use. I do not think we should expect this bill to answer, or anticipate the answers, to questions about long-term effects of cannabis. The government is always prepared to modify its stand in either direction as further expert evidence is adduced, either with regard to considerations of health or as to the efficacy of the penal sanctions it is proposing. We should not, I submit, attempt to interpret, to extrapolate, to mould the myriad findings of scientific research to suit our personal opinions. We can expect this bill, however, to embody our concerns about cannabis in the law at the same time as it makes possible more fitting, just and credible legal responses to offences involving cannabis. We are trying to keep Canadians from doing themselves harm; we are not trying to impose our iron will on an unwilling populace.

In conclusion, the government fully recognizes the potential for harm in the use of cannabis. It will continue to encourage and to undertake further research in this direction. The thrust of this bill, however, is to rationalize the penalties in accordance with what the government considers the various offences with respect to cannabis should bear. I would hope, therefore, that if and when this bill is passed on second reading it will be referred to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. I am sure all honourable senators will want to hear from Dr. LeDain and members of his commission as to how their conclusions may have been altered or reinforced by further research and knowledge gained since the publication of their final report. It would also be most instructive to hear from the various law enforcement agencies, including the RCMP and members of the judiciary, as to their experiences and opinions in enforcing the law as it presently stands, and as it is proposed to be changed.

There are undoubtedly other individuals and organizations whose testimony would be invaluable. I suggest that honourable senators, after they have had an opportunity to hear those people and to study the material that will be provided, will be able to reach their own informed decision with respect to the ramifications of this bill. It merits the earnest consideration of this house.

Hon. Joseph A. Sullivan: Honourable senators, if the hour is not too late, I would like to make my contribution to this debate now, and I ask the Leader of the Government if I may do so.

Senator Perrault: I am delighted.

Senator Sullivan: Honourable senators, in rising to participate in this debate, I speak primarily as a medical man. After listening to the sponsor of the bill, with the compilation of medical statistics she gave us, I was wondering whether her training had been in law or medicine. I congratulate her on what she said, but that does not necessarily mean that I agree with what she said.

The use of soft drugs leads almost inevitably to the use of hard drugs. There is no such thing as “simple possession of marihuana,” I would remind Senator Neiman. They are all either passing it on, or proselytizing. Furthermore, I am in favour of the death penalty for heroin traffickers. You now know exactly where I stand.

This is a medical problem, in the main. I question very much the knowledge of the average member of Parliament in this particular field. I interject that one remark primarily in the interests of the Senate. For years I have sat here and been insulted by certain people in the other place. When the government saw fit—and I congratulate the Leader of the Government on this—to have this legislation introduced in the Senate, a member of the other place again moved that the Senate be abolished. I sincerely trust that when I get through this dissertation, and when we have dealt with this bill, the people of Canada will know that it is not this house that should be abolished.

Before I discuss this legislation, let me read three headlines which appeared in the papers after the government announced it was going to introduce it. Listen to this headline from the Globe and Mail of November 27—Bill to End Jail for Pot Possession. What does that mean? Just imagine what it conjures up in the minds of habitual users. And listen to this headline from the Toronto Star—Ottawa Proposes Softer Sentences for Marihuana. Still another headline is: Ottawa Softening Marihuana Sentence.

In reading the report of the Commission of Inquiry into the Non-Medical Use of Drugs, which the sponsor of the bill quoted freely, and looking over the names of the members of that commission, I find that it was made up of lawyers, a psychiatrist and a director of social agencies. The only medical man was the psychiatrist.

The Dean of Arts of Sir George Williams University, Montreal, wrote the dissenting report in which he stated at page 311:

I must dissent from the recommendation that the prohibition of the simple possession of cannabis be repealed and from part of the recommendation concerning cultivation.

At page 315 he stated:

I must dissent from the recommendation of the majority of my colleagues and recommend that the prohibition on the possession of cannabis be maintained, for the time being at least. Possession of cannabis should be punishable upon summary conviction by a fine of $25.00 for the first offence and by a fine of $100.00 for any subsequent offence.

And:

—with respect to the cultivation of cannabis other than for purposes of trafficking, I recommend that it continue to be an offence with penalties identical to those which I recommend for simple possession.

As a medical man, honourable senators, I fully concur with those conclusions. A clear knowledge of our relationship to our fellow creatures and to the work of life is indispensable. One of the first essentials in securing a good-natured equanimity is not to expect too much of the people among whom you dwell. Knowledge comes, but wisdom lingers.

In a historical address one of the most distinguished medical men of this century, the late Sir William Osler, made the following statement:

I thought I could hear the voice of that great and good friend of mankind who in times of chaos still stoically counsels the cultivation of those virtues that most efficaciously contribute to the commonest of minds and to liberating people from their inherent terrors often as unnecessary as the terrors of the year 1000 were for people in the Middle Ages.

He stated that the supreme criterion for any man and for all mankind was equanimity, and he described it as one of man's most marvellous words, aequus animus, that is, an even anima or soul, a spirit that always keeps its water level through the wise combination of the levers and faucets that control this emotion.

This problem, honourable senators, is a medical problem. Let there be no mistake about that. The very latest scientific research information on this drug has stated in unequivocal terms that laboratory studies suggest that marihuana smoking interferes with reproduction, disease resistance and basic biologic processes.

I have gone into this problem extensively with the appropriate departments of the Faculty of Medicine of the University of Toronto, particularly the Medical Research Department. I have discussed it with people in medicine, pharmacology and pharmacy, and with the Director of Scientific Research of the Canadian Medical Association, Dr. J. S. Bennett.

Research conducted during the past four years in the Department of Pharmacology at the University of Toronto under Professor Kalow, Ph.D., M.D., head of the department, and Dr. Kalant, in conjunction with the Addiction Research Foundation of Ontario, has produced a number of potentially important findings with respect to the short- and long-term hazards of cannabis use. I will abstract these scientific findings in five paragraphs.

First, metabolic interactions with other drugs. Some of the ingredients of cannabis, especially cannabidiol and cannabigerol, are potent inhibitors of the reactions by which barbiturates, minor tranquilizers and numerous other drugs are inactivated in the liver. As a result, simultaneous use of cannabis will greatly prolong the duration of action of these drugs, whether in young persons, middle-aged or old.

Second, interactions with other drugs in the brain. The major active ingredient of cannabis, tetrahydrocannabinol, now labelled THC, has been shown to enhance greatly the effect of a given dose of alcohol on psychomotor performance. This is in accord with the work of Rafelsen et al in Denmark, and Manno et al in the United States, and the university's reports to the Le Dain Commission in Canada, concerning the greatly increased impairment in real or simulated driving skill when alcohol and marihuana are used together, compared to the effects of either one alone.

Third, tar content of cannabis smoke. This is where I disagree most vigorously with the sponsor of the bill, and I have here in an article the authenticated, proven research work on it. By analysis of smoke obtained from marihuana cigarettes, under a wide range of combustion conditions, it has been found that the smoke contains nearly 50 per cent more tar than the smoke of one of the highest-tar tobacco cigarettes, and eight to ten times that of the lowest-tar tobacco cigarettes. Since marihuana smokers are almost invariably tobacco smokers as well, a heavy marihuana smoker would add significantly to the risk of bronchopulmonary damage—in other words, bronchogenic carcinoma—already posed by the tobacco use.

Fourth, the persistence of THC in the body. Again this is another fact authenticated and proven. By the use of radioactively labelled THC, we have found that, after a single dose, measurable traces of the drug persist in the body for as long as 48 hours, especially in the fat. Therefore, daily use would probably lead to gradual build-up of body levels, and a more or less continuous state of partial intoxication. Clinical observations suggest that this may indeed happen in heavy users, and the following experiments on learning by laboratory animals are consistent with it. The details are in that article.

And, fifth, the effects of cannabis on learning. In this final aspect of the investigation by these distinguished scientists, I believe Senator Davey's question is answered—and I should point out to him that a publication is coming out shortly on the effects of alcohol on young people. Dealing with the effects of cannabis on learning, it was found that when rats were given a single dose of cannabis extract daily, they showed marked impairment of appetite, reduced activity, and enhanced effect of alcohol, as mentioned earlier. After periods ranging from one to four weeks they developed tolerance to all these effects. However, they showed impaired learning ability which not only persisted but grew more marked as the cannabis administration continued. When the drug was stopped after three months, the learning ability gradually returned to normal. But if the daily dose was continued for six months the learning impairment became permanent. It became permanent. This is the important point—if the daily dosage continued for six months the learning impairment became permanent.

From these results these investigators concluded that if cannabis use becomes widespread the heaviest regular users will incur a variety of risks, including increased hazard of automobile accidents, increased risk of overdose effects from a variety of other drugs, increased risk of lung disease—including bronchogenic carcinoma—and possibly permanently impaired learning or memory. From surveys carried out by the Addiction Research Foundation, as well as by the Le Dain commission and the Shafer Commission in the United States, it is estimated that possibly 5 per cent of users might fall into this category.

In what I propose to say now I shall be digressing—and transgressing, as it were—for a moment into the legal aspects of the subject. In assessing the functions of the law, one must bear in mind the fact that the imposition of legal sanctions carries a social and economic cost in the form of the police and judicial activities entailed, and the personal hardship experienced by those convicted and punished for infractions of the law. On the other hand, all experience in this and other countries has shown that legal restrictions do deter many people who would otherwise use drugs. Even prohibition, though it was considered a failure for other reasons, did effectively reduce the total consumption of alcohol and the death rate from alcoholism. Therefore, the question to be decided in relation to any proposed reduction in legal sanctions against cannabis use is whether the reduction in social and economic costs of application of the law will be greater than, equal to, or less than the social and medical costs arising from increased use of the drug.

In attempting to decide that question, the Senate may find it useful to consider three subsidiary questions:

(1) will it be seen as discriminatory that imprisonment will be retained for those who are unable to pay fines imposed on them, but not for those who can afford to pay the fines?

(2) while the reduction in penalties for possession of cannabis may alleviate some of the social costs arising from enforcement of the law, is it necessary to link this with reduction of maximum penalties for trafficking? Does society need to show any special compassion for the large-scale trafficker of cannabis compared to the large-scale trafficker of any other illicit drug?

(3) Since the knowledge of the long term effects of cannabis use will obviously increase with time, and the balance of relative costs arising from law enforcement and from heavy drug use will become easier to assess, would it be worth while to make any changes in the law initially on a trial basis, as was done for repeal of capital punishment? If this were obligatorily linked to a monitoring of the costs of the law, the extent of cannabis use, and a follow-up of the effects on known users, the definitive legislative decision at the end of the trial period would be assured of a sounder basis.

The Canadian Medical Association recommended the transfer of marihuana and hashish to the Food and Drugs Act over five years ago. In the interim period a considerable number of casual users of marihuana have suffered jail sentences, and will continue to suffer from a criminal record resulting from same, which this association believes is most inappropriate.

The transfer of marihuana and hashish to Schedule H of the Food and Drugs Act, while a step in the right direction, does not solve the problem of casual users of these products obtaining and suffering from a criminal record. While it is not a Canadian Medical Association position in an official way, I believe I would be accurately interpreting the CMA's position and policy on this subject when I say that an amendment—and I intend to move a few in committee—should be made to this legislation whereby after an appropriate period of time—say, two or three years—the criminal record of an individual found guilty of so-called simple possession of marihuana would be erased. This of course would be conditional on appropriate behaviour—“the lack of being convicted of a second offence”. Personally, I think this is a very important matter.

If my interpretation is correct, there is latitude provided in this legislative change for lesser penalties for trafficking. At no time has the Canadian Medical Association made any such suggestion. Indeed, they indicated that they did not have the expertise to offer opinions on this matter, but they have stated that there is need for review and clarification of the legal definition of “trafficking,” and “possession for the purpose of trafficking.” Hence, I think it is most wise that this bill go to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

It is the opinion of the Canadian Medical Association that the legal definitions of “trafficking” and “possession for the purpose of trafficking” should be reviewed and clarified; and that control of psychedelic drugs, cannabis products and similar substances, and the legal machinery for dealing with users, be health-oriented—that is, the Food and Drugs Act as opposed to the Narcotic Control Act, pending review of the current pertinent legislation.

There is still a climate of argument, contradiction, and indecisiveness over the physical, psychological and social ramifications of the use of marihuana, and no answer appears to be just over the horizon.

It is of importance to develop effective methods of prevention and education that are likely to deter individuals of all backgrounds, and at all levels of risk, from adopting pernicious patterns of drug use, whether of marihuana or other drugs abused in our society. To do so we need to better understand the factors in our own and other cultures which help to socially control drug use and to inhibit drug abuse. Although research in these areas frequently lacks the precision possible in laboratory sciences, it may prove to be in the end the most important in averting drug abuse and its health consequences. Such research should certainly include a better understanding of those aspects of individuals' lives that serve to make drug abuse less attractive, and provide tenable alternatives to drug use.

I now wish, honourable senators, to put on the record of this house a most valuable and important piece of research work. Bandura, of Stanford University, and his associates have found a genetic anomaly underlying aggression in both experimental animals and men. The discovery of the consequences of these anomalies, and of other types of brain damage, shatters the assumption made by criminologists and sociologists that the vast majority of cases of violent behaviour involve people with completely normal brains, and, furthermore, the use of drugs over a period of time accentuates this particular and specific characteristic. Medical science is on the verge of explaining why some people are more prone to the use of drugs than are others. For example, development of a vastly improved brainwave recording machine now in progress at Tulane University enables doctors to detect signals of trouble from deep in the brain without surgically implanting recording electrodes there. It may also become possible to treat these damaged deep nerve networks ultrasonically, thereby avoiding surgery—a piece of research work with which I am intimately familiar for I have carried out the same in regard to the disturbance of balance in the inner ear.

In a communication to me, Dr. Harvey Powelson, a leading research investigator at Berkeley, California, states:

Canada seems to be on the verge of making a dangerous decision—whether to legalize marijuana—a decision that could ruin thousands of young lives.

Powelson has dealt with thousands of students on their bad "trips"; he has retracted a statement he made in 1967, when he said the use of marihuana and hashish were harmless. Now, in the light of his experience in dealing with over a thousand users since that time, he has proved beyond a doubt what I have already placed on the record, that while it gives a feeling of joy at first, it soon shows less pleasant side effects; it distorts the thinking processes, makes the person accept with illusory calmness unthinkable wrong actions, and robs the appetite.

Powelson warns, as do many other experts, that there is proof that continued use of the drug brings on insomnia, damages the brain cells and the chromosomes, and increases the risk of lung cancer.

In a personal letter, Dr. Kalant of the Department of Pharmacology of Toronto University, who was so kind as to comment favourably on certain work I had carried out, presented me with two copies of a book which I have here now. In that letter Dr. Kalant said:

If I may be so bold as to say so, I think that it might be very helpful to the Senate if the Clerk of the Senate were to obtain a copy for each member before completion of the debate on the new legislation. Let me assure you that this is not a sales pitch, because we receive no personal gain from the book, having donated the royalties to the Foundation. But we feel very strongly about the ideas and issues discussed in it, and would really like to think that we had made a contribution to social policy in writing it.

As I said, honourable senators, I have that book here, It is Drugs, Society and Personal Choice, and I have a copy in English, and one in French. I propose to present these to the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs and I trust the members of that committee will read them. If they do so, I have no doubt as to what direction they will take.

I should like to quote another very respected authority in the field of medicine on this subject. Dr. Gustave Gingras, Executive Director of the Rehabilitation Institute of Montreal, and immediate past president of the Canadian Medical Association, said in March of this year:

The widespread idea that marihuana and other cannabis drugs are either harmless or no more harmful than tobacco or alcohol is both wrong and dangerous.

I might add that in the book I have mentioned there is a very thorough review of the so-called experts in every media who seem to have all the answers to these problems.

Finally, honourable senators, all this exuberance over abortion, women's liberation, drugs, permissiveness, sex, et cetera, is nothing other than the belch and acid indigestion of an overfed, obese and hedonistic society. I understand Varietas delectat cor hominis, and "swinging" can give one some gratification, but how about the spirit, the soul? No man can serve two masters.

This is the age of permissiveness. In the name of freedom, people, including children, are allowed to be lazy, dirty, foul-mouthed, disgusting and violent. Abnormality is equated with normality; lawlessness with justice. The clever masters of our media suggest that patriotism is a hollow sham, that reverence for authority is weakness and that authority itself is stupid or corrupt. They convince many that there is no God and, of course, no sin.

We have learned to read without learning to think; we listen to radio and watch television in a sort of hypnotic trance and learn insensibly lessons that would be repugnant to common sense and ideals if we ever brought them to bear on the programs. There is an outcry against censorship and interference with individual freedom. Sadists, lechers and other abnormals, we are told, should not have to conceal their abnormalities. We should understand and sympathize with them; they have a right to their satisfaction. This is eyewash.

Even Jesus criticized the hypocrites of his day—those who cleansed the outside of the cup and platter, and left the inside foul with iniquity. Neither Jesus nor any other founder of a world religion suggested that people should flaunt their mental and moral diseases in public view. We should not smear the outside of the cup and platter with excrement to make it correspond to the inside. We should instead wash the entire vessel thoroughly, making it sweet and clean and fit to contain the bread of life and the living water. We should not allow the legalists who like to follow the path of least resistance to discourage us. They are not to tell us what we cannot do, but how we can do what we know we should. Do not let the bleeding hearts discourage us in the name of freedom. It is a form of mental laziness and a refusal to face facts.

Honourable senators, I believe this permissiveness to be heresy, and in this regard I would quote the words of Sir Arnold Lunnon:

I believe that to be a heresy—you may call it, if you wish, the Gadarene heresy—which regards the educational process as allowing your charges to run violently down a steep hill and providing first aid at the bottom.

Senator Davey: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask Senator Sullivan a question. I am curious to know if he has any information as to whether the excessive use of alcohol and tobacco lead to more damaging effects on the individual than the use of cannabis.

Senator Sullivan: As I stated at the beginning of my presentation, these investigators, whom I have quoted and with whom I am associated, are in the process of publishing some literature in that connection. This book has to do with the effects of ethyl alcohol on people together with the use of cannabis, but another very interesting publication, and one which is most timely, will be coming out in the very near future. It is even possible that it will be available while this legislation is being studied in committee.

Senator Davey: But will it be available during the course of this debate?

Senator Sullivan: It probably will not be available during the course of this debate, but there is a possibility that it will be available during the committee stage.

On motion of Senator Deschatelets, for Senator Hicks, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the inquiry of Senator McDonald calling the attention of the Senate to the Twentieth Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly, held at London, England, from 11th to 16th November, 1974, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Session and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada, and to the visit of the delegation from Canada with Canadian Forces in Germany.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, the only reason I am speaking at this late hour of the afternoon is that I shall not be here next week, and I should like to present my report regarding the Twentieth Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly.

The Twentieth Session of the North Atlantic Assembly, which was held in London, England, November 11-16, celebrated the 25th anniversary of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), and its own 20th anniversary by focussing attention on human rights and the interdependence of the partners. In recent years this parliamentary institution of NATO with delegates from 14 countries—excluding Greece because democracy was not restored in that country until after the session—has grown in the scope of work and influence. Although military matters receive considerable attention, deliberations have greatly expanded in political, economic, educational-cultural, and scientific-technological affairs. The alliance promotes not only military co-operation of the member countries but also co-operation in other fields of national life.

The Canadian input was substantially in evidence at this session. The European allies now do not automatically lump us with the United States. They gave greater recognition to our role in various committees and finally elected the leader of our delegation, Mr. Paul Langlois, as the next Treasurer of the Assembly.

The work of the political and military committees has been ably presented by our colleague, Senator McDonald. I shall deal as concisely as I am able with the Committee on Education, Cultural Affairs and Communications. The Canadian component of this committee consisted of Mr. Ralph Stewart and Mr. Alex B. Patterson from the House of Commons, and myself from the Senate.

Under the leadership of Senator John V. Tunney of California, who was elected chairman at the Eighteenth Assembly in 1972, the Committee on Education, Cultural Affairs and Communications has greatly increased its role in NATO. He was re-elected chairman this year. The committee was very fortunate to secure the services of Lord Lyell of Great Britain as general rapporteur. He is a very capable, knowledgeable and energetic young man, whose hard work was much appreciated by the members of this committee. Lord Lyell presented an extensive report dealing with the state of the alliance, the free flow of information, cultural aspects of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, dissent in the Soviet Union, parliamentary relations, exchange programs and public opinion.

The section on the state of the alliance brought us up to date on the political differences among the allies, especially in the Middle East; relations with the European Economic Community; the importance of the United States; the military situation with references to the SALT agreements and the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe; the economic situation; and the Polarka affair regarding the plan for a Soviet invasion of Yugoslavia, now considered as an extension of the "Brezhnev Doctrine."

The report discussed the status and operations of Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty, and the need for a sub-committee on the flow of information and people between East and West.

The section on the cultural aspects of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe outlined the Soviet position of legitimizing the post-war division of Europe and particularly Germany, and the Western position of increasing the flow of information and people in and out of the Warsaw Pact countries. The West has won some concessions, such as the consideration of cultural and human issues, which the East had previously avoided.

The section on dissent in the Soviet Union focused on the case of Alexander Solzhenitsyn, the Nobel prize winner, a landmark for a Soviet citizen to be forcibly exiled. Solzhenitsyn approves of the protests from the West to the Soviet authorities concerning human rights.

Although there are exchange visits between European and North American parliamentarians, the only forum for official trans-Atlantic parliamentary contact is the North Atlantic Assembly. It is recommended that the secretariat establish a program for an exchange of staff between the various parliaments in order to become familiar with the workings of the different institutions.

On the occasion of the twentieth anniversary of the Assembly the report urges fresh initiatives in the field of information in order to alert public opinion to the importance of the Atlantic Alliance, which "will not progress, nor indeed survive, without continual political support." Only with the continuing will and the unceasing efforts of member countries can the alliance progress, not merely as a defensive organization but also as a catalyst for the ideals and aspirations of the young political leaders of the alliance, most of whom are too young to remember World War II.

Lord Lyell also presented a separate document on dissent in the Soviet Union. A large section was devoted to Alexander Solzhenitsyn and his book Gulag Archipelago. Information was given about Andrei Sakharov, Pavel Litvinov, Pyotr Grigorenko, Zhores and Roy Medvedev, Andrei Amalrik, Andrei Sinyavsky, Yevgeny Yevtushenko, Vladimir Bukovsky, Valery Chalidze and many others—28 in all. The rapporteur's report states that most of the information on dissent in the Soviet Union emanates from secretly transmitted documents and manuscripts. Samizdat, meaning self-published writing, is distributed unofficially to avoid censorship and is smuggled at great risk to friends and organizations in western countries, demonstrating both the continuing vigour of literature in the Soviet Union and the courage of the dissenters, who are constantly under surveillance by the KGB, the dreaded secret police.

The report reveals that the Soviet methods for treatment of dissidents vary considerably:

1. Official persecution and harassment, which may involve such actions as dismissal from a job or removal from the Writers' Union;
2. Exile from Moscow, the centre of literary activity and protest;
3. Imprisonment and hard labour up to 15 years in Siberia;
4. Committal to mental hospitals;
5. Revocation of citizenship upon foreign travel, and a ban on any return to the Soviet Union; and
6. Forcible exile from the Soviet Union, such as was employed in the case of Alexander Solzhenitsyn.

Mr. Clayton Yeo, formerly of Winnipeg but now residing in London, outlined the work of Amnesty International and the efforts to secure the release of prisoners of conscience from Soviet prisons and hard labour camps.

This is a very difficult task because Soviet authorities do not recognize prisoners of conscience, labelling them as criminals. Amnesty International has had some success and seeks the support of governments, parliamentarians, prominent persons and various organizations. Mr. Yeo confirmed the facts in Lord Lyell's report and drew attention to the widespread Ukrainian dissident movement among the writers and academics, and referred in particular to the case of Valentyn Moroz.

Pavel Litvinov, the grandson of Maxim Litvinov, the Soviet foreign minister during Stalin's regime, appeared before the committee. He was introduced by Professor Peter Reddaway, a noted British authority on the dissident movement in the Soviet Union. Litvinov urged the West to be cautious about the détente. Soviet leaders are interested above all in the technology and the food of the Atlantic states. Communist ideology in the Soviet Union has completely collapsed. The present Soviet leadership is clinging solely to power and is becoming senile. Pragmatism guides its actions. Dissent is growing everywhere in the Soviet Union, and it cannot be suppressed. The Soviet leadership wants to work in darkness and fears publicity. The democratic countries must take a strong stand on human rights and condemn the violations in the Soviet Union, which is not an internal matter as the Soviet Union is a signatory to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The Soviet Union is afraid of world public opinion. Western governments must defend the dissidents and human rights and heed the appeals of academician Andrei Sakharov, concluded Pavel Litvinov.

Senator Henry M. Jackson of Washington spoke on his amendment to the trade bill, which is expected to be passed soon. He stressed that the United States would not continue trade with the Soviet Union unless the latter agreed to a minimum of 60,000 emigrants of various nationalities from the Soviet Union the first year, the number to steadily increase each succeeding year. Apparently the Soviet leaders have reluctantly acceded to these demands because they need trade with the United States of America.

In the discussions that followed, as a member of the Canadian delegation I took an active part commending Lord Lyell for his excellent report, as well as Mr. Clayton Yeo of Amnesty International. Since I follow the dissident movement in the Soviet Union very closely, I submitted the names and cases of several Ukrainian dissidents such as Vyacheslav Chornovil, Ivan Dzyuba, Leonid Plyushch, Nina Strokata and other imprisoned women to be included in Lord Lyell's list, which the committee accepted.

In particular I presented the case of Valentyn Moroz, the Ukrainian historian, who has been on a hunger strike in Vladimir prison since July 1, but is force-fed by the Soviet authorities to keep him alive. Our information comes from Andrei Sakharov, the father of the H-bomb in the Soviet Union and the chairman of the Moscow Human Rights Committee, with whom the Moroz Defence Committee in Canada and myself are in contact by telephone. Transcripts of the recorded telephone talks are made available to our Secretary of State for External Affairs and to interested parties. I gave an account of the actions of the Moroz Defence Committee, the interventions of the Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau, and Mr. Sharp and Mr.

MacEachen, as Secretary of State for External Affairs, the appeals of professional organizations, and the wide publicity given to the Moroz case in the Canadian press, television and radio.

My presentation must have impressed the members of the Committee on Education, Cultural Affairs and Information, for I was asked to present a paper on the situation of the non-Russian peoples in the Soviet Union at the next meeting in Copenhagen in May 1975. Subsequently, a telegram was despatched to Leonid Brezhnev, the Secretary General of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, requesting the immediate release and hospitalization of Valentyn Moroz. This telegram was signed by Senator Tunney, Lord Lyell, Senator K. de Vries of Holland, Senator A. H. McDonald of Canada and myself. This was reported in the British press and in some Canadian newspapers.

The committee drafted a resolution on human rights expressing concern about the continuing suppression of ideas and persecution of dissenters in the Soviet Union and the other Warsaw Pact countries, about restrictions imposed on emigration and broadcasting, and urging that the member governments of the Alliance pursue agreements with the Soviet Bloc countries which would guarantee the free expression of ideas, the free movement of people and the free flow of ideas across national borders, and that they confirm their commitment to basic human rights and recognize the vital connection these freedoms have with a genuine East-West détente. This resolution was unanimously adopted by the Assembly.

To put this resolution into effect, it was decided to establish a "Subcommittee to study the Free Flow of Information." This subcommittee will be convened prior to the meeting in Copenhagen next May, when its first report will be submitted.

The Committee on Education, Cultural Affairs and Information was also concerned about the NATO Information Service, the necessity of public support for the continuing success of the Alliance, and the possible weakening of popular and parliamentary support. The following resolution was adopted by the Assembly:

That the North Atlantic Council examine its activities in the field of public information in order to determine areas in which expanded efforts should be undertaken;

- a) increased distribution of information to members of parliament, with particular attention being given to delegates of the Assembly;
- b) improved and expanded coverage of the Assembly and its activities in NATO publications;
- c) inclusion of the Assembly as a regular part of the NATO visitors' program when appropriate;
- d) publicity about developments in member parliaments which have a direct impact on the Alliance.

The resolution on the Parliamentary Staff Exchange Program requested the standing committee to ask the international secretariat to study the feasibility of establishing and financing a small program of exchange between parliamentary staff members whose work directly benefits the Assembly. Participants would observe the operations of their host parliaments, and visit ministries and departments of government. Since the mechanics and financing of this project require further study, it was decided to approve it in principle only at this time.

Honourable senators, I had brought up the issue of the violation of human rights by the Soviet government and the heroic stance of Soviet dissidents, including Valentyn Moroz, in the same committee at the 18th Session of the North Atlantic Assembly held in November 1972, in Bonn, Germany. There was a brief, positive discussion, but no resolution was drawn up because no advance notice had been given. At that time, Senator Tunney of the United States was elected chairman of the committee. A new rapporteur was chosen, charged with the task of collecting information on the Soviet violation of human rights and the state of the détente. Lord Lyell discharged his responsibilities in an excellent manner. Now, for the first time, NATO has a more accurate picture of this situation in the Soviet Union.

We cannot sacrifice our high principles and ideals of freedom and democracy to accommodate the Communist regime just for the sake of the détente. The cultural exchanges between the East and the West have been preponderantly one-sided, greatly favouring the U.S.S.R. I am glad that we are taking a tougher stance, which the Soviet Union will have to respect. The Soviet Union must be made to realize that the Western powers insist that it live up to its commitments as a signatory of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and also the détente commitments.

I should like to bring to the attention of the Senate the fact that Canadian delegations to international meetings must have continuity if they are to be effective. Experience has shown that we are at a great disadvantage when we send new persons who are not acquainted with the leading delegates of other countries, and with the procedures. It was much easier for me to take an active role in the Committee on Education, Cultural Affairs and Information because I had been on the committee two years ago, knew several members from other countries and, what is more important, knew how the committee functioned.

Senator Choquette: You will go back.

Senator Yuzyk: Thank you. The members of the Canadian delegation to this Assembly, after discussing this matter, advise that in the future most of the former members should be chosen again to provide continuity in Canadian external activities, as was stated so well by Senator McDonald. I also believe that the delegation from the Senate should be large enough to have a member on each committee of the Assembly.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Yuzyk: On this occasion there were six committees and we had only three members. In this respect we were not adequately represented at the last Session.

On motion of Senator Lafond, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, December 10 at 8 p.m.

FIRE LOSSES REPLACEMENT ACCOUNT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator McDonald moved the third reading of Bill C-18, to amend the Fire Losses Replacement Account Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, December 5, the debate on the motion of Senator Neiman for the second reading of Bill S-19, to amend the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Criminal Code.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I think Senator Neiman made a very good and balanced explanation of this legislation when she moved second reading, and I do not think it is necessary for me to add too much to it, though there are two observations in particular that I want to make. Before doing so, I should like to say that I think Senator Neimán's presentation of the issue at stake in this bill was somewhat more balanced and rational than that of our good medical friend, Senator Sullivan, who seemed to me to be trying to get across the idea that in some way or other we were legitimizing or approving of the use of marihuana or soft drugs, and that the relaxations in this bill constituted a major change in the law. To me they do not do that, and it certainly would be wrong if anyone were led to think that they did.

Let us take a look at the clauses which deal with penalties for possession in the proposed legislation under the Food and Drugs Act as compared with the penalties imposed under the Narcotic Control Act. For simple possession the maximum penalties are roughly halved. But one should bear in mind that under the Narcotic Control Act the maximum penalties apply to any drugs, including hard drugs such as heroin and so on, and it is highly unlikely that for first offences the maximum penalties provided in the Narcotic Control Act would ever in fact be imposed by a judge or magistrate. It seems to me that to roughly halve the maximum penalties presently in the Narcotic Control Act for summary conviction under the Food and Drugs Act is not unreasonable. It brings the penalties more into line with those in other penal sections used by the courts of this land.

For trafficking, of course, the penalties are much more severe. But again we should realize that under the Narcotic Control Act this maximum penalty applied to heroin, opium and other hard drugs, whereas the maximum penalties that we are talking about under this new legislation apply only to marihuana or cannabis derivatives. Trafficking penalties on indictment under the Narcotic Control Act can be as severe as imprisonment for life, whereas the maximum penalty for trafficking in marihuana under this bill on indictment is imprisonment for not more than ten years. This seems to me to be a not unreasonable change. Similarly, the penalties for the import or export of cannabis will be reduced for this drug from the maximum which applied to any narcotic. They can be imprisonment for life but not less than seven years, and this bill proposes a penalty of not more than fourteen years', and not less than three years', imprisonment. I emphasize that these maximum penalties under the Food and Drugs Act apply only to cannabis derivatives, and not to the hard drugs with respect to which maximum penalties are imposed under the Narcotic Control Act.

However, the two sections that I hope will be given careful attention by the committee to which this bill will be referred are sections 52 and 53. On their face, they seem to me to be bad law. One of the things this bill would do is make it possible to proceed by way of summary conviction with lighter penalties for the various offences relating to marihuana or cannabis. The proposed new section 52 of the Food and Drugs Act is:

For the purposes only of the Identification of Criminals Act, a person charged with or convicted of an offence under section 48 or an offence punishable on summary conviction under section 49, 50 or 51 shall be deemed to be charged with and to have been convicted of an indictable offence.

If we proceed by way of summary conviction, then the offence ought to be a summary conviction offence, and we ought not to say that for the purposes of the Identification of Criminals Act, or for any other purpose, a summary conviction can be regarded as a conviction for an indictable offence. I hope the committee will inquire from the officials of the department as to the reasons for this, and I hope they will be able to satisfy me and other honourable senators when the bill is returned to the chamber that there is a valid reason for making this distinction which, as I say, on its face, seems to me to be bad law in the extreme.

Honourable senators, my second comment has to do with the new section 53, which says that if you proceed against a person for trafficking, the procedure shall be conducted along exactly the same lines as if you were proceeding against the person for possession, and if the accused person is found guilty of possession, even though he has been accused of trafficking, you proceed on the same basis as if he had been accused of possession. If he is found guilty then subsection (2) of section 53 continues:

... if the court finds that the accused was in possession of the cannabis contrary to subsection 48(1), he shall be given an opportunity of establishing that he was not in possession of the cannabis for the purpose of trafficking, and thereafter the prosecutor shall be given an opportunity of adducing evidence to establish that the accused was in possession of the cannabis for the purpose of trafficking.

In other words, you proceed against an accused person for the offence of trafficking, the procedure goes along exactly the same lines that would be followed if he were accused merely of possession for his own use. If he is found guilty of possession, immediately the burden of proof shifts and he is placed on his defence, and must show that he did not possess it for the purpose of trafficking. Even after his defence is in, the prosecution may then adduce further evidence to show that he did possess the drug for the purpose of trafficking.

I am always suspicious of legislation of a criminal or quasi-criminal nature that shifts the burden of proof from the Crown to the accused person. Again, I hope the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee—which I presume is the committee to which this legislation will be referred—will inquire very carefully into the reasons for this shifting of the burden of proof. Personally, I am against such provisions in our criminal or quasi-criminal law, and unless there are very good reasons why the burden of proof should shift here then this section should be amended.

Honourable senators, I hope that when this bill is reported by the committee we shall see different versions of both sections 52 and 53. Aside from that, it seems to me that this is good legislation.

Years ago I remember a distinguished clergyman saying, in relation to prohibition, that with respect to sumptuary laws governments cannot go beyond the acknowledged customs of their people. It is said that we are in a position now where as many as one million people in Canada have had recourse to soft drugs of one kind or another. Surely we cannot proceed as if all these offences were the most serious indictable offences envisaged when the Narcotics Control Act was written many years ago. In conformity with modern practice, I believe we should not make of these teenagers—some of them scarcely teenagers—criminals, by convicting them of an indictable offence before they are even 14 years old, which is presently the case under the Narcotics Control Act.

I do not think for one minute that this legislation in any wise gives the approval of the Parliament of Canada to the use of even the softest of drugs; but I do think it makes the penalties more reasonable, and has the beneficial effect of not branding as hardened criminals the young people who, in the kind of world in which we live today, seem, in ever increasing numbers, to be induced to experiment with these drugs.

Honourable senators, I support the legislation, but again I urge the committee to give careful consideration to the two points I have made relating to the new sections 52 and 53 of the Food and Drugs Act.

Senator Sullivan: May I say to the honourable senator that in no way did I intend to implicate the young people in my remarks on this particular legislation.

As a medical man, what I wish the honourable senator, as a layman, would do for my benefit, and that of the house, is differentiate between the habitual trafficker in marihuana and the habitual trafficker in any other narcotic drug.

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, my distinguished colleague knows very well that I cannot do that any more than he can. To put it another way, he may be able to do it from his point of view as a medical practitioner, but the facts before all of us are that many of his colleagues in the practice of medicine hold divergent views. Unfortunately for us who have to legislate, this is not a matter on which the medical profession will give us a solid, united answer to the problems concerned. To me it is unfortunate that there are medical men who are on record as saying that there is no harm in the use of marihuana or cannabis derivatives and so on, while at the same time there are others on record who hold the view that to start smoking "grass" is to start on the road that leads inevitably to the use of hard drugs such as heroin and opium. All I can say is that I wish the medical profession would get its facts together, and present us with a solid front in an attempt to answer some of these difficult questions.

Senator Sullivan: I think the honourable senator must have been smoking marihuana himself, when he makes a statement like that.

Some hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

On motion of Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, December 5 the debate on the motion of Senator Hayden for the adoption of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on Bill S-15, to amend the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce Act.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, when I moved the adjournment of the debate, it was simply with the intention of giving an opportunity to members of the Senate, who were not at the sitting of the committee, to look at the amendments. I am quite sure that all those who took the time to read them will realize that these amendments are worthwhile, and that they provide some safeguards in the application of this legislation.

This legislation has a definite purpose, and it should not be used for any other purpose than the one mentioned. It should help the Minister of Trade and Commerce to do certain things, none of which is to divulge information that should not be divulged or used for purposes other than those mentioned.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Langlois moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John M. Godfrey moved the second reading of Bill C-14, to incorporate the Federal Business Development Bank.

He said: Honourable senators, explaining this bill to the Senate—

Senator Walker: Is it about hockey?

Senator Godfrey: —is somewhat easier than introducing a bill which originates in the Senate. I have had the advantage of not only being able to read the speeches in the other place, but also the evidence given before the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. Because of that I think I have a greater appreciation of what is involved in this legislation than if I had to rely solely on the bill and a briefing from the department.

The minister's speech emphasized that this bill creates a brand new crown corporation, which will bear the name "Federal Business Development Bank," to take care of the needs of small business which are not being met by the private sector, on terms and conditions that the small businessman can accept.

After reading all the evidence presented to the House of Commons committee, I am inclined to approach this legislation from a different angle. I think that this house will be able to understand this bill better when I de-emphasize the newness of this corporation and say that in my opinion it essentially provides for the carrying on of the Industrial Development Bank under a new name, under a different department, with somewhat increased powers and objects and with additional capital. I propose, therefore to briefly outline the history of the Industrial Development Bank and its present method of operation, and then point out the changes which have been provided for in this bill.

The Industrial Development Bank was formed in 1944 for the purpose of giving financial assistance to small industries where such financial assistance would not otherwise be available on reasonable terms and conditions. As the name implies, it was initially incorporated to provide financial assistance to small businesses engaged in manufacturing; it was to be a bank of last resort and was to fill a gap then existing in the private sector. That the IDB was needed is illustrated by the fact that from the time the bank was established in 1944 up to its most recent fiscal year ended September 30, 1974, it had approved approximately 55,000 loans for a total of approximately $2.5 billion. These loans were made to more than 40,000 businesses employing approximately 700,000 people. At the end of the fiscal year 1974, there were 23,550 customers on its books, representing outstanding loans and commitments of $1.1 billion. The IDB authorizes a loan every 15 minutes of every working day.

Since it commenced business, the IDB established that although it was making loans to small business enterprises that could not obtain financial assistance from the private sector on reasonable terms and conditions, the bank could still be operated at a profit. After it had been in operation for 18 years, RoyNat was formed by two banks and three trust companies, which made loans to small businesses secured by straight industrial mortgages which at that time could not be taken by chartered banks.

There have been some criticisms of the IDB, some of which were expressed by witnesses appearing before the Commons committee, and I would like to briefly mention and deal with the main ones.

The first criticism is that it does not take enough risks; that it is too conservative in its lending policies and requires the borrower to give too much security. This would appear on the surface to be a valid criticism, because its loss experience is approximately equal to only 1 ¼ to 1 ½ per cent of net authorizations. However, what is more significant than this low loss ratio is the fact that approximately 25 per cent of all loans authorized become problem accounts. This proportion varies from region to region. The greatest incidence is in the Atlantic region, where the proportion was as high as 40 per cent at one time. At any one time approximately 12 per cent of their loans are actually in arrears; in some branches that is as high as 20 per cent, and in others as low as 8 per cent.

When the bank does encounter a write-off, the proportion written off is, on the average, approximately 50 per cent of the amount authorized. What few people realize is that one of the great contributions of the IDB is that they nurse these problem accounts along in such a way, and with such advice and help, that the borrowers are able to stay in business, and that is essentially why the actual losses are very small. The bank realizes that its job is not merely to protect its interest and see that the loans are repaid, but to help its small business customers by educating them in sound business practices so that they can survive and prosper.

Secondly, it was said that the bank took too long to process an application. Because of this criticism, the bank has streamlined many of its procedures, with the result that the average processing time of 35 days in 1968 has been cut to 15 days at the present time, with 50 per cent of all loans being authorized in 10 days or less.

The third major criticism—and this comes mainly from other financial institutions—is that it competes with the private sector, and that the private sector can now provide most of the financial assistance required.

I do not think there can be much criticism that the IDB competes with the chartered banks, because in every case where the IDB receives an application for a loan it communicates with the manager of the chartered bank of the applicant to let him know of the application, what it is for and how much is requested, and to ask his views on it. This gives the chartered bank the opportunity to make the loan itself if it so desires.

There was a submission to the House of Commons committee on behalf of the Federated Council of Sales Finance Companies, and on behalf of RoyNat Limited. They contended that the IDB is not a lender of last resort, because it does provide financing where it is available elsewhere under reasonable terms and conditions. This statement was challenged before the House of Commons committee by representatives of the IDB. They pointed out that until fairly recently RoyNat would not lend less than $25,000, whereas half of the IDB loans are under $25,000. Furthermore, RoyNat's average loan is around $200,000, while the IDB's average loan is $44,000, and in some branches would be around $35,000. The IDB maintained that this indicated an entirely different character from that of RoyNat; that RoyNat was essentially to help finance medium-sized businesses and that last year they only authorized something over 500 loans, whereas the IDB authorized between 9,000 and 10,000, and they were nearly all small.

RoyNat, in its brief to the House of Commons committee, contended that a substantial volume of the IDB:

... is a result of an interest rate structure that is usually below that charged for funds with a similar term provided by private lenders.

Evidence was given on behalf of the IDB that their:

... rates normally would be above what a chartered bank would charge for a term loan. At present that would be somewhat less than what RoyNat would charge for a term loan. They might be more of less.

The IDB follows exactly the reverse policy that is followed by private institutions in the private sector with respect to interest rates, because the IDB charges lower rates for smaller loans than they do for larger loans, on the theory that their job is to help small businesses and this is one way to do it.

Some members of the House of Commons committee were critical of the submissions of RoyNat and the Federal Council of Sales and Finance Companies because they presented no evidence of an actual case in which the IDB were making loans that were available on reasonable terms and conditions elsewhere. The representative of RoyNat replied by stating:

As far as adequate proof is concerned, I think it is very difficult for the private sector to come forward and give you actual specific cases.

I find it difficult to accept this statement, and if representatives of the private sector take the position before the Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, when it is considering this bill, that the IDB has been making loans that were available on reasonable terms and conditions elsewhere, then I suggest they should be asked to come up with actual cases to prove their point.

The final major criticism that I have heard expressed about the IDB is that during a period of general monetary restraint the IDB's business increases, because funds are always available to it. When asked this question before the House of Commons committee, Mr. Clarke, the General Manager of the IDB, replied:

As a rule in these periods, any statement of policy on the part of the government or of the monetary authorities is usually so expressed as to seek to exempt small business from the burden or impact of that period of restraint. To the extent that that is the case, for the vast part of our business we would normally then expect to continue to help small business. In a period of restraint we have not regarded ourselves as an instrument for frustrating the intentions of those responsible for financial or monetary policy. We would not seek or expect to be a refuge for people who in the ordinary course of events might expect to be affected by the situation of restraint.

Honourable senators, before discussing the differences between the new bank incorporated by this bill and the IDB, I should explain briefly two transitional provisions in the bill affecting the IDB.

The IDB Act places two restrictions on the scale of its lending operations. Firstly, the total direct and contingent liabilities of the bank shall not at any time exceed ten times the aggregate amount of the paid-up capital and reserve fund. Secondly, the aggregate of the amounts of the loans or guarantee liabilities outstanding in amounts in excess of $200,000 shall not at any time exceed $200 million.

Because, on the basis of current projections, the IDB will have to curtail its lending activities before the new bank can start operations, this bill increases the IDB's authorized capital by $50 million, thus providing it with new lending power for the last few months of its existence.

They have already reached the limit of loans exceeding $200,000, so that in order that they can continue to make those loans over the next few months, this restriction in the Industrial Development Bank Act is repealed.

Now what are the difference between the proposed new bank and the IDB? First, the most obvious difference is in the name. As I have mentioned, the IDB, when first incorporated, restricted its loans to manufacturing enterprises. Loans will now be made to any kind of business enterprise, so that the word "industrial" is somewhat misleading, and "business" more accurately described its activities. The addition of the word "federal," I presume, is merely to emphasize the federal presence where the bank operates.

[Senator Godfrey.]

Secondly, the new bank can engage in the business of leasing, which is considered a desirable addition in order to equip the new bank with the full coverage of the various kinds of financial resources that are available to present-day businesses.

Thirdly, section 16(1)(c) of the Industrial Development Bank Act requires that:

—the amount invested or to be invested in the industrial enterprise by persons other than the Bank and the character of that investment are such as to afford the Bank reasonable protection.

This bill requires that it:

—should be such as to afford a reasonable expectation of a continuing commitment to the enterprise by persons other than the bank.

This change, combined with the move of the bank from the Department of Finance to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, will, it is hoped, have at least a psychological effect on the officers of the bank, so that they will be inclined to take a somewhat more venturesome approach to the needs of the small businessman than they have in the past.

I should point out, however, that the high percentage of their accounts which can be termed "problem" accounts, or which are actually in arrears, would indicate that they have been considerably more venturesome in at least the recent past than they have generally been given credit for.

Fourthly, as previously pointed out, the Industrial Development Bank Act provides that the aggregate of the amounts of the loans or guarantee liabilities outstanding in amounts in excess of $200,000 shall not at any time exceed $200 million. This bill contains no such limit, but in section 4(2) it does provide that the new bank:

—shall give particular consideration to the needs of small business enterprises.

The IDB has a present equity capital base of $71 million, and a reserve fund of $33 million, with loans outstanding on September 30 of $983.6 million. The new bank will have an authorized capital of $200 million and a debt to equity ratio of 10 to one, so that it can make loans and commitments totalling $2.2 billion.

Fifthly, the new bank is to provide management counselling services now provided by the Counselling Assistance to Small Enterprises Program, known as CASE, of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, which will be absorbed into the new bank.

Sixthly, the new bank will sponsor training programs for the promotion of good management practices. The bank will take over the owner-manager training program from the Department of Manpower and Immigration, which is oriented to specific aspects of small business management. The bank will also continue the one-day small business seminars provided by the IDB at different locations across Canada, particularly in small cities, towns and remote areas where such services are not otherwise available.

Seventhly, the new bank will have power to develop and operate an information service and publish and distribute information relevant to the bank, as well as provide advice on federal and provincial programs for small businesses and on assistance available to small businesses from others. These information services will be provided locally through all offices of the bank, will be free to all interested persons and will be aimed at small firms that do not have the resources to seek help from the multiplicity of specialized sources of assistance to small businesses.

Finally, the composition of the board of the new bank will be somewhat different from that of the IDB. The IDB has the same directors as the Bank of Canada, with the addition of the Deputy Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. From the private sector on the IDB board there is a director from each province, with two from each of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. The Governor of the Bank of Canada is the president of the IDB, and the government is also represented on the board of the IDB by the Deputy Minister of Finance.

The new bank will have two private sector directors chosen from each of the five geographical regions of Canada, and four persons selected from the Public Service of Canada. It is expected that the four from the Public Service will be the Governor of the Bank of Canada, the Deputy Minister of Finance, the Deputy Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Deputy Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. There is also a provision for regional councils each of not more than 12 members. There will be two directors for each region as well as a senior officer of the bank designated by the president, the balance being appointed by order in council from the private sector.

To sum up, the new bank will be substantially the same as the IDB as it exists today, with the addition of increased capital—

Senator Flynn: You said it.

Senator Godfrey:—and new programs, particularly management training and information services, which will give the new bank a much greater range than the present IDB. The new bank is conceived as a body which will continue to help small business by combining the financial services of the IDB with management and information services which will help to improve the general level of small business management in the country.

In conclusion, I should like to draw the attention of honourable senators to an amendment to section 36 of Bill C-14. This is the only amendment of substance since the bill was introduced into the other place. Its main purpose is to make it a legislative requirement that every application for financial assistance that involves a director or a member of a regional advisory council, or a person related to such director or member, be submitted to the board of directors for approval; and in addition it provides that information regarding the total amount of assistance given by the corporation under such circumstances be reported in the corporations's annual report. This amendment considerably strengthens the original section 36.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

TERRITORIAL LANDS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold moved the second reading of Bill S-20, to amend the Territorial Lands Act.

He said: Honourable senators, in introducing this bill, I am very careful not to say it is a simple bill. However, I can say with some confidence that it is a short bill. I do not think that should be too debatable.

Bill S-20 amends the Territorial Lands Act. When I read the bill I asked for a definition, which is not in front of us, of what is meant by "territorial lands." The following definition was given to me:

Territorial lands mean lands of the Northwest Territories or in the Yukon Territory that are vested in the Crown or of which the Government of Canada has power to dispose.

That defines the area about which we are talking.

Senator Flynn: What about the offshore land?

Senator Buckwold: As far as I know, it is not included in the definition of the territorial lands referred to.

Honourable senators, I should like to explain briefly the purpose of Bill S-20, to amend the Territorial Lands Act. I should state at the outset that the proposed amendment relates exclusively to one particular section of the act, namely, section 24. It is intended to modify the section in the act which prohibits employees of the Government of Canada from holding any interest in territorial lands, except under the authority of a specific order of the Governor in Council, and to remove from the act those penalties which are excessively premature and unnecessary.

The present restriction was contained in the old Dominion Lands Act, the predecessor of the current act, and was intended to ensure the integrity of transactions between employees of the then Department of the Interior and private industry. In 1923, the prohibition, which covered mining rights as well as land interests, was extended to apply to the officials of all departments of the Government of Canada. On the repeal of the Dominion Lands Act and the coming into force of the Territorial Lands Act in 1950, these sections were simply carried forward and expanded to prohibit shareholding or other pecuniary interest in any company or corporation which might have an interest in territorial lands.

Over the years, it has been the practice for crown employees to request approval by order in council to acquire territorial land for personal use, such as a summer cottage, a fishing shack, or that type of thing. This form of direct interest in territorial lands can be readily controlled and regulated within the machinery established to administer the lands in question; that is, through an order in council to deal with the physical acquisition of the land described. On the other hand—and this is the major problem—there has not been one single instance of an employee requesting a similar order in council to purchase shares in a company or corporation with a land interest in northern Canada. Short of voluntary or accidental disclosure of any such interest by an employee, there is no satisfactory way of monitoring transactions between crown employees and the private sector.

This leads to the further consideration of the ability of a person who invests in a company to maintain the kind of overview of that company's operations which is necessary to determine whether it has a direct or indirect interest in territorial lands. Recent extensive exploration activity in the north has seen many companies, such as insurance companies, mutual investment funds and other financial institutions, acquiring various rights to territorial lands, such as oil and mineral rights. Interests in these lands are often transferred between holding and operating companies without public knowledge or notice to shareholders. Moreover, only a small percentage of crown employees have access to the kind of information about companies operating in the north from which they could derive a pecuniary interest. It seems unfair, therefore, to prevent employees generally from making investments on the same basis of financial risk as any member of the public.

With the promulgation of the conflict of interest guidelines for public servants on December 18, 1973, employees with any holdings that could place them in a potential situation of conflict of interest are expected to make appropriate disclosures. This eliminates the necessity for individual orders in council relating to shareholders, a requirement never practiced nor administratively possible to enforce, while at the same time ensuring the integrity of crown employees who invest in the corporate sector. Relying on the guidelines rather than the current section 24 of the Territorial Lands Act will also limit the generality of the restrictions we wish to see applied to those who would be most likely to benefit from privileged information.

The amendment before you is intended to accomplish this purpose. It will retain the requirement to have individual acquisitions of land sanctioned by orders in council but will make more realistic the application of prohibitions on crown employees in respect of any interests in territorial lands. Finally, but perhaps most importantly, it will remove the undesirable requirement for summary dismissal if the act should be contravened.

Honourable senators, I think that gives you the legal background in connection with this legislation. In simple terms, the effect of this legislation is that if a crown employee purchases land in the territories involved, an order in council is required; on the other hand, the government, by a general order in council, will be able to provide for the situations in general in which a shareholder of a company which has an interest in such lands will, in fact, not be breaking the law. As far as penalty is concerned, this bill will eliminate the serious penalty of summary dismissal, while retaining other forms of penalties in line with the act.

If it is the wish of the Senate that this bill be referred to committee, I am advised that it should go to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I commend this bill for your approval.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I should like to put a question to the sponsor of the bill. On the surface, it seems that an employee of the Government of Canada could, for example, buy some stock in a company listed on the stock exchange, such as CPR or Hudson's Bay Mining, or one of a number of corporations, and that company could, without that individual's knowing of it, acquire an interest in territorial lands. How is it proposed that that problem be solved? An ordinary shareholder cannot know what a large company may be doing as far as investments are concerned.

Senator Buckwold: That, of course, is exactly what the bill is trying to accomplish.

Senator Flynn: I am not against this bill.

Senator Buckwold: The intent of this bill is to relieve that problem insofar as the potential liability of a crown employee is concerned. If passed, it will provide the government with the opportunity to substitute authority for passage of orders in council in accordance with section 24(1), which could apply to a class or classes of purchases or acquisitions of interests in territorial lands, whether or not they were made or acquired before or after the issuance of the order in council. In other words, the government could pass a general order in council which would make these transactions quite legal in so far as public crown employees are concerned. That, really, is the intent of the act.

Senator Flynn: That may be so, but I am not entirely convinced. Therefore, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Choquette: After you have spoken on it, we will know all about it.

Senator Flynn: It is not that simple.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—MOTION FOR THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I move that the debate on third reading be adjourned to the next sitting.

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Neiman, seconded by the Honourable Senator Deschatelets, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill S-19, intituled: "An Act to amend the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Criminal Code".—(Honourable Senator Asselin, P.C.).

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, as I am not ready to speak, I yield the floor to Senator Lawson.

The Hon. the Speaker: Has the Honourable Senator Lawson permission to proceed instead of the Honourable Senator Asselin, P.C.?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, in rising to speak to what I consider to be a very important piece of legislation, I want at the outset to congratulate Senator Neiman for the balanced, objective and unemotional way in which she presented this bill to the chamber. I think that the main difficulty we will have in dealing with this legislation will be to control our emotions so that we can properly consider its intent and purpose. I know that this will be difficult for me. In his speech Senator Sullivan referred to newspaper headlines which conveyed the impression that the government is showing increased tolerance and less concern about the use of cannabis and the kind of drugs specified in this legislation. Whether we like to accept it or not, that is the impression that is going to be conveyed, and one of the serious things we have to overcome in the legislation, as well as the inequities in the law that the legislation is concerned with, is the widespread idea, which is flowing from the mouths of some teachers and others, that there is no harm caused by the use of cannabis, or marihuana. A quick end should be put to that kind of misinformation.

After the bill had been introduced here I had occasion to listen to an "action line" type of program over a local radio station. It was an "interesting and intellectual" conversation between the radio host and the caller, who was an admitted user. The caller was explaining for the benefit of the radio audience how pleased he was that the government recognized that there was no harm in the use of marihuana and how people must understand that it was not like alcohol which has the effect of impairing driving ability, but on the contrary would improve your vision, make you able to see things in greater perspective and give you greater concern for other automobile drivers, improve your reflexes, and so on. That was the kind of garbage that was being poured out unchallenged for the benefit of countless poor, misguided souls to believe and accept.

For these reasons, while I understand the objective and the purpose of the legislation, I believe a real effort will have to be made to see to it that that kind of misinformation does not continue to go out unchallenged and that we do not appear to be giving our blessing to the use of marihuana or to its greater use, easier use or more acceptable use.

Some excellent material and statistics have been put out about the effects of marihuana and the damage it causes. I do not think there is a need to go into any great detail on it, but I should like to read one review of the situation in the United States as reported in Healthways magazine of September, 1974:

The United States is in the throes of a full-scale marihuana epidemic—and the situation is getting worse.

That is the warning being issued by the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee following extended investigation.

Use of marihuana and hashish have increased so dramatically over the past six years, says Subcommittee Chairman James O. Eastland (D. -Miss.), that:

"On a per capita basis, the United States may be the number one cannabis-using nation in history."

Senator Eastland blamed the "epidemic" on the casual attitude too many Americans have about the drug, many considering it "harmless." This is not so he said.

Among other things, researchers have found that cannabis:

Accumulates in the brain and gonads like DDT.

Produces fetal deformities in animals—in addition to abortions and stillbirths—in a manner resembling the damage done by thalidomide.

Results in breakage and serious damage to human chromosomes.

Seriously reduces the body's ability to produce DNA, a critical component of all cells including the reproductive cells.

According to Dr. Gabriel Nahas of Columbia-Presbyterian Medical Center, who recently published his findings on DNA damage caused by marihuana: "Impairment of DNA synthesis might be considered one of the most damaging long-range effects for any drug chronically used by a large segment of the population."

Dr. Olav J. Braeden, director of the United Nations Narcotics Laboratory in Geneva, said recent research indicates that marihuana may be even more dangerous than had previously been believed.

This is also the thrust of six recent scientific papers written by experts in various countries.

"These scientists warn us," says the senator, "that widespread use of cannabis can do serious genetic damage to future generations—it is almost like playing Russian roulette."

I think that is a fair summary of all the studies and reports that have been made. Clearly, I am on the side of those who say it is a damaging drug and that it is a matter of serious concern that nothing should be done to encourage the use of the drug, or seem to give our blessing to its widespread use.

If we are going to do a proper job, we must offset the kind of misinformation that is being given. I do not know quite how we are going to stop it, but in the schools we should not let the students be told, "If you use this drug, all of the things that are locked in your brain, all of the genius that is asleep there, will now be awakened. You will be able to write books, poetry, stories and will be able to make all kinds of mathematical formulas. All of these things will flow up unlocked by the use of this drug and you will live happily ever after." I think an abrupt halt should be put to that kind of garbage. Perhaps we should arrange for some students to go to places like Vancouver—and I am not proud to admit that I come from there when I say this—the drug capital of Canada, because if they visited that place they would see young people ranging from 12 to 16 years of age virtually mindless vegetables as a result of using this drug. They are crying out for help. In almost every case when I talk to my friends on the police force they tell me that every major hard-drug user has the same story: "I started out using the soft drugs. I started out using the non-addictive drugs." While marihuana may be held to be technically non-addictive, nevertheless it is part of the environment in which the people who use it are involved; they are surrounded by it, and that is addictive of itself.

There is a need for some educational balance so that these young people can see the other side, because if it is as good as some of them would have you believe, we have a duty to put LSD in the nation's drinking water so that we can unlock all these super-brains—that is, if you believe all that garbage. But if we do not believe it, it seems to me that we have a responsibility to make it very, very clear and to balance this misinformation by pointing out the dangers of the use or the continued use of cannabis. Furthermore, we certainly should not be so naive as to believe that everybody will be as objective as Senator Neiman in understanding the purpose of the legislation. Certainly these merchants of death who are selling the product, promoting it and distributing it, are going to take great comfort from anything said in this chamber or in our hearings that might lead one to believe that the government now recognizes that it is less dangerous or that the government is taking a more tolerant view of its use. I think we are going to have to be very careful in the conduct of the hearings and in what we say about the use of these drugs. I believe that this legislation will go to the committee of which Senator Goldenberg is chairman, and it is comforting for me to know that we shall have as chairman a man of his calibre, a man who has the ability to put an end to any kind of misinformation flowing around and who has the ability to keep the entire subject in its proper perspective.

I would hope that in the course of our committee hearings, those organizations and individuals—and I can understand that there should be some concern about individuals wishing to make representations—who have information or knowledge that would be helpful to us in the preparation of this legislation or even better legislation should be brought forward.

I think also, honourable senators, that it is extremely important, when we are talking about lesser penalties for the possession of these drugs, that we should not fall into the trap of giving the impression that we believe users are only going to have them for themselves, that they will import them only for their own exclusive use and have no contact or involvement with anybody else. Anybody who has the remotest contact with persons involved in the use of these drugs knows that nothing could be further from the truth, that the very people who are using them are doing so from a great feeling of insecurity and that they desperately need these drugs and the companionship and the environment and the contact with other users, and that the whole game is to smoke them and to share them, and to entice and seduce others into using them and sharing them.

Here I am not talking about pushers or traffickers; I am talking about individual users. Let us not be blinded by those who say, "I am going to import it for my own use, to go off into a quiet room to meditate and cogitate and have these bursts of genius." It does not happen that way. You need to talk to some of the groups involved with this, the police, the magistrates and some of the parents who have had to read the dreadful initials O.D., D.O.A.—overdose, dead on arrival. Let us talk to some of those people. You are not dealing with clinically clean drugs. You have the worst possible kind of product being used and abused by these individuals, who are supposedly using it only for their own use but who are also sharing it with others, leading to the serious damage that follows from that.

I think it is imperative that when we talk about this, while we try to set aside some of the emotion, we must keep in mind that we are talking about human frailties and concerns and we are not going to be able to remove totally all of the emotion. But I think it is imperative that we talk with judges, policemen, social workers, and parents whose children have been deformed or who have been turned into vegetables or who have died as a result of the misuse and the abuse of these substances.

I would only caution the committee in dealing with this bill that reading between the lines of the legislation I hear voices crying out for help, and when we come to consider this legislation we should be certain that we are doing more good than harm.

On motion of Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

TERRITORIAL LANDS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Buckwold for second reading of Bill S-20, to amend the Territorial Lands Act.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I am not at all sure that I should have resumed this debate today.

Senator Greene: Well, then, why don't you sit down?

Senator Flynn: If I were to follow the example of Senator Greene, then I would never be on my feet and I would not contribute much to the work of the Senate. In saying that, I have no objection to Senator Greene's being critical of me as long as he has no objection to my being critical of him.

Senator Greene: Fair enough.

Senator Flynn: If he wants to speak on this measure, he can always adjourn the debate.

I was listening last evening to the speech by Senator Buckwold explaining this legislation and although from reading his speech today I am quite satisfied that he gave a very good explanation of the bill, I doubt that anyone dealing with this matter for the first time—since it deals with a very unfamiliar section of an almost unknown piece of legislation in our statutes—would have been able last evening to grasp the purpose of this bill. That is why I had some doubts as to whether I should have delayed until later my contribution to the debate on this bill. It seems to me that this is a typical case of a piece of legislation that comes from a departmental official who has had a brain-wave and says, "I think we should correct this; it is going too far." I say this, honourable senators, because there is one point in Senator Buckwold's speech that is quite revealing. As reported at page 371 of Hansard, he said:

Over the years, it has been the practice for crown employees to request approval by order in council to acquire territorial land for personal use, such as a summer cottage, a fishing shack, or that type of thing. This form of direct interest in territorial lands can be readily controlled and regulated within the machinery established to administer the lands in question; that is, through an order in council to deal with the physical acquisition of the land described.

Now I come to the main part that I want to draw attention of the Senate to:

On the other hand—and this is the major problem—there has not been one single instance of an employee requesting a similar order in council to purchase shares in a company or corporation with a land interest in northern Canada. Short of voluntary or accidental disclosure of any such interest by an employee, there is no satisfactory way of monitoring transactions between crown employees and the private sector.

I want to draw to the attention of the Senate that this legislation is based on no fact at all and no precedent that would justify the amendment. They say there is no reason for bringing in this legislation but they will bring it in anyway just in case. The result of proceeding in this way will be to reveal a lot of legislative shortcomings.

The Territorial Lands Act has been on the statute books for many years, but it deals only with the territorial lands of the Yukon and Northwest Territories. Section 2 of the act defines territorial lands as being:

—lands in the Northwest Territories or in the Yukon Territory that are vested in the Crown or of which the Government of Canada has power to dispose;

I therefore ask the sponsor of the bill about offshore rights or the seabed that the federal government claims to be within its jurisdiction, especially since the decision of the Supreme Court concerning the seabed off the British Columbia coast. That judgment refers only to the British Columbia coast, and I do not think it can necessarily be applied to the Atlantic provinces or to the Province of Quebec. What about those territorial lands? This bill is not concerned with them, and that is where, in, at any rate, my perspective, the prospect of conflict of interest is most dangerous.

It is quite obvious that today everybody is concerned about conflict of interest—shades of Watergate or whatever else you want. I do not think the piecemeal approach to a solution adopted in this bill is the right way to deal with this problem, or what the bill is trying to achieve. This problem of the federal property in the seabeds off the British Columbia coast is not covered by this piece of legislation, and my quick study of the Statutes of Canada indicates to me that there is no other legislation dealing with this problem if it ever arises.

The second thing is that this bill is trying to soften up the legislation as it stands today. Section 24 of chapter T-6 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, the Territorial Lands Act, says:

(1) No officer or employee of or under the Government of Canada shall, directly or indirectly, in his own name or in that of any other person, purchase or acquire any territorial land or any interest therein, nor shall he be interested as shareholder—

And I underline "shareholder".

—or otherwise in any corporation or company purchasing or acquiring such lands or any interest therein except by or under authority of an order of the Governor in Council.

(2) Every person who violates this section is liable to summary dismissal on the order of the Minister, but his dismissal does not affect the right that any person may have to bring against him any civil or criminal action.

This last part of the sentence is to me entirely useless.

In any event, what is provided here is that an officer of the government or employee of the government who acquires an interest in a territorial land or a share in a company which has an interest will be dismissed. The act tries to soften this up by saying that the order in council may apply:

(a) to a particular interest in a particular corporation described in the order or to interests in a class or classes of corporations described therein; and

(b) where the order so specifies, to a particular interest or to interests acquired before the making of the order.

When you read that you find that there is very little difference between the existing legislation and what this bill tries to achieve. We already have the provision of the order in council. We do not have any dismissal provided, but there is the possibility of an order in council. The only thing it achieves is to do away with the possibility of dismissal of an employee or an officer of a department who acquires such an interest, directly or indirectly.

However, this is not sufficient, first, because, as I said, it does not cover the real problem that we have today with the seabed, which may be under the jurisdiction of the federal government, and, secondly, because an officer of a department or an employee of the government may not know what a company in which he acquires a share or a few shares, especially of a public company whose stock is listed on the stock exchange, is doing.

Unless it is the intention of the government to use subsection (2) of the proposed new section 24 to exempt entirely from the application of section 24 all companies listed on the stock exchange—yesterday I mentioned CPR and Hudson's Bay Mining, and could have mentioned Bell Telephone, which I think Senator McIlraith mentioned—which must acquire some territorial rights under the federal government to operate the services in distant territories, like Frobisher Bay or some other such place, an officer of a department or an employee may buy some shares and, without knowing it, contravene this act. If it were the intention of the government to exempt by an order in council all these companies, the stock of which is listed on the stock exchange, and which may be operated in a public way under government supervision, for instance, then I think this is not at all the proper way to achieve this end.

The last thing I want to draw to your attention is that there has been published, as you know, a green book entitled Members of Parliament and Conflict of Interest. In this green book, and especially in the draft bill concerning the independence of members of Parliament, a rule is set down which is not followed here—although I do not know why—concerning members of the Commons or senators, saying that we may not participate in a government contract. Clause 4(1)(b) of the draft bill says:

if it is a contract with a corporation whose shares are publicly traded and the total number of the issued shares of the corporation held by or for the Member and his spouse or the Senator and his spouse, as the case may be, is not more than five per cent of the total number of shares.

This is an approach that appears to be logical on the surface. One may quibble about the percentage of shares allowed to be held by anyone. I think five per cent of the shares of a large publicly owned company is quite an important interest. That could be reduced to perhaps one per cent. But the point is that this avenue should have been followed in this piece of legislation.

For these reasons, I would suggest that the bill be referred to committee so that we can find out if there is something substantial behind it, and if it really will achieve what its initiator had in mind.

The last thing that I want to suggest that the committee deal with is a problem concerning the French version of the bill. It is faulty at certain points, but these shortcomings have been drawn to the attention of the officials, and it is my understanding that it is to be corrected by an amendment in committee.

For these reasons, I think this bill, although it would appear to be simpler than some of the bills we have dealt with up to now, should receive very particular attention in committee. I should hope that we would find out then if it is really useful, or if it is only the very limited plugging of a loophole, or the applying of an insignificant remedy to the problem the sponsor suggested it was intended to solve.

Senator Greene: Will the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Flynn: Yes, certainly.

Senator Greene: Am I to understand from his words that he doubts whether there is federal jurisdiction over the off-shore continental shelf, or over the seabed to the extent permitted by international law? If this is his concept—as I understood it to be from his speech—is he speaking for his party in putting forward that contention?

Senator Flynn: The honourable senator is always interested in dealing with something other than the subject matter at hand, but I have no objection to answering his question.

I have been very careful to say that that is a decision of the Supreme Court, that the seabed off the shores of British Columbia is under federal jurisdiction. I did not go further. If Senator Greene wants to know my views as far as the other seabeds are concerned—let us say those off the shores of the provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and even Newfoundland—I would tell him that I doubt very much that they come under the federal government's jurisdiction. This, however, is not directly related to this bill. I was just talking incidentally about this. If the honourable senator wishes to have a debate on this part of the matter I have no objection. All he has to do is put a motion on the Order Paper.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, in the absence of, and on behalf of, the sponsor of the bill, I would like to comment briefly on the remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition. I am in accord with his suggestion that this bill be referred to one of our standing committees. Last night the suggestion was made by the sponsor, and others in this chamber, that this bill should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. Even though this committee has within its competence matters relating to natural resources, I should have thought that this particular bill has only very little relationship with that subject. It deals rather with the operation of the previous legislation having to do with the acquisition of land by employees of the government.

I would suggest—and it is my intention so to move—that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, rather than the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. That is what I intend to do if the bill gets second reading.

Senator Flynn: I think it is a good idea, so that Senator Greene can raise his problems too.

Senator Langlois: I am not opening the door to him.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Langlois, bill referred to Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Martial Asselin moved the second reading of Bill C-214, to amend the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

He said: Honourable senators, in introducing this bill I shall not say it is a simple bill, because my leader does not like the expression. I will say instead that it is a short bill, and a not very complicated one.

This is a private members' bill which, in the other place, stood in the name of the member for Edmonton West, Mr. Marcel Lambert, and which received the unanimous approval of that house. This is why it is before us now. It is rare that private members' bills ever get beyond second reading in the other place, so it is obvious this one struck a very responsive chord.

The bill deals with the Electoral Boundaries Commission and the way in which that commission operates. The Electoral Boundaries Commission, to refresh our memories, is that body entrusted, under the terms of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, with the task of dividing provinces up into electoral districts. Prior to that commission's being set up, electoral districts were decided upon by a committee of the House of Commons, and what that boiled down to, in effect, was that a cabinet minister from any given province saw to redistribution, and the house committee merely went through the motions. Needless to say, the redistribution achieved in those circumstances was not at all objective. Political advantage was all too often the only consideration in the making of changes, and it was therefore decided to have redistribution carried out by an independent objective body.

Although this has been an improvement over the former system, it has not worked out perfectly well, and the bill before us represents an attempt to iron out some of the kinks in the system.

What the bill seeks to do is to require that the Electoral Boundaries Commission for a province, when making its report, support with reasons its recommendations concerning: (1) the division of that province into electoral districts; (2) the description of the boundaries of each such district; and (3) the representation and name given to each district.

The reason for this is fairly simple. Section 20 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act allows that, on a notice of motion, a member of the other place may object to recommendations made in a commission report. It compels him, however, to specify "the provisions of the report objected to, and the reasons for the objection."

It was thought by the member for Edmonton West—and the House of Commons agreed unanimously—that the rules of debate in that house would be better observed if the recommendations of a commission were reasoned amendments to which debate might more effectively be directed.

● (1450)

Having the commission's reasons why it has acted the way it has will serve to limit debate—which in the other place is not a bad idea at any time. When a member sees why the commission did what it did he may be driven to the conclusion that, all things considered, that was the proper course to follow. If he does not agree then, at least, he will be able to point out to the commission where he considers they went wrong. Being in possession of the reasons that led to their conclusions, he can point out errors of fact or interpretation or faulty reasoning, if such exist. This will make for much better debate.

[Senator Asselin]

The amendment is commendable because, while the commission system, in theory, might be better than the old method, in practice it has not always worked marvellously well. It would appear that, preparatory to making their recommendations, certain commissions have not gone to much effort to acquaint themselves fully with the electoral districts they were redistributing. Apparently their members have not even been conversant with some of the most elementary facts concerning the geography and demography of the areas under study. As a result, they have made many inadequate recommendations, which the politicians have been hard pressed to correct, not knowing precisely why the particular recommendations were made.

Section 13 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act sets down certain criteria to be used by a commission in reaching its conclusions. However, this has not proven satisfactory. There are still serious discrepancies in the decisions of the various provincial commissions. No one is suggesting that decisions based on the same general facts must always be identical but, surely, the same logic and a coherent philosophy should appear to have been relied upon in reaching conclusions.

This bill will serve to make the commissions explain their decisions and that is never a bad thing. Pronouncements ex cathedra do not have their raison d'être in anything that touches the political representation of citizens. People entrusted with the responsibility of making judgments on how and to what extent Canadians are to be represented in Parliament should be compelled to explain how they reach their various conclusions. That would seem to be elementary in a democratic system, but it was left out of the original act. The oversight is being corrected by this bill—and it is high time.

The bill deals with a matter of particular interest to members of the House of Commons. I refer to the redistribution of electoral districts and the fact that reasoned arguments should be given when changes are made by the commissions. Since this bill received unanimous approval from those whom it most intimately concerns, I think it should receive approval here also. Although I, personally, see no particular reason for sending this bill to committee, if any senator wants it sent to committee, I shall be pleased, as its sponsor, to move at the appropriate time that this be done.

I would refer those honourable senators who want to investigate or inquire about this bill to the proceedings of the committee of the other house where this bill was studied. They can look into the answers given by the returning officer who appeared before the committee and, in doing so, they will note that he agreed to the change proposed by this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Asselin moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 4, 1974

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Léopold Langlois moved the second reading of Bill C-42, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1975.

He said: Honourable senators, as you will no doubt recall, royal assent has already been given to two supply bills covering estimates for the current fiscal year. The first provided interim supply for the months of April, May and June. The second, assented to on October 30, 1974, provided full supply for the balance of the main estimates as well as full supply for supplementary estimates (A).

The bill introduced today provides for full supply for supplementary estimates (B), which total $1,749 million. These latest estimates consist of approximately $802 million in statutory items; $801 million in budgetary items; and $146 million in non-budgetary authorities. The total estimates tabled to date for 1974-75 consist of budgetary expenditures of $24,515 million and non-budgetary expenditures of $1,436 million, giving a grand total of $25,951 million.

The second supplementary estimates were referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on November 26 last. These estimates were discussed in committee on December 5 with the President of the Treasury Board and his officials. The form of the supply bill is the same as that passed in previous years, except that additional borrowing authority in the amount of $2.5 billion is requested. The first supply bill for the current year provided borrowing authority in the amount of $3 billion. This additional borrowing authority is mainly the result of higher than expected sales of Canada Savings Bonds. If honourable senators so wish, I am willing, later on in this debate, to give further information in this respect.

The supplementary estimates covered by this bill would seem to be quite large. Over $1,200 million—three-quarters of the total—results from inflationary pressures. Some of the items included are for new costs created by inflation, but a large number cover increased expenditures adopted by the government to ease the impact of inflation on Canadians. This is consistent with the government's established policy of selective counter-measures to alleviate the severe effects that can be caused in some sectors of our society by rapidly rising prices.

For example, the government has doubled the provision made for subsidies for manufacturing milk and cream from the original $125 million included in the main estimates. It has also provided additional money for the beef quality premium program which operated until August 1974, and which has now been replaced by a price subsidization program. These two items are covered in the estimates in the form of a payment into the Agricultural Stabilization Account.

In addition, in relation to inflation, these supplementary estimates provide for the following:

First, payments to the provinces under the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act which have been increased by $202 million. These additional payments are the result of increased tax yields in certain provinces largely attributable to the effects of inflation;

Second, compensation to the railways of $118 million to offset the freeze on the level of freight rates throughout this year; and

Third, an additional $125 million for contributions to the provinces under shared cost programs affecting hospital insurance and university education.

Another portion of these supplementaries relates to economic development and supply, including such items as $18 million more in capital subsidies for the construction of commercial and fishing vessels; $20 million for a loan towards the completion of the heavy water plant at Glace Bay; and $55 million in loans to the CNR and $19 million to the Northern Canada Power Commission for hydro projects in the north.

Finally, there are social measures including $30 million for Indian Economic Development and other needs of our Indian and Inuit population, and $90 million related to the Local Initiatives Program for this season and last season.

These estimates, as in previous years, seek authority to finance new items through complete or partial offsets in other votes in this same program or other programs of a ministry where funds can be made available through the exercise of restraint, or where changing circumstances permit lower expenditures. Items which are completely offset are treated as $1 votes in order to bring them before Parliament for authorization. Here again, if honourable senators so wish, I am ready to give further explanation or information concerning these $1 items.

There is a total of 25 $1 items included in these supplementary estimates. These items consist of (a) items authorizing transfer from one vote to another—13 items; (b) items authorizing grants—6 items; (c) item authorizing the deletion of debts due the Crown—1 item and (d) items authorizing the write-off of losses in working capital advances, loan guarantees and amendments to previous appropriation acts—5 items.

Lists of these $1 items have already been prepared and were distributed to members of the National Finance Committee for their review. They were considered at the meeting when the supplementary estimates were before the committee.

Honourable senators, I think I have covered the most important features of this bill and if some further explanations are requested then, let me repeat, I am at your disposal to try to supply the answers.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I wish to speak to one particular item that appears in the schedule, to bring to the attention of the Senate that at the last general conference of the United Nations Educational Scientific and Cultural Organization, UNESCO, held in Paris in November of this year, it was decided by a majority vote not to spend money already allocated to the State of Israel in the sum of $24,000 or $25,000.

Senator Grosart: Would the honourable senator give us the vote item to which he is referring in the supplementary estimates?

Senator Croll: I am speaking with reference to the heading of External Affairs. There is no one specific item to which I want to refer. My fear is that this money has already been voted and it may be spent.

I am told by the department that the contribution of the State of Israel to UNESCO is many times the $25,000 allocated. The Canadian contribution to UNESCO has already been voted, and so it is too late for me to ask you to do anything about that now and I do not so ask. But the Canadian contribution in the last two years has been $1.75 million, and for the next two years it is expected to be $2 million.

Canada voted for the general UNESCO budget, and I am told that it was discussed and voted on totally. It is after that that specific allocations for individual countries are accepted or rejected, and when the amount earmarked for Israel came to a vote, Canada voted against its rejection and against excluding Israel from the grant. However, the vote went the other way and Israel was excluded from the regional organizations, and cultural aid was withheld. This result came about through the endeavours this year of the communists assisted by the Arabs.

As I have said, honourable senators, nothing can be done now to withhold support since funds have already been voted and probably spent or, if not spent, at least committed. At this time the United States is seriously considering withholding any further contribution, and has so stated. Switzerland is cutting its contribution and other nations are ready to follow suit. Many European, United States and Israeli teachers, scientists and artists have declared that they will have nothing to do with the organization any more. My purpose in rising here today is to implore Canadians who contributed to UNESCO—teachers, scientists and others—to do likewise, and to withhold any contribution they have to make to UNESCO until such time as UNESCO comes to its senses.

This is an organization that has in the past actually prided itself on its non-political nature. This action will not enhance the agency's image abroad amongst scholars, intellectuals and other people of good will in the world.

I take this opportunity to serve notice that when money needs to be voted for this organization there will be others besides myself in Parliament who will raise their voices. At that time UNESCO will face a backlash, and a very heavy backlash, and I ask them to come to their senses and correct the wrong they are doing.

Senator Grosart: Could I ask the honourable senator a question of the very interesting point he has raised? I was aware of this in a general way from some statements made in the United States about their reaction. Is it the situation that we vote a lump sum to UNESCO, and then have no control whatsoever over the policy decisions that may be made, such as he has indicated, in respect of the spending of that $2 million? Is this the situation he is drawing to the attention of the Senate?

Senator Croll: You are quite right in what you say. A total budget is accepted. They then earmark so much for each country, and we have a vote on that earmarked money. We voted against denying this money to Israel, but we were in a minority.

Senator Grosart: Would the honourable senator in due course give us names of the countries that voted for this extraordinary decision by UNESCO, in view of the fact that UNESCO is said to have had a long background of non-political decisions? Hence the importance of the names of the countries who either abstained or voted against rejecting the UNESCO contribution to Israel. This goes far beyond UNESCO. It goes to the whole problem of our aid program, in which we have deliberately taken decisions not to allow political complexions of countries, or our political relationships with any country, to interfere with our general allocation.

I thank the honourable senator for raising this matter. I think it is something we should pursue in depth, because this could apply not merely to Israel. The same kind of situation could apply to any other country. UNESCO might decide that they are not going to extend various grants under the UNESCO program to Commonwealth countries or to any other country, and I think this is a matter that we should examine very, very carefully.

Senator Godfrey: May I ask the honourable senator a question? What is the proportion of money involved that has been denied to Israel in relation to the total budget of UNESCO?

Senator Croll: The total budget of UNESCO is $170 million.

Senator Godfrey: How much was Israel supposed to get?

Senator Croll: $25,000.

Senator Godfrey: $25,000?

Senator Croll: Yes.

Senator Godfrey: Are you suggesting that because they do not get $25,000 the other $169 million odd—

Senator Croll: We are contributing $1.75 million.

Senator Godfrey: But are you suggesting that everybody should stop contributing to UNESCO because of a decision not to give Israel $25,000?

Senator Croll: Yes. I am suggesting that, in order to correct this wrong, other people do not contribute to UNESCO. The people who contribute their services are scientists, artists and cultural people. I am suggesting that they withhold them. It is a very reasonable request. I am sure it will be heeded in the United States and other parts of the world, and I hope in Canada.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Before the motion is put, perhaps I may be permitted to remind honourable senators that a meeting of the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy will be held as soon as the Senate rises in Room 356-S.

Senator Grosart: Would the Deputy Leader of the Government be kind enough to tell us if there are any other committee meetings scheduled today after the adjournment of the Senate?

[Senator Croll.]

Senator Langlois: To my knowledge this is the only one. I understand the notice of this committee meeting has been sent out.

Senator Grosart: I am informed that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is now sitting, and that another committee—

Senator Langlois: We agreed to a motion permitting that committee to sit while the Senate was sitting.

Senator Grosart: I am aware of that, but I am informed that there is another committee that has called a meeting of its steering committee at the same time. As I understand it, we are in the position of having three committees sitting when the Senate adjourns.

I would again ask that there be some kind of control over decisions by committee chairmen to call meetings that conflict with one another. I would ask the Deputy Leader of the Government whether he will not consider having some kind of central control through the Committees Branch so that the committee chairmen have some knowledge of these serious conflicts?

Senator Langlois: I am glad Senator Grosart has raised this question. In his absence on official duty in Europe last week I put forward a suggestion, which I have discussed with the Leader of the Opposition, that there be a clearing house to co-ordinate the work of the committees, so that there is no undue duplication of their work. This suggestion has been accepted by the Leader of the Opposition, and I understand we are to have a further discussion on it this very week. I am glad this point has been raised, because this is a very important problem that we have to face and study.

Senator Grosart: Thank you.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE HONOURABLE RENAUDE LAPOINTE

CONDOLENCES ON DEATH OF BROTHER

Hon. Sarto Fournier (de Lanaudière): Honourable senators, I should like to say a word on the passing away of one of the brothers of Madam Speaker.

Others may have done so before me, but I should like to express to the one who presides over our deliberations with such discretion, modesty and competence, our condolences on the recent passing away of one of the members of her family, her brother. We did not know him. He probably lived like most good people, very discreetly, but performing every day, every week and every year throughout his life, his duty as a citizen.

On my own behalf—for I have no authority to speak for everyone, but I feel that each and all honourable senators share my point of view in this regard—I express to our Speaker my condolences on the loss that bereaves her. We therefore offer her the assurance of our deepest sympathy.

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I have had the opportunity, as indeed have the Leader of the Opposition and other honourable senators, to express personally our condolences to Madam Speaker.

I fully agree with the words just spoken by Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière) and, I am sure, so do all my colleagues.

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Neiman, seconded by the Honourable Senator Deschatelets, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill S-19, intituled: "An Act to amend the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Criminal Code".—(Honourable Senator Asselin, P.C.).

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I understand that Senator Prowse wishes to speak and I would yield to him, on behalf of Senator Asselin.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Has the Honourable Senator Prowse leave to speak?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. J. Harper Prowse: Honourable senators, I should like to thank the Leader of the Opposition for his indulgence. This bill is apt to be misunderstood by many people. Nearly all who have followed the news on the radio, television or in the press will be surprised to find that this bill does not make the use of cannabis or marihuana, legal in this country.

What we are concerned with on second reading is the principle or purpose of the bill, not the details of the various clauses. The purpose is to take prosecution for simple possession of marihuana out of the Narcotic Control Act. Under this act, all persons found in possession of marihuana have a heavy burden of proof thrown on them, and this is contrary to the doctrine which presumes that a man is innocent until proven guilty. Under the Narcotic Control Act—and as prosecutor I have seen this happen—there may have been evidence of a microscopic amount of cannabis having been in the pocket of a person's trousers. This was sufficient to put him into a position where either he had the burden of proving that he was completely innocent, had no knowledge of this and could have had no knowledge of it, or he would be faced with a conviction for trafficking and could be sentenced to life imprisonment. Now, that is the way the Narcotic Control Act reads.

But this is really a new phenomenon, one which has come upon us only since 1966. It was my privilege during the years 1963 to 1965 to act as the representative of the Minister of Justice and the Attorney General of Alberta in all prosecutions brought in Edmonton under the Narcotic Control Act. During that entire period it was considered a busy month if we had one case. Usually there were three cases every two months. That would have been the most we would ordinarily have dealt with during that entire period, and, of those cases, most of them involved known, hard-line addicts. In fact, during that whole period of time, there were only two cases which involved marihuana. One involved a person who had come up from the United States with seven ounces of marihuana hidden in his automobile—for which he was sentenced to ten years in the penitentiary. In the other case the narcotics squad of the RCMP, in making a routine investigation of known addicts, entered a building in which five or six users were gathered round, and the RCMP found on the floor the smouldering end of what turned out to be a cannabis or marihuana cigarette. As there was no particular proof of whose cigarette it was, we were unable to get a conviction. But during that two-and-a-half to three-year period in Edmonton, of all the narcotics cases we dealt with those were the only two involving marihuana.

In contrast to that situation, for the last seven or eight years the courts have been virtually inundated with cases involving cannabis. It is now the regular practice to have two prosecutors in the city of Edmonton to deal with prosecutions under the Narcotic Control Act, 99 per cent of which, as I say, deal with cannabis. I should say that there are a few cases involving LSD and one or two of the other mind-altering drugs as well.

I should like to refer for a moment to the LeDain Commission report. That report is still the subject of much controversy, but one thing all the commissioners were agreed on with respect to the end results of the use of cannabis was that cannabis was not, per se, or in a discernible way, the equivalent of heroin, for example, which is the hard drug with which we are most concerned and the use of which almost invariably destroys the user, not to mention the cost it imposes on society while that person is destroying himself or herself.

As Senator Neiman pointed out in her excellent introduction of the bill, more than half the people who are caught up in the use of this drug are adolescents. Unfortunately, not a few of them are barely beyond the age of puberty, which, as those of us who have raised children or can recall our own childhood know, is an age at which children experiment. Having suddenly become aware that they are in the world and are part of the society around them, they have an almost uncontrollable desire to try things out for themselves rather than to depend on what seems to them to be an endless stream of parental advice.

A great deal of damage has, in my opinion, been done by the kind of assumption that was made so frequently when the drug problem was starting, namely, that anyone who was going to use cannabis was going to end up using heroin. The experience of young people looking around in situations where experimentation was going on convinced them that that kind of statement, at least on the face of it, was utter, absolute rubbish, and they assumed that we, or those of us who were trying to give them advice, were not a credible source of information because we made that exaggerated statement, which they quickly found by their own experience to be incorrect. They came to the conclusion that we were old fogeys, that we should mind our own business, and that they could safely go ahead with what they were engaged in.

I remember talking one night to a young fellow of about 23 years of age who had done two years in the penitentiary for simple possession of marihuana. The LeDain Commission was then sitting, and he was wondering whether Parliament was going to legalize the use of marihuana. I said, "In no way will they be legalizing marihuana, or any of the other drugs." He said, "Why not? You legalized the use of alcohol, which has been acknowledged by many who have made a study of drug use to be the No. 1 problem in North America today." My answer was simply this: "What you say may be quite correct, but I am satisfied that if we were today dealing with the question of permitting the use of alcohol in our society for the first time, and in dealing with that question we had available to us all the information which years of abuse have given us, we would almost unanimously decide that the benefits were not worth the cost, and we would say, 'No way will we let it in.'" It is here, however. It is here to stay. As individuals and as a society we have to learn to manage it as best we can.

The tremendous increase in the number of young people using marihuana created a particular problem for the courts. All those engaged in the criminal justice system—the police, the attorney general's department and others—were satisfied that anything that had to do with the promotion or the use of hard drugs like heroin had to be treated as a very serious crime against society, and that even a first offender deserved a severe sentence. The result is that under the Narcotic Control Act, which places cannabis in the same category as heroin, if the court comes to the conclusion that a person was found in possession of cannabis and had it knowingly in his control—that is, on his person or in any of the circumstances included in the definition of possession—then he is automatically placed in the position where he is no longer charged with mere possession. The onus is on him to prove to the court that he did not have it for the purpose of trafficking. The presumption is that if he had any amount of the drug in his possession, no matter how minute, then it was in his possession for the purpose of trafficking and this carried with it a life sentence. Now, the penalties for possession of narcotics include seven years. They are all indictable offences. Here again I want to thank Senator Neiman for a very able description of what is meant by an indictable offence as compared to summary conviction.

So, honourable senators, magistrates all across this country found themselves time and time again having in front of them bright and able young people, boys and girls on the verge of manhood and womanhood, who had been carrying out what I would call normal experimentation for an adolescent, and the magistrates found they had to deal with them as though they were hardened users of narcotics such as heroin. These young people were faced with sentences of up to seven years, and even for mere possession the minimum sentence felt to be appropriate for conviction under the Narcotic Control Act was two years. This was penitentiary stuff. It meant taking a boy or girl out of grade 11, 12 or first year of university because of some momentary bit of nonsense, part of the normal process of growing up, and slapping them into a penitentiary with hardened criminals. When you do that, you are doing something to that person which in all probability will deprive society of the benefits that these people would be able to contribute to it after they had finished growing up.

This in turn led to two results. Magistrates were reluctant to convict, and wherever they could do so they started giving suspended sentences or various forms of probation. But these young people still had criminal records. Then we brought in the amendments to the Criminal Records Act by which, if these people subsequently showed that they had changed their ways and no longer broke the law, these records could be hidden away, but could, of course, be revived if there were further offences.

What this legislation before us now does is simply to say that for mere possession the person convicted will be treated under the Food and Drugs Act rather than under the Narcotic Control Act, where you find such things as "speed," for example, and amphetamines. I cannot remember offhand the schedule in which they are listed, but it also includes LSD and MDA and some of these mind-altering drugs. This change gives greater leeway to our courts to deal with these young people on the basis of the facts presented to them. They are not tied to a law written with something else in mind. All we are doing is providing the machinery which will enable the courts to deal with these people more reasonably, having regard to the facts with which they will be faced in each individual case without having to impose minimum sentences of seven years or having to accept responsibility for the various options thrown open to them.

But even here, honourable senators, we still retain the necessity for the accused person to prove his innocence until it becomes obvious that he is innocent, rather than leaving to the Crown the responsibility of proving his guilt until that guilt has been established beyond a reasonable doubt. Whether we might wish to change some of these things in committee when this bill goes there, as I think it should, is another question.

Let me say, based on all the information one gets, that the occasional use of marihuana in moderation by mature adult persons or by younger persons as a mere matter of experimentation is probably much less dangerous than some of the other things which they ordinarily might do. A single marihuana cigarette smoked by one person is very unlikely to cause his death, but a single bottle of whiskey consumed in one session by a person who has built no tolerance to alcohol will be fatal. As a matter of fact, I believe that even a "mickey" or a 12- or 13-ounce bottle of our 70-proof liquor gobbled down in one gulp could prove fatal for younger people or those who had never consumed liquor before. The danger with marihuana is that it is now being used in the high schools. This is where we want the police to be free to concentrate on the pushers, distributors and traffickers. As a person passes through puberty into adolescence and adulthood, he is faced with moving into a world in which he has lived largely in fantasy. He must then live in the world of reality as mature people must live out their lives.

If a person at age 14 finds that by the use of this cigarette, or of any other drug for that matter, it is possible for him to postpone facing up to reality, this then may become a way of life with him, and day after day he will refuse to face reality. These people escape responsibility by taking cannabis. This continues for three or four years and then their peer group, those of their own age, will have passed them by. At 18, by the time they will have reached the age of maturity, they will no longer have anything in common with their former age group; in fact, they will still be 14 as far as maturity is concerned. They become misfits in society, and are possibly beyond redemption.

I know a psychiatrist who became involved in a case of an 18-year old youth who was picked up as a user of marihuana, having been involved in the whole drug scene. He had played around with other drugs, which is a point I shall come to in a moment. The psychiatrist was called by the defence counsel to see whether he could help in the defence and if he could do anything for the boy. He said, because of the circumstances I have just related, that there was nothing he could then do for him. He could probably do something for the parents if they wished to come forward. He could have done something for the boy two years previously, but now he was so used to escaping from reality every time it faced him unpleasantly that the psychiatrist doubted if he would ever be able to learn how to face up to it in common with mature people. That is a pretty damaging thing to happen to an individual, but it is a true experience.

No one has accepted the argument that we are attempting to make access to marihuana easier. We are not doing that at all. We are endeavouring to enable the criminal justice system prevent the trafficker, the manufacturer and those who profit out of human weaknesses from operating. We do not want, as a corollary to that, to completely destroy a large segment of those who should be the leaders of the future.

Finally, I wish to deal with the suggestion that marihuana induces people to go on to heroin. There is no evidence that that in itself is true. But where a person uses marihuana in the company of people who habitually use other mind-altering drugs—those who are mainlining amphetamines and using heroin—it is a simple thing for that person to move on to other drugs, if he cannot be convinced of the difference between a drug that will not damage him too much if he uses it just once or twice and a drug that can undoubtedly damage him if he uses it at all.

So we are trying to let the Narcotics Act do the job which it was intended to do, and to move marihuana into an area where we can still go after the cause of our concern without having to go after the young person.

The number of people who go on to hard drugs do not do so because they use cannabis, but because, in order to use cannabis, they go into the drug subculture where the use of all drugs is common, and they are unable to make a distinction between the drugs.

At the time when most of us were going through that particular period of our lives, there were no non-dangerous drugs around. We may have wanted to experiment with the old man's alcohol supply, but the last thing in the world we were going to do was to shoot anything into our arms with a needle, or get involved with drugs.

Once young people discover they have been lied to about one drug, and they are in an area where other drugs are available—which are often pushed on them by the same people who pushed the cannabis—they will say, "Hell, I didn't even feel it. I might as well try the other thing and perhaps it won't bother me." That is where the damage lies. Not all users become addicts, but we cannot afford to have any addicts, because the cost to society is too great, apart from the cost to the addict.

We believe that these amendments will allow the police and law enforcement agencies in this country to deal with the key areas of production, supply, distribution, trafficking, and so on, without placing unfair and intolerable burdens on a great number of fine young people, on whom the future of this country depends, merely because of a moment's adolescent experimentation.

If, when considering the bill in committee, we look at it in that way, I submit, that we shall be doing a useful thing, not just for the young people of Canada in encouraging respect for the law, but also for the law enforcement agencies and the future of this country.

Senator McIlraith: I wonder if the honourable senator will permit a question?

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Senator McIlraith: In his remarks, which I found both interesting and useful, he used the expression "mere possession" several times, and at the conclusion of his remarks the expression was used in reference to the crime of possession. He referred to a young person who merely, in a moment's aberration, got possession of the substance. He went on to deal with the consequences of that type of situation. He said nothing about those who commit the offence of possession in a substantial way, as distinct from those who casually commit an offence. Since the offence in the legislation is possession and not mere possession, would the honourable senator care to elaborate on the other class of offence, possession only as distinct from trafficking?

Senator Prowse: Yes. The question of possession will now come under the Food and Drugs Act. The offence of possession is the same as that in the Criminal Code, physical control over any amount of the drug. The individual charged then has to establish that the drug was for his own use. The onus is on the accused to establish that it was for his own use. In other words, an accused has to satisfy the court that it was reasonable for him to have that amount of the drug for his own use. On the other hand, if the court comes to the conclusion, either because of the amount of the drug involved or the actions of the accused on being apprehended, that it is not satisfied it was for his own use, then he is subject to conviction of the offence of possession for the purpose of trafficking, which carries a much more severe penalty.

Also, on a charge of simple possession, the provincial court judge would have absolute jurisdiction to deal with the case. In other words, there would be no election. The offence would be dealt with by way of summary conviction, whereas under the existing legislation the Crown has an election as to whether to proceed by way of indictment or by way of summary conviction.

To summarize, if I was found in possession of cannabis and able to satisfy the court that it was for my own use solely, then, under this proposed legislation, it would not be a serious offence. On the other hand, if it was proved that I was in possession of the drug for someone else's use, or could not satisfy the court that it was for my use only, then I would be in much more serious trouble.

On motion of Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Langlois for the second reading of Bill C-42, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1975.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I compliment Senator Langlois on his excellent presentation in introducing this bill, and particularly on the frankness with which he dealt with one of the serious problems to which this bill gives rise. In the course of his remarks yesterday, he said:

The form of the supply bill is the same as that passed in previous years, except that additional borrowing authority in the amount of $2.5 billion is requested. The first supply bill for the current year provided borrowing authority in the amount of $3 billion.

That sounds, on the surface, like a very simple statement. However, as I hope to indicate to honourable senators, clause 5 of this bill causes a major constitutional problem for the Senate. If honourable senators will bear with me, I will read clause 5, because it is essential to the point I hope to make. It reads as follows:

(1) The Governor in Council may, in addition to the sums now remaining unborrowed and negotiable of the loans authorized by Parliament, by any Act heretofore passed, raise by way of loan, under the Financial Administration Act, by the issue and sale or pledge of securities of Canada, in such form, for such separate sums, at such rates of interest and upon such other terms and conditions as the Governor in Council may approve, such sum or sums of money, not exceeding in the whole, the sum of two billion, five hundred million dollars, as may be required for public works and general purposes.

Clause 5(2) reads:

Subsection (1) shall be deemed to have come into force on the first day of April, 1974.

Honourable senators, the problem arising out of clause 5 is the requirement under the British North America Act, the Financial Administration Act, and the Rules of the Senate that we cannot deal with any appropriation which has not been recommended by the Queen's representative. Rule 62 reads as follows:

The Senate shall not proceed upon a bill appropriating public money that has not within the knowledge of the Senate been recommended by the Queen's representative.

In this instance we are dealing with the appropriation of a sum of money that the Senate has no evidence whatsoever has, to quote the words of the rule, "within the knowledge of the Senate been recommended by the Queen's representative." On the other hand, the facts are that it has not been recommended by the Queen's representative. That fact was admitted, in effect, by the President of the Privy Council in speaking on this bill in the other place.

To indicate that I am not taking a political or partisan stand on this, perhaps I should say that there is also the clearest evidence, in the words of the President of the Privy Council, the Honourable Mr. Sharp, that he is very unhappy about the situation which developed because of certain strictures in the rules of the other place. In connection with this bill Mr. Sharp, as reported at page 2143 of Hansard of Wednesday, December 11, said:

I agree . . . that this was a most unusual proceeding. It was one that some of us were not aware of at the time the bill was introduced.

He then went on to say:

—I want to make it clear that I am not defending the procedure that followed. I hope we can avoid this sort of thing in the future.

Honourable senators might ask me to validate some of the general statements I have made. Perhaps I should begin by quoting the British North America Act, which applies equally to us as to the other place. Whatever the arguments may be about the power of the Senate—the authority of the Senate—to deal with financial bills, the fact is that if the Senate does not deal with this bill it cannot become law. Whatever the arguments may be as to whether we should refuse to deal with it or not, the fact is that unless the Senate deals with this bill, it does not become law. Section 54 of the British North America Act states:

It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill for the Appropriation of any Part of the Public Revenue, or of any Tax or Impost, to any Purpose that has not been first recommended to that House by Message of the Governor General in the Session in which such Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill is proposed.

Honourable senators might ask how the government got into this impasse. It happened quite simply. Instead of presenting the bill in the "usual form," the phrase which Senator Langlois used yesterday, the government decided, at the last minute, to insert clause 5. There was no reference to the $2.5 billion in the estimates—the estimates, of course, having been presented on the recommendation of the Governor General. Normally, this would have been in the estimates, as it was before in the appropriation bill we passed in March of this year. However, someone slipped up this time, or someone deliberately tried to get away with it—I do not know which. But it is clear that the whole procedure is unconstitutional. There are two sections of the Financial Administration Act, in addition to what I quoted from our rules and the British North America Act, which make it clear that this bill cannot be passed in its present form, or should not be passed in its present form. Section 45 of the Financial Administration Act states:

The payment of all money borrowed and interest thereon and of the principal of and interest on all securities issued by or on behalf of Her Majesty with the authority of Parliament is a charge on and payable out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

That makes it very clear that what we are dealing with is an appropriation, apart from the fact that it comes to us in the form of an act, the short title of which is Appropriation Act No. 4, 1974.

Section 46 reads:

All money required under section 44 to provide a sinking fund or other means of securing repayment of securities, the remuneration and compensation of registrars and fiscal agents appointed under section 42 and all costs, expenses and charges incurred in the negotiation or raising of loans or in the issue, redemption, servicing, payment and management of any loan and any securities issued in respect thereof, may, with the authority of the Governor in Council, be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

I quote those sections of the Financial Administration Act because somebody might say this is not really an appropriation, it is not the spending of money; it is the borrowing of money. The Financial Administration Act makes it very clear that because there are these charges involved—charges for the handling of the loan, interest thereon and, of course, the eventual repayment—then this kind of borrowing for which authorization is now sought is an appropriation dated back by clause 5(2) to April 1974. And I repeat, it is an appropriation which under the British North America Act, under the Financial Administration Act and under the rules of this chamber is unconstitutional.

Honourable senators might ask, "What do you think we should do?" The first option, of course, would be to follow our rules strictly, and I am quite sure there is no question that if we were to do that we would not deal with the bill, but would send it back to the House of Commons saying, "Sorry, but under our rules the Senate cannot proceed upon a bill appropriating money that has not, within the knowledge of the Senate, been recommended by the Queen's representative." I repeat, not only do we not have that knowledge, but we have the knowledge that it was not so recommended. Clause 5 was not recommended to the other place by the Queen's representative. That is the situation that faces us.

If we send the bill back to the House of Commons saying that under our rules we cannot deal with it, we shall immediately, of course, become involved in the old argument—to which the minister in the other place made a passing reference—as to whether we can deal in this way with a financial bill. It does not matter what the legal argument is. The facts are that if we say we will not deal with it, it cannot become law. Should we do that? I am not myself convinced that it should be immediately necessary to take that drastic action if the Senate is prepared to accept some easier alternative.

I suggest that there are two alternatives. One is that we refer the whole bill back to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

Senator Flynn: Not back.

Senator Grosart: The Leader of the Opposition corrects me. We can refer the bill to the National Finance Committee, because it has never been before the committee.

This raises, of course, another breach of our conventions, and an assurance that was given some years ago by the Leader of the Government that the Senate would not discuss the components of an appropriation bill before they had been before the National Finance Committee. In fact, the statement has been repeated over and over again in the last few years that that is the practice and convention of the Senate. I have to point out that this clause was never before the National Finance Committee. It was not in the estimates. Again I leave it to honourable senators to speculate why.

On that count as well as on the other it seems to me that if we want to find a way out of this we should at least send the bill to committee, where perhaps the minister will come and give some of the answers that I think he would like to give, because there was no opportunity to deal with it in the other place.

I say this without in any way criticizing the House of Commons, because under our rules that would not be permitted and I have no feeling of criticism. They suddenly found themselves bound by their own rules. On November 22 supplementary estimates (B) were laid on the Table in the other place. On December 10, Mr. Sharp, for the President of the Treasury Board, moved that supplementary estimates (B) be concurred in, and this was agreed to. Immediately Mr. Sharp moved that Bill C-42, the bill we are now considering, be read the first time and printed. That was agreed to, and he moved that it be read a second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole. At that point some questions were raised on clause 5, and I think the other place was in a mood to discuss this, but the chairman ruled that the committee was compelled "to pass the bill clause by clause, without debate." Under their procedure the bill went from first reading to second reading to being concurred in and third reading and passage all within less than ten minutes.

As I say, I am not in any way critical. The house was bound by its rules. The chairman gave that interpretation to the rules, and the matter, of course, could not be discussed further. The question was again raised on a point of privilege, but I shall not go into that. At that time the President of the Privy Council said that he did not like it at all, but there was no way out of it at that point.

So the bill comes before us. What do we do? I said one alternative was to refer it to the National Finance Committee. Another might be to refer only clause 5 to the committee, because that is the only clause in the bill that was not in the estimates and therefore not reviewed by the National Finance Committee.

Apart from the constitutional question and the obligation of Parliament to pay some attention to the British North America Act, to the Financial Administration Act, and to our own rules, there are other reasons why some questions should be asked about the bill in committee. When I say I have some doubts about the advisability of refusing to deal with it, I must add that I reserve the right to raise that point of order if the Senate is not able to agree to some kind of alternative that will at least put us in the position of being able to say, "We have done our best. At least we have given the minister an opportunity to answer some of these questions."

An amount of $2.5 billion is asked for in addition to the $3 billion that was granted previously by the March appropriation act. The government has extended its authority for debt financing by $5.5 billion. At the present time it has almost $5 billion of this in cash, because the Bank of Canada's weekly financial statistics statement, dated December 5, shows that the Government of Canada balance—that is, on the securities outstanding account—is $4.926 billion. We have absolutely no other information whatsoever, except a broad statement that this is for "public works and general purposes." From some of the evidence it is clear that it is not exclusively for public works, and nobody knows what "general purposes" are. That is another aspect I am quite sure the other place would have wanted to know about and which, had they not been bound by an anomaly in their rules, I am sure they would have insisted on knowing. That surely is the business of Parliament, to know the purposes, at least, for which the government intends to use supply, especially when it is in the sum of $2.5 billion, and particularly at a time when we must all be concerned about the federal government take from the GNP. The federal government debt—and that is the debt in this context—is up $4.2 billion in one year.

I think we would do some part of our job in the Senate if we refer this bill to committee and ask the minister, "What are you going to do with this? You have got $4.926 billion in cash on hand. Is it the intention to retire some of the national debt with this?" We know that there are maturing this year at least issues 425, 430, 435 and 452 totalling $1.7 billion; there are treasury bills in the amount of about $5.6 billion. Is that what this money is for? Is it going to retire debt, or will its effect be to increase permanently the ceiling of about $30 billion which Parliament agreed on as sufficient for this year?

We do not know whether this is a temporary measure on the part of the government—whether it wants this temporarily to retire some debt in order to retain the legal ceiling authorized by Parliament—or whether this will actually create a new ceiling. I shall not go into the details of that. It would seem to be important that Parliament, through the Senate and through the Senate committee, obtain answers to such questions and to some others—questions seeking information about what the government intends to do with the $2.5 billion that it asks us to grant.

I suggest, therefore, to the Deputy Leader of the Government that this bill be referred to the National Finance Committee for consideration as soon as possible. We on this side have no wish to delay the bill. That is not the purpose of the suggestion I am making. I say, however, on behalf of this side, that I would have to reserve the right to raise the point of order as to whether, under our rules, we can deal with this bill when the evidence is conclusive that, if we follow our own rules, we cannot in conscience deal with it. I am suggesting an alternative, for the reasons I have indicated.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: Is the honourable deputy leader going to close the debate? Before the debate is closed, I should like to know whether he is willing to refer the bill to committee.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I am prepared to reply to the remarks just made by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition without closing the debate.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Langlois: And I can tell the honourable Leader of the Opposition that I cannot agree to the suggestion that it was made in error.

Senator Flynn: I have no objection, if the Senate is willing to let the Deputy Leader of the Government speak now, on condition that he will not close the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is that agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Prowse: Honourable senators, may I ask Senator Grosart a question before we go any further? I am very interested in what he had to say about the overlooking of the consent of the Crown to this particular bill. Could he offer us an opinion on this point? It is one thing to say that we would be breaking one of the rules of the Senate, but does he consider this is a condition precedent so that the bill becomes a nullity because that condition precedent is not met? Or is this a situation where the Crown, by giving its consent by signature later, would be presumed to have corrected what is obviously an oversight?

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I am not a legal expert. This point has been discussed. There are various ways it could be handled. The proper way—and it is not my opinion that it is the proper way; this is the opinion of others—is that the President of the Privy Council who introduced the bill, and the same President of the Privy Council who said he was unaware that clause 5 was there, should have made the correction. He said he did not know clause 5 was in the bill, and he intimated that had he known it was there he would not have introduced it. Clause 5 could have been withdrawn from the bill and there could have been a recommendation from the Governor General and another bill introduced.

There are various ways in which it could have been looked at. The point is, from the authorities I have quoted, that there is no question that this does require a recommendation. It could be done. It does not nullify the whole bill, the whole intention of the government to get this money under the bill before us. It does not nullify that. It could be remedied.

The President of the Privy Council said, "I hope this does not happen again; we have to do something to make sure it does not happen again." So there is no question that the government is aware that someone has blundered here. That is not the greatest criticism in the world of any government, to say they have blundered. Every government blunders once in a while.

Senator Prowse: May I ask for the senator's opinion here? Would he consider rule 63 which says:

A bill of aid or supply shall not have annexed thereto any clause the matter of which is foreign to and different from the matter of the bill.

I do not know whether clause 5 of this bill comes under that or not.

If we proceed with this bill now, and if rule 62—and I presume a similar one elsewhere—is a condition precedent, then what we do is a nullity and everything is improper. Is this that kind of a problem, or is it something which can be corrected and caught up with by consent given later? This is the question I am concerned about.

Senator Grosart: The obvious answer is that there are many ways we can get around our rules.

Senator Prowse: Then it is not a nullity?

Senator Grosart: I am not sure whether we could suspend this rule. It is sometimes said that we can suspend any rule, that the Senate is master in its own house. But there are rules in our rule book the very nature of which suggests they should not be suspended—certainly not by mere leave, and possibly not even by consent. Whether this particular rule will come into that class or not, I do not know.

I hope Senator Prowse has the point of my remarks. I am really saying that we could suspend the rule, which would put us in a position at least to deal with the bill. We have already begun to deal with it, as we had a speech by Senator Langlois in introducing the bill last night.

Had we followed our rule, we might have said we should not have dealt with it. We on this side did not raise it at that time because we felt that there was a sensible way out. So we say the bill should be referred to committee. By so doing we in the Senate are, at least, putting ourselves in the position of having done something to improve it, instead of going against our own rules, against the British North America Act and against the Financial Administration Act. Then we will not be saying, "What do any of these acts matter? We do not care about them." That is all

I am suggesting. I am putting forward that alternative, while reserving the right—which would complicate the matter—to rise on a point of order to obtain a ruling on this, and that I do not want to do.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, the Chair would like to be very clear on this question. I understand that the remarks which honourable Senator Langlois will make now are only to answer some of the points or questions raised by the honourable Senator Grosart, and he will not be closing the debate. I would like to make that very clear.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I am pleased with the last sentence in the remarks of my honourable friend on the other side. He indicated that he was approaching this problem with an open mind when he said, if I take it correctly, that he was not willing to make a final pronouncement until he had heard what I had to say.

It is unfortunate that this storm blew up in the House of Commons. At this stage, I open a parenthesis to say that in my remarks I am far from being critical of the other place, or casting unpleasant thoughts on the remarks made in criticism here. We all make mistakes and we have to remember the old proverb errare humanum est. That is true today, and is probably more so in these Houses of Parliament than anywhere else, considering the pressure under which we are called upon to work on many occasions.

The tempest which blew up in the other place resulted from erroneous interpretations of terms used in the Constitution of Canada and the Financial Administration Act. It has always been considered, from time immemorial—and I have checked this with authorities—that a borrowing authority is not an appropriation, it is not an impost, it is not a tax. More than that, if my honourable friend is not prepared to accept this point, I bring to his attention the further point that whenever the Minister of Finance has been authorized by Parliament under the Financial Administration Act to borrow money, and the time comes to repay these debts, to reimburse the fund from which the money was borrowed, he puts an item in the estimates for the repayment of the borrowed moneys and at that point there is a recommendation by the Governor General—or, as in the case before us today, a recommendation by the Administrator of the Government of Canada—which is presented by way of a message to the House of Commons. I have checked that with the Law Clerk of the Senate. I also asked him to check with Mr. Gibson of the Legislation Section of the Department of Justice with respect to my interpretation, and Mr. Gibson has confirmed that my interpretation is correct.

But more than that, honourable senators, the interpretation I am putting before you has behind it a long-established practice in the other place of never including in the estimates, main or supplementary, any borrowing authority. The authority is sought only to comply with sections 36 and following of the Financial Administration Act, and thus give the Minister of Finance the authority to borrow.

When it comes to the repayment of these debts, then an item under Public Debt, under the Department of Finance, provides the necessary funds to repay these debts. That is where parliamentary authorization to spend public funds is given, and that occurs only after these repayments have been recommended to the House of Commons by either Her Majesty the Queen or by the Governor General or by the Administrator of the Government of Canada.

This is the situation, and this is the reason why the bill presently before us includes clause 5 providing the parliamentary authority which was not included in supplementary estimates (B).

My honourable friend remarked this afternoon that there was no opportunity to discuss clause 5 in the other place. I do not think the facts support that position. In the first place, I received my copy of Bill C-42 on Monday, and clause 5 was in it. Moreover, this is a copy of the bill as it was when it was introduced in the House of Commons. I reiterate, clause 5 is in it.

But let me continue. My honourable friend says that the house was not given an opportunity to discuss clause 5. Let me refer him to page 2138 of the House of Commons Debates of Tuesday, December 10, 1974. My friend will notice that Mr. Lambert referred to this borrowing authority, and to clause 5 specifically. Mr. Fortin also criticized clause 5, and asked the minister to state to the house what the rate of interest payable under these loans is.

If my honourable friend would check pages 2138 and 2139 of the Commons Hansard he will see that the members of the House of Commons knew what they were doing, and that they did, in fact, discuss clause 5 to some degree. They were not led into the dark by the mistake—and I admit it was a mistake—made by the leader of the house and, incidentally, some members of the Opposition. However, far be it from me to cast any blame on them. Anyone can make a mistake. After all, there are new members in the other house. There is a new Speaker, and the leader of the house is new in that function. I do not know whether Mr. Stevens who raised the point is a newcomer but, even if he is an oldtimer, I repeat, anyone can make such a mistake. We all make mistakes. We are not infallible.

Senator Grosart: May I ask the honourable deputy leader a question, since he has asked me to read page 2138 of the House of Commons Hansard for December 10?

Senator Langlois: Do you have a copy of it?

Senator Grosart: Yes, I have, thank you. I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government if he is aware that the discussion he refers to takes up not quite a column, and ends with this statement by the chairman of the committee:

Order, please. I ask the hon. member to resume his seat. I simply wish to refer him to the decision arrived at by the House last Friday which compels the Committee, at this stage, to pass the bill clause by clause, without debate.

Is the honourable deputy leader aware of that statement? Is he also aware of the statement that copies of this bill were presented to the members of Parliament only as the chairman of the committee was walking to the Chair?

That is the statement that was made in the House of Commons, and it has not been denied. Is he aware of that?

Senator Langlois: I was not aware of the particular statement you are referring to, but if you read further on page 2138 you will see that when clause 5 was called—"On clause 5—Power to raise loan of $2,500,000,000 for public works and general purposes"—the following exchange took place:

MR. LAMBERT (EDMONTON WEST): Could I ask the Minister of Finance to tell us the exact purpose of clause 5 which is in addition to the usual form of an appropriation bill? We are now being asked to approve the granting of additional authority to the Governor in Council to borrow sums of roughly $2.5 billion, as I read it. There may be a valid explanation, but I think it should be on record.

MR. TURNER (OTTAWA-CARLETON): The hon. member is very observant, as usual. The reason we need extra borrowing authority is because of the extra liquidity given to us as a result of the very successful Canada Savings Bond campaign.

And then the chairman spoke and brought to the attention of the members what my honourable friend has just said. But even after the chairman had said this, Mr. Fortin said:

Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I did not hear clause 5 was carried and I had a question for the Minister of Finance concerning the proposed interest rates on the $2.5 billion bond issue.

The chairman then said, "Order," and addressed a few remarks to the committee, after which Mr. Fortin rose once again and said:

Mr. Chairman, I rise on the same point of order. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, but I put the question at this point to show that we are now giving the Minister of Finance authority to borrow $2.5 billion. A completely ridiculous procedure. I believe this system of carrying the motion will be abolished when we debate amendments to the procedure.

So again there was a reference to the $2.5 billion borrowing authority sought by the Minister of Finance.

Senator Grosart: I know it is not the intention of the honourable deputy leader to mislead the Senate, but will he not agree that every statement he read from the Opposition in the committee was on a point of order, and that they were on a point of order because debate was not allowed?

Senator Langlois: Well, clause 5 is mentioned just the same.

Senator Grosart: But only on a point of order. There was no debate.

Senator Langlois: I do not want to be critical of the way the members of the House of Commons debate. It is not my function to criticize them. In fact, our rules forbid that we be critical of the other house.

Senator Grosart: I am not being critical of them, but I am critical of you for not giving us the facts.

Senator Langlois: I am simply reading Hansard. If you are not satisfied with what I have read, read it again yourself.

[Senator Grosart.]

Senator Grosart: Perhaps I can help the honourable deputy leader by pointing out that I am a little confused by his reading of Mr. Lambert's statement. In quoting Mr. Lambert, the honourable deputy leader pronounced it "as I read it"—in other words "as I have read it,"—whereas it should be "as I read it," meaning, "as I read it now." And Mr. Lambert did say, "as I read it," meaning "now," because he had just, at that moment, received his copy of the bill.

Senator Langlois: That may be so, but the fact is that clause 5 was discussed.

Senator Grosart: There was no debate, and it is a most important point that he had only at that moment received his copy of the bill.

Senator Langlois: Well, Hansard is there for anybody who wants to read it, and I am saying in answer to my honourable friend's point that the House of Commons did not know that clause 5 was in the bill and therefore did not discuss it.

Senator Grosart: That is right, they did not.

Senator Langlois: Even if it was done on a point of order, there is plenty of evidence to indicate that they were aware of that clause, and that they discussed it and asked questions of the Minister of Finance.

Senator Forsey: May I ask the Acting Leader of the Government a question? Did he not note in the chairman's statement the words, "without debate?" Those words are there repeatedly.

Senator Langlois: That has nothing to do with what we are discussing now. I do not want to discuss the position in the other place, or whether the chairman there was right or not. That is not my concern.

Senator Grosart: Senator Forsey is absolutely right. In his statement the chairman said that there was to be no debate, and that is the point we are making. Please do not tell us there was debate when, as Senator Forsey so aptly points out, the chairman said that the bill was to be gone through "without debate."

Senator Langlois: If I cannot convince you, I can only suggest that you once again read House of Commons Debates.

Senator Grosart: The chairman there said there was to be no debate. That is the answer.

Senator Forsey: There could not be any debate.

Senator Grosart: That is right. There could not be any debate.

Senator Langlois: But they did debate it just the same.

Senator Grosart: No, they did not. It was only on a point of order. Please don't insult our intelligence.

Senator Buckwold: There is more than one way to have a debate.

Senator Langlois: That is right. There is more than one way to have a debate, and they passed it. I am sorry that Senator Grosart's position is so weak that he has to resort to suggesting that I am insulting his intelligence—but that is his concern, not mine.

Now, the Honourable Acting Leader of the Opposition also made reference this afternoon—

Senator Flynn: That is good. Is it because I have been quiet that you are calling him the acting leader?

Senator Asselin: He is the deputy leader, but the leader is here.

Senator Langlois: I am sorry if I misspoke. I was looking for a note which I must have misplaced. Well, I have dealt with the points raised by my honourable friend, except for his reference to the Rules of the Senate.

● (1520)

I agree with him that rule 62 would prevent this chamber from passing this bill if we came to the conclusion that there is some illegality about it. I agree with that. I am not, however, prepared to agree with him when he says that the Constitution was violated, because we are dealing with the Financial Administration Act and not with the Constitution of Canada. When the mistake was made in the other place by both sides, and even by His Honour the Speaker, the leader of the house expressed the hope that this would not happen again and gave an undertaking to that effect. That would not have been good enough if there were some illegality about the bill, but it was accepted in the other place. However, if we passed it, and it were illegal, this bill would be unimpeachable.

I have before me Hood Phillips' Leading Cases in Constitutional Law, and I refer to the first chapter, the title of which is, "Parliament: (1) Legislative Supremacy: Act of Parliament not impeachable." This is from a decision in Edinburgh and Dalkeith Railway Company v. Wauchope, (1842), 8 Cl. & F. 710. I quote from the judgment of Lord Campbell:

I cannot but express my surprise that such a notion should ever have prevailed.

He was referring there, of course, to the proposition that an act of Parliament, once passed, could be attacked for vice of procedure.

There is no foundation whatever for it. All that a Court of Justice can do is to look to the Parliament roll: if from that it should appear that a bill has passed both Houses and received the Royal Assent, no Court of Justice can enquire into the mode in which it was introduced into Parliament, nor into what was done previous to its introduction, or what passed in Parliament during its progress in its various stages through both Houses. I trust, therefore, that no such enquiry will again be entered upon in any Court in Scotland, but that due effect will be given to every Act of Parliament, private as well as public, upon what appears to be the proper construction of its existing provisions.

Senator Grosart: Would the honourable Deputy Leader of the Government mind my asking him if he has heard of the British North America Act, because I did mention section 54? Is he suggesting that any act of the Parliament of Canada that contravenes the British North America Act cannot be nullified?

Senator Langlois: An act of Parliament is unimpeachable once it is passed.

Senator Grosart: Would the honourable senator tell us how many acts of the Parliament of Canada have been found unconstitutional by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council? He is talking about Scotland here, under a unitary system of government.

Senator Langlois: The supremacy of Parliament exists in Canada as it does in England, or Scotland, or wherever you want to mention. The Parliament of a nation is always supreme in its decisions.

Senator Grosart: Outside the British North America Act?

Senator Langlois: This is not a question of constitutionality. It is a question of procedure.

Senator Grosart: We are dealing with section 54 of the British North America Act.

Senator Langlois: In this case it is a question of procedure only.

Senator Grosart: It is not procedure, if I may so suggest to the honourable Deputy Leader of the Government. The whole point is whether this bill that is before us comes within the powers of the Parliament of Canada under the British North America Act, and some of our own rules.

Senator Langlois: On the other hand, the courts have decided the point. However, I have given an explanation, and my honourable friend has not challenged my position so far, that the borrowing authority in this bill is not an appropriation per se. That is the point. It has been considered in that way ever since Confederation, and I do not see why today, because we have newcomers in the other place—

Senator Grosart: Oh, no, no—

Senator Langlois: —we should decide to change a long established practice.

Senator Grosart: I am sorry to keep interrupting the honourable deputy leader, but he has said he does not want to criticize the other house or its members. He has referred to them on several occasions as newcomers, however, and has suggested that they are responsible. This is a direct criticism of the members of the other place. May I ask the honourable Deputy Leader of the Government if he has read enough of the background of this situation to realize that the main argument in this was presented by the Honourable Marcel Lambert, a former Speaker and a former minister of the Crown, who can scarcely be described as a newcomer to that place?

Senator Langlois: My honourable friend is jumping up in the air for nothing at all once more. He has got off the track with this tempest in a teapot that he has raised this afternoon, and now he wants to go off on another tangent. Well, that is his business.

When I commenced my speech I enunciated the old Latin proverb errare humanum est, and I explained that in Parliament we are prone to make mistakes, and newcomers are not exempt from this. I have been a newcomer myself in the other place, and I was prone to make mistakes at that time as I am still making them today, if for no other reason than we have to work under pressure. This matter only came to my attention late this morning, and I had to do some research on it. I spent a lot of time under pressure dealing with it, but if I make mistakes, it is not because I am a newcomer in the Senate—I have been here seven years now—but because I am human. Even an older member can make this kind of mistake if he works under pressure, as we are so often called upon to do. It was not my intention to direct unpleasant remarks at the members of the other place, and I said so in my opening words this afternoon. I cannot understand how my honourable friend can justify the position he has just taken in trying to ascribe that intention to me, and in trying to change the meaning of what I have said.

Senator Grosart: You made that remark in clear reference to Mr. Stevens, as Hansard will show.

Senator Langlois: I said that I did not know if he was a newcomer or not. I mentioned that.

Senator Grosart: All right. Let us forget it.

Senator Langlois: If you consider that an attack, let me point out that I also said that Mr. Sharp, the leader of the house, made a mistake in interpretation. He also made another one that I would like to point out. I did not particularly like this last one. I am sometimes accused by my friend of being too honest. There was one remark by Mr. Sharp which I find hard to accept.

Senator Grosart: And I referred to it.

Senator Langlois: Yesterday afternoon, when he was told by Mr. Baldwin that he should bring the discussion that occurred in the other place to the attention of the Senate, so that we would have time to prepare ourselves to deal with the subject matter in a decent way, Mr. Sharp replied:

Mr. Speaker, I would not concede the other place has that kind of jurisdiction over money bills.

Not only do I object to that, but I took that position this morning when this was brought to my attention, and before I came to the conclusion I have expressed this afternoon that there is nothing wrong with the legislation as introduced in this house, and in the other. I even told officials of the Treasury Board that if I came to the conclusion that there was any illegality attached to this bill I would propose one of two things—that I should either ask for leave to withdraw the bill, or move an amendment striking out clause 5. That was my first reaction. I am not bowing to my friend. This is the position I would take. I am now convinced by my own research and by advice I have received from persons in authority that the proper course was followed in this instance.

I now wish to deal with another matter relating to this bill.

Senator Flynn: If the honourable senator wishes to leave this matter and deal with the bill generally, then I must inform him that I also intend to speak on the points raised by Senator Grosart. If he wants to make his remarks closing this debate he can do so later, because I intend to speak further on the matter just raised.

Senator Langlois: I am not closing the debate, but I do not want to be repetitious.

Senator Flynn: You bet you are not closing the debate now. I want to speak on the points just raised by Senator Grosart.

[Senator Langlois.]

Senator Langlois: Do you want to speak now?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: It was understood that the remarks of Senator Langlois would not close the debate.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: If he wants to deal with the particular points presently at issue, he can go ahead; but if he wishes to concern himself with the bill generally, then the deputy leader will have to delay his comments, because I want to say among other things that I am very disappointed. I am very disappointed at the attitude taken by the Deputy Leader of the Government. I am disappointed at his implying that he will not agree to refer this bill to a committee. He says that he has consulted, that he has obtained opinions and because he is convinced that he is right in saying that this bill is unimpeachable—and I shall come back to that in a moment—there is no reason for the Senate to doubt his word, and that we should be prepared to accept his view and pass the bill.

Honourable senators, I think it would be completely unacceptable for the Senate to take the position that having been given the opinion of the Deputy Leader of the Government we should be satisfied and seek no further. I think this bill should be referred to a committee, if there is any doubt whatever as to any of the points raised, or points that could be raised, pertaining to its legality, its constitutionality or its propriety.

Senator Langlois has told us about the theory of British courts that an act of Parliament is unimpeachable in saying that when Parliament has passed a bill a court should not look into the procedure. That may well be so, but what is he suggesting here? Is he suggesting that if he can impose, with the majority that he has behind him, a decision which is illegal, nobody will contest it? Is it an invitation to the Senate to do away with our rules and to do away with our procedures? Is that what he is implying? Does he suggest that when we find something illegal we should not look into it?

Senator Langlois: I did not say that.

Senator Flynn: It is what you implied.

Senator Langlois: You are using your imagination.

Senator Flynn: No, I am not using my imagination. I am using the judgment that you have quoted. If there is something wrong with this bill—despite your view, despite your infallible opinion that it is correct—don't you think it is the duty of the Senate to correct it? You say, "We are not going to refer this to a committee. Nobody behind me wishes to know whether in the opinion of a committee this is right or wrong."

Senator Langlois: Nobody behind you?

Senator Flynn: No, nobody behind you. Perhaps I could apply it to some of the people around me as well because we are surrounded completely; we are outnumbered.

I say it is improper, honourable senators, for the Deputy Leader of the Government to take this attitude because it is the duty of the Senate to look into these matters whether they be problems of procedure, problems of propriety or problems of constitutionality, and the Deputy Leader of the Government should have acted right away to refer this bill to the appropriate committee so that we could look into this and get an opinion other than his own which, as he has himself admitted, is hearsay insofar as the Department of Justice and the Law Clerk of the Senate are concerned. I do not doubt that he has obtained these opinions, but I would rather hear them for myself in committee than hear them through him.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: That is the first point I want to make, honourable senators. The refusal to refer this bill to the committee is quite unacceptable.

The second point I want to make is this: let us look at the proceedings in the House of Commons for a moment. The government was not aware, or members of the government, to be more precise, were not aware, that Bill C-42 included the borrowing authority contained in clause 5. This is the implicit admission in the statement made by Mr. Sharp and which was read by Senator Grosart from page 2143 of the House of Commons Hansard. This is what it says:

HON. MITCHELL SHARP (PRESIDENT OF PRIVY COUNCIL):
Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member that this was a most unusual proceeding. It was one that some of us were not aware of at the time the bill was introduced.

Just imagine that, honourable senators. One member of the government—the house leader—is not aware of the provision in the bill.

Senator Grosart: And he introduced the bill.

Senator Flynn: Yes, he introduced the bill. And now the deputy leader tells us that the House of Commons knew what it was doing. That is simply not so.

Secondly, he said that the bill had been circulated for several days. This again is not the case. You just have to read the proceedings in the House of Commons and you will find that first reading of the bill was given that day. I think Senator Grosart quoted from the appropriate page:

MR. SHARP (FOR MR. CHRÉTIEN) thereupon moved that Bill C-42, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1975, be read the first time and printed.

Motion agreed to.

Then immediately afterwards it was given second reading. It is obvious from the facts of the situation, just as it is obvious from what has been quoted by the Deputy Leader of the Government himself—and here I agree with Senator Grosart—that Senator Langlois was misrepresenting the facts, as far as the proceedings in the other place were concerned. I regret to say that, but it is a fact. There was no debate. There would have been a debate, as is quite obvious from reading Hansard, if the opportunity had been granted, but there was none. It was an order of the house that the supply bill should be disposed of without debate. Why? Because it is taken for granted, and often it has been the case here, that a supply bill is only an enactment of the estimates which have been tabled and discussed and studied in committee. But that was not the fact in this instance. That is why the problem was raised in the House of Commons. It was raised previously in this place because very often the supply bill does not reflect exactly the estimates.

In this case, as was admitted, it does not reflect the estimates because the estimates do not provide for the borrowing power contained in clause 5. But there are other instances of which I shall give you two or three examples.

In this case, for instance, we have supplementary estimates (B), and clause 2 of Bill C-42 provides spending authority in the sum of $947 million. Then it says in clause 3(2):

The provisions of each item in the Schedule—
That is in supplementary estimates (B).

—shall be deemed to have been enacted by Parliament on the 1st day of April, 1974.

But this is not to be found in supplementary estimates (B). Do honourable senators realize what this means, in fact? It means that all the supplementary estimates (B), which are estimates that the government found afterwards it needed, could have been spent in advance by the government without any authority of Parliament, and thereby confirm illegalities. We are here giving retroactive authority to the government for the spending of these amounts. These amounts do not appear in the estimates, but they are in the supply bill, and I want to know a lot more about them.

The next point to which I wish to draw the attention of honourable senators is in connection with a bill which we discussed some time ago. With respect to the estimates it was completely the reverse situation. We provided $300 million for winter works, to be spent during three years—the current year and the two following years. That was contained in the estimates in the first section of the bill. We were providing for the spending of the whole amount set down in the estimates, which included the extra $300 million for that current year. Therefore, we were authorizing the expenditure of the $300 million during the one year rather than over the three years as had been provided in the estimates.

I raised that problem at the time here and in committee. We were given an opinion by the Department of Justice, but that opinion was not entirely convincing because, after all, these mistakes are not necessarily mistakes made by the Government, but rather, sometimes, by the officers of the department, and they tend, naturally, to attempt to cover their errors. I do not think we should do the same. We are not here to absolve public servants of their mistakes and we should not take it, as the Deputy Leader of the Government seems to be taking it, that these mistakes are necessarily to be attributed to the government. When we find errors we should correct them. That task of correcting legislative errors is not only within our competence, it is our principal duty, and we should not be afraid to carry it out.

Senator Grosart has insisted that we are not being critical of the government, but of a situation which should not have arisen and which we wish to correct. It is the duty of all senators here, of whatever party, not to hesitate a moment. If something needs correcting, then let's correct it. There's nothing to worry about. The government will not fall because we have done our duty. On the contrary, departmental officials will likely be more careful in the future. That is all I want. And if, in committee, we can be convinced that there is nothing to it, that it is a tempest in a teapot, then well and good. However, I am not presently convinced that it is a mere tempest in a teapot.

I remarked that the government was not aware of this borrowing authority contained in Bill C-42 and I have proven that. I have also proven that the House of Commons could not have been aware. That fact was proven quite clearly by the record of the other place and the point of privilege raised there yesterday.

Now I wish to mention that, on the point of privilege raised there with regard to this question, the Speaker could do nothing else but say that it was raised too late and that there was nothing he could do. The House of Commons is not a court of justice and the Speaker could not rule that the house had not proceeded according to the rules and regulations, or in accordance with the British North America Act. He cannot say that, because he is not a court of justice. He can only rule that the point of privilege should have been raised earlier, when he probably would have ruled that he could do nothing. That is the gist, I would say, of the ruling of the Speaker in the other place, which I maintain was correct.

Suppose, however, discarding the judgment quoted by Senator Langlois, that a bill is illegal and could be quashed by a court, which I contend it could. I do not mean if it is only a question of indifferent procedure, but suppose it could be quashed. Do you not think that it would be the duty of the Senate, before the bill receives royal assent, to correct the mistake so as to avoid litigation which could follow? My contention is that if a bill is adopted in contravention of an essential procedure of the Senate, or in contravention of the British North America Act, a court of justice could quash it. Therefore, if we find something wrong at this stage, we should do something about it and determine the question in committee. Again, I do not here rely on hearsay opinions of persons who have not appeared before us.

The legislation has been received in the Senate, and Senator Langlois stated that it is not an appropriation. Perhaps this is an argument which could be valid; perhaps borrowing authority is not an appropriation. I will say, however, that it is not correct to present a bill entitled "An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1975, and then proceed to include something which is entirely outside the scope of the title or the purpose of the bill. If borrowing money is not appropriation, then why include borrowing authority in an appropriation bill?

I will ask a secondary question: Why is the borrowing authority phrased as it is in clause 5 of the bill? Allow me to read it:

The Governor in Council may, in addition to the sums now remaining unborrowed and negotiable of the loans authorized by Parliament, by any Act heretofore passed, raise by way of loan, under the Financial Administration Act, by the issue and sale or pledge of securities of Canada, in such form, for such separate sums, at such rates of interest and upon such other terms and conditions as the Governor in Council may approve, such sum or sums of money, not exceeding in the whole, the sum of two billion, five hundred million dollars—

[Senator Flynn.]

I do not know, had Mr. Howe been here, if he would have considered this amount to be peanuts, that he would have said, "What's a million?" However, the clause continues:

—as may be required for public works and general purposes.

I underline the phrase "as may be required for public works and general purposes." Are you, or are you not, appropriating the funds raised under the borrowing authority comprised in this bond issue by saying "as may be required for public works and general purposes"? You may reply that it is not the intention to do so, but who knows? If Senator Langlois is right, that we should never worry about devices of procedure and language, the government could very well use the additional $2,500,000,000 provided by clause 5 for public works and other general purposes without any other authority than clause 5, and without having to explain anything by way of estimates.

You say it is not an appropriation, to which I reply that it is very questionable whether it is or is not an appropriation. What should we do? Again I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government to reconsider his position of not referring this bill to committee. In my opinion, if the bill is an appropriation bill, a money bill, as referred to in rule 62, or an appropriation bill as referred to in section 54 of the British North America Act—yes, the bill is certainly called an appropriation bill, as Senator Grosart indicates to me—if this is a bill falling under section 54 of the British North America Act or rule 62, we should have the sense of responsibility to look into it and introduce the necessary correction. If it is an appropriation bill, then especially have we no choice but to inform the government that we will delete clause 5, and it can introduce another piece of legislation requesting the authority of Parliament to borrow $2,500,000,000.

Do you not think that this is really the thing to do? It is quite obvious that the Commons have been taken by surprise—not only the Commons, but even several members of the government. We should give them the opportunity to consider this matter. I, for one, would hate to think that the House of Commons did not know what it was doing when it passed this bill. We want to give them an opportunity to reconsider, to adopt a bill which would give, properly, clearly and knowingly, power to the government to borrow this huge sum of $2.5 billion.

We should, if we really believe that we are here for a useful and valid purpose, act in accordance with that purpose and make the recommendation that appears necessary. It may be technical or it may be substantial—I do not know—but one way or the other, we are here for this purpose and we should get on with it.

I have often met people in what is now the National Assembly of Quebec, who regretted the abolition of the Legislative Council because they are now unable, without the Council, to make corrections to legislation, corrections of the type called for here. Less than two weeks ago a minister of the Quebec government told me precisely that.

If we do not have the courage in the Senate to do this, to seize this opportunity to do our duty, then we will deserve the criticism that has so often been levelled against us.

We must do something about this matter. I urge Senator Langlois to refer this bill to committee. We shall look into it there. If we reach the same conclusion he did, that there is nothing to worry about, then, very good; but if we are able to help Parliament, if we can dispel any doubt, any hesitation, or clarify any problem—be it of propriety or procedure, or of the rules of the Senate as they apply to a matter like this—then we shall have done an excellent job.

Again I urge the Deputy Leader of the Government to reconsider his position. We have a marvellous opportunity to justify, in terms that can be understood by the people, why we are here. We have an opportunity here to do that for which the Senate was created—to take a second look at legislation and correct it, if necessary, before it goes any further. Shall we miss this occasion? I hope not.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

EMPLOYER-EMPLOYEE RELATIONS IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Olivier has been substituted for that of Mr. Francis on the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday, December 16, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

In accordance with the usual practice, I should like to outline the business to be dealt with next week. As I mentioned to the Leader of the Opposition in private this morning before the sitting began, my original intention had been to make the motion for adjournment for Tuesday evening, but when I was informed of the amount of work in sight for us next week I had to change my mind, as it is obvious we are going to have quite a busy week.

In addition to the legislation now before the Senate, it is expected that we will receive at least three bills from the Commons next week. On Tuesday, the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture will meet to continue its consideration of Bill S-10, to amend the Feeds Act; the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will meet to give further consideration to Bill C-15, respecting oil and gas in Indian lands. Bill C-14, to incorporate the Federal Business Development Bank, may also be referred to that committee. The Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will also meet on Tuesday. On Wednesday there will be meetings of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee and the Transport and Communications Committee, the former to continue its study of competition in Canada and the latter its examination of the television program, "Les Beaux Dimanches."

Next Thursday there will be meetings of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Statutory Instruments and of the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service. The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will meet next week to consider Bill S-20, to amend the Territorial Lands Act, but the date and time of that meeting has not yet been determined. A notice will be issued in due course.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, concerning the business for today, we have been informed that His Excellency the Governor General will be here at approximately a quarter to twelve to give royal assent to certain bills. May I ask what is expected of the Senate today in dealing with the program at hand? I am assuming that after royal assent we will not resume the sitting but will adjourn until Monday night, in which case we have approximately 25 minutes left now in which to deal with the matters that are before the Senate. May I ask what is expected of the Senate in this short period of time?

Senator Langlois: As you have suggested, as soon as royal assent is over it is proposed to adjourn until Monday evening. As for the time left to us now, I intend to move in a few minutes from now that we adjourn during pleasure to await the arrival of His Excellency the Governor General.

DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE ACT*BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Langlois, seconded by the Honourable Senator Croll, for the third reading of the Bill S-15, intituled: "An Act to amend the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce Act."—(Honourable Senator Grosart).

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I intend to stand this order, but as the adjournment on third reading is in my name I feel I should ask the deputy leader if there is any particular urgency for disposing of it now. If there were, I could speak on it, but my time would seem to be rather limited. Nevertheless, I want to make it clear that I have no intention of holding this bill up if there is any urgency in having third reading.

Senator Langlois: There is no urgency at all. It is a Senate bill and will have to go to the other place in any event so that it could not possibly get royal assent this morning. There is no urgency at all.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

At 11.45 o'clock His Excellency the Governor General proceeded to the Senate chamber and took his seat upon the Throne. His Excellency was pleased to command the attendance of the House of Commons, and, that House being come, with their Speaker, His Excellency was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the Immigration Act.

An Act to amend the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

An Act respecting the Boundary between the Provinces of Alberta and British Columbia.

An Act to amend the Fire Losses Replacement Account Act.

An Act respecting British Columbia Telephone Company.

The House of Commons withdrew.

His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, December 16, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Monday, December 16, 1974

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report of the Department of Transport for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1974, pursuant to section 34 of the Department of Transport Act, Chapter T-15, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of a contract between the Government of Canada and the Municipality of Wetaskiwin, Alberta, for the use or employment of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, pursuant to section 20(3) of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, Chapter R-9, R.S.C., 1970 (English text).

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, may I suggest, because of the importance of the supply measure, Bill C-42, and the fact that our numbers are somewhat diminished this evening owing to adverse weather conditions, that we deal with this item tomorrow when more members will be in attendance. I simply put forward this suggestion for the consideration of the Opposition.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I presume this suggestion would normally come when the Orders of the Day are called, but certainly we have no objection to it. We welcome it, having regard to the fact that the Leader of the Opposition is not here. This is a matter of such importance that the Leader of the Opposition should be here when it is being dealt with further. He regrets that he is snowbound in Montreal, but he is on his way.

Senator Langlois: It is a good place to be snowbound.

DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

The Senate resumed from Friday, December 13, the debate on the motion of Senator Langlois for the third reading of Bill S-15, to amend the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce Act.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, as you know, this bill was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, whose report was accepted by the Senate. I should like to compliment the chairman of the committee, Senator Everett, and Senator Flynn and others who were responsible for suggesting an amendment, accepted by the Senate, which would increase some of the safeguards to privacy which were originally in the Statistics Act, but which were not carried through into this bill.

I should like to make some further comments on two other matters raised in committee, and again I thank those responsible for raising them. As honourable senators will recall, the purpose of this bill is to give detailed and special access to the papers of the collectors of customs and import documents to officials of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, as well as the access presently allowed under the Statistics Act to sworn employees of the Department of Statistics Canada, as it is now known.

One of the matters which I and others raised, when this bill was before us on second reading, was the extraordinary situation by which the access permitted to the sworn employees of the Department of Statistics Canada by virtue of the Statistics Act had been extended, by what was called an "interdepartmental arrangement," to the employees of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I am glad to see that that question was discussed in committee. We have the simply amazing situation where the officials quite frankly said, "We may be expressing ourselves in bureaucratese when talking about interdepartmental arrangements." They admitted quite frankly that although there was an implied prohibition in the Statistics Act to the disclosure of this information to anyone other than an employee of Statistics Canada, at the discretion of the minister to whom Statistics Canada reports, or that of the Minister of National Revenue, this was extended by what is called an "interdepartmental arrangement" to the employees of another department. They then come before us and say, "We have not got all the access we need. We want more." In the discussion they said, in effect, "Well, we kind of admit that the way we went about it was rather circuitous. We now want to regularize this."

I want to suggest at this time, because we have a Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, that that committee might want to take a careful look at this, to see how the discretionary power given to the minister can be extended indefinitely, as it was in this case, in spite of the clear intention of the Statistics Act to limit this to certain employees who would be sworn. As the act now stands, this can go on forever. There is nothing now to prohibit another "interdepartmental arrangement" extending access to this information to any employee of the Government of Canada, or an importer, or an interested man from the street, or anybody else. I think it should be on the record that this is the situation we are now facing.

Perhaps I can quote the chairman of the committee. He said:

What do you mean by "an interdepartmental arrangement"?

Mr. MacKinnon, replying for the department, said:

By way of an interdepartmental arrangement with Customs, between Revenue (Customs Division) and Statistics Canada.

THE CHAIRMAN: You mean that, up to date, the customer would consent so that you could see the record that you now want statutory authority to see?

MR. MACKINNON: It was worked on the basis of this interdepartmental arrangement. One of the conditions was that any employees who were permitted to see a document had to be sworn in under the secrecy provisions of the Statistics Act, section 6.

Then Mr. Ritchie, another official of the department, broke in and said:

Honourable senators, perhaps I may explain it. We may be expressing ourselves in bureaucratese when talking of "interdepartmental arrangements." The legal basis on which we had access was in terms of employees of our operation being sworn in under the Statistics Act, pursuant to the provisions of that act, and therefore, having access to these documents.

So, we have the clearest possible case of the bureaucrats—and this is the word the departmental representatives used—saying, "We can extend this thing indefinitely."

There is nothing clearer than that the original intention was that the number of persons who could have access to this information would be limited to employees of Statistics Canada; but because there was a secondary requirement that those employees be sworn, the interdepartmental arrangement was, "Well, anyone we want to have access to the information, we can swear."

So, they took the supplementary condition and made it the primary condition. They can still say, "Anyone we want to swear can have access." There was a discussion as to whether a temporary employee, who was just employed by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce for one day, could be sworn. Apparently under the act they can bring in anyone, swear him, under their interpretation, and this person then has access to the documents.

The official said again, replying to the chairman:

Mr. Chairman, that is the rule which has been adopted in the past and part of the reason why we are hoping to get this through.

There again, honourable senators, that is the clearest evidence that the department itself knows that it has gone far beyond the intent and perhaps, even, the letter of the act, and now it comes before a Senate committee and says, "We were all right, but we must get this through now." In other words, "We were wrong." And this is the kind of nonsense presented to a committee of the Senate.

Finally, he said, "You know, we were going rather a circuitous route which has, among other things, some technical implications," and he says, in effect; "You know, we had to take a taxi and go all the way downtown; we don't want to do this any more; we don't want to go that circuitous route." But they have gone this circuitous route of making a complete mockery of the statute as it stood.

My second point relates to another situation. I had raised the point that this announced policy of the department to go through invoices ad lib and say, "If we can find anything here that is now imported, we can then suggest to a Canadian company that they can make this, and then perhaps we will subsidize it," I suggest would be clearly recognized around the world as another form of non-tariff barrier, the very kind of thing that Canada more than anybody else is seeking to take out of the general spectrum of international trade. This point was raised, and the reply from the departmental official was, "That, senator, is a far cry from a policy of import substitution behind the protection of non-tariff barriers."

I was not able to be in committee because I was in Europe talking to some of the officials of the countries who are members of the European Community, and I raised this very point with them. They said, "Well, of course, that has already been recognized by the OECD as a kind of non-tariff barrier." Yet we have officials saying that it is not. "This is not a non-tariff barrier. We are not going to use it that way at all." A little later under questioning the same official, talking of explicit policy under the provisions of the Textile and Clothing Board, said:

—we have in Canada under the provisions of the Textile and Clothing Board pursuant to which we undertake an import analysis for the purpose of considering measures of restriction.

And an import analysis is the very thing we are talking about. If that is not creating a non-tariff barrier, then I do not know what it is doing. It is fair to say that the official was making a distinction between the automatic extension of import substitution under this bill and the restrictive use of this material that might be used where there was explicit policy. But still it is very clear that this authority, this additional access we are asked to give, can be used for trade restrictive purposes. Again it is fair to say that the officials said that the use envisioned would not constitute such an infringement. This is all very well, and we are glad to have the officials say that they do not intend to use it in this way in spite of the fact that they say they have already used it in this way. However, we will have to take their word for it, and I hope that the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will take a continuing look at this kind of situation, because as I understand it that is the purpose of the structuring of that committee, to see at what point the discretionary power given, here will flop over into other restrictive practices that will be highly damaging to Canada's position in international trade.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, since I dealt with this bill on second reading and proposed certain amendments to it, I feel I should rise following Senator Grosart's speech and perhaps deal with some of the points he made.

I believe he said that the practice of the department makes a complete mockery of the old Statistics Act. I am afraid I cannot agree with his point on that. The department has had an opinion from the Department of Justice which, as I understand it, is that the actions of the department have been entirely legal and within the ambit of the Statistics Act. However, if that opinion is wrong, then, in fact, Bill S-15 brings such a practice under the direct control of Parliament. I am sure the honourable senator will agree that that is to be commended; that it is far better to bring such actions under the direct control of Parliament than to leave them as a departmental arrangement under the Statistics Act.

As to the question of the non-tariff barrier, this bill attempts to provide information on which Canadian manufacturers can build manufacturing plants to produce goods which are now imported into Canada. This is something that is done to a far greater degree than is proposed in this bill by both the United States and the United Kingdom. Indeed, at the present time this does not offend the GATT rules. It is permitted under the GATT rules and, surely, the protection is that if the department officials go too far and use this as a form of import substitution, then the matter will be raised under the GATT rules, and Canada will have to act accordingly. However, I do not believe that Parliament, in dealing with a legitimate situation under the GATT rules, should assume that those rules may be broken.

In my opinion, we are indebted to Senator Grosart for raising the point. In his speech, which I both heard and read, and which I thought was an excellent speech on the subject, he indicated that this is the type of situation which could arise. Therefore, we are warned and apprised that it is possible but, with respect to the honourable senator, I do not consider it a reason for not proceeding with this bill, which puts this practice, which is allowed under the terms of GATT, directly under the control of Parliament.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

COMMUTATION OF SENTENCE—QUESTION

Leave having been given to revert to Question Period:

Senator Riley: If the accused kidnappers of Raymond Stein, and murderers of two policemen in Moncton, New Brunswick, are convicted of kidnapping and murder, is it the intention of the Leader of the Government in the Senate to participate in the commutation of their sentences?

The Leader of the Government is not in his place this evening. I do not want to put him on the spot, but I should like to have that question answered.

Senator Langlois: Let it stand as notice.

NATIONAL FINANCE

ESTIMATES OF MANPOWER DIVISION OF DEPARTMENT OF MANPOWER AND IMMIGRATION—MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE AND REPORT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Douglas D. Everett, with leave, pursuant to notice for Tuesday, December 17, 1974, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine in detail and report upon the estimates of the Manpower Division of the

Department of Manpower and Immigration for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1975.

He said: Honourable senators, in addition to its prime function of examining the spending estimates of the government in each fiscal year, the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has in recent sessions undertaken detailed examinations relating to areas assigned to it by the Senate.

The first examination was the operation of the Canadian economy, during which the committee received written submissions and verbal evidence from leading economic thinkers throughout Canada and around the world. The result was the publication of our report, Growth, Employment and Price Stability, which is considered one of the most important reports on the operation and management of the Canadian economy to be published in the last decade.

In the last session the committee decided to hold hearings on Information Canada. These hearings related not only to Information Canada itself, but to the management and control of information services throughout the federal government, which the committee estimated cost the Canadian taxpayer in excess of $200 million per year. The ensuing report, Information Canada, was given wide publicity by the news media throughout Canada. Not only did the report detail guidelines for the operation of Information Canada, but it also recommended methods for the control of information expenditures throughout the federal government.

In the motion which is presently before the Senate, the committee is seeking the power to examine the operations of the Manpower Division of the Department of Manpower and Immigration.

In our study of growth, employment and price stability it was pointed out that the Canadian economy is largely managed by the main economic levers of monetary, fiscal and exchange rate policies. While the proper deployment of these policies can result in an economy that is achieving its potential growth with price stability and full employment, these policies cannot deal with the structural problems of the economy. These structural problems can create a tight labour situation in one segment of the economy at the same time that very high unemployment is being suffered in another segment. Accordingly, our report recommended certain manpower policies which are designed to reduce structural unemployment to a minimum. It is this type of policy which is administered by the Manpower Division of the Department of Manpower and Immigration.

The Manpower Division is spending approximately $550 million in this fiscal year. It operates 390 manpower centres across Canada, and these manpower centres are charged with the responsibility of finding jobs for unemployed Canadians. Manpower centres undertake a number of functions in fulfilling this responsibility:

1. They act as employment agencies.
2. They counsel those seeking employment.
3. Through contractual arrangements, they provide training for job seekers to improve their skills as required by the job market.

4. They provide advice and assistance to employers to enable them to fill their job vacancies.
5. They arrange on-the-job training programs with employers.
6. They provide mobility grants to bring job seekers to areas where jobs are available.

In addition, the Manpower Division administers special programs for groups that have particular problems in the job market. They also administer job creation programs, such as LIP, OFY, LEAP and CEP.

In examining the work of the Manpower Division, it is not the initial intention of the committee to find fault with the principle of job creation or, indeed, the present methodology. Rather, we wish to discover whether, in practice, the operation lives up to the theory. The sort of questions we will ask are these:

1. Do job seekers find Canada Manpower centres effective in getting them jobs?
2. Do employers make use of Canada Manpower centres in filling job vacancies?
3. What is the quality of the counselling provided to job seekers at Canada Manpower centres?
4. Are the training programs provided by these Canada Manpower centres training job seekers who are fitted for job vacancies?
5. Is the mobility program working?
6. Could employers provide better information to Canada Manpower centres about their job vacancies?
7. Are Canada Manpower centres providing fast, efficient and courteous service?
8. Are the special services provided to disadvantaged job seekers effective?
9. Do the job creation programs have a worthwhile cost effectiveness?

We are presently inviting submissions and general information from job seekers, employers and others who have had experience with the operations of the Manpower Division. In the New Year we propose to begin hearings and to receive evidence from officials in the various operations of the Manpower Division; from job seekers and employers; from training organizations; and from persons who have specific knowledge about the implementation of Manpower policies.

The work being done by the Manpower Division is important to the Canadian economy. The question your committee wishes to ask is: At $550 million per year, is the Canadian taxpayer getting his money's worth?

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, when a motion is set down for a specific date, it is unusual to ask for unanimous consent to advance it. Some honourable senators may have planned to speak on this motion tomorrow, the date for which notice was given, although I do not know. For that reason, I think the debate on this motion should be adjourned.

While I am on my feet, I commend Senator Everett for his motion respecting such a study. I think it would be a very useful exercise. Senator Everett may not be aware that about 12 or 14 Canadians returned over the weekend from a two-week visit to West Germany. The purpose of that visit was to study the very successful manpower training, and employment and unemployment, programs in West Germany.

The group consisted, I think, of four members of Parliament and representatives of industry and labour, and in addition was led by officers of the Canadian Council of Social Development. They will be able to make representations to the committee when this study gets under way in the new year.

On motion of Senator Benidickson, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in moving that the Senate do now adjourn, may I say that this is going to be a busy week for the Senate. We shall be sitting every day this week. I know we all appreciate the efforts made by honourable senators to brave the snowstorm of eastern Canada in order to get here this evening. Hopefully our numbers will be larger tomorrow so that we can get on with the very important business that will be before the house.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

REPRESENTATION BILL, 1974

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-36, to provide for representation in the House of Commons, to establish electoral boundaries commissions and to remove the temporary suspension of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Perrault, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 5, 1974

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-45, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1975.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I think we have a convention here that an appropriation bill such as this is not presented to the Senate until it has been reported on by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. Is that not a fairly well-established convention here?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, this bill involves only one item. It was not referred to the committee in the other house. Moreover, it is a simple bill. Of course, that expression is taboo in this house, but in any event I do not think honourable senators would find it necessary to send this bill to committee. I should point out that I consulted the Leader of the Opposition, who seemed to be in agreement with the suggestion of giving it second reading later this day.

Senator Flynn: Yes, I agree with that position. There is no surprise in respect of this bill so it can be sent to committee afterwards. However, if this had been the case with Bill C-42 we would have had no problem.

Senator Langlois: That will come later.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report of the Superintendent of Insurance for Canada on Small Loans Companies and Money-Lenders licensed under the Small Loans Act for the year ended December 31, 1973.

Supplementary Estimates (C) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1975.

INDIAN OIL AND GAS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Macnaughton, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-15, respecting oil and gas in Indian lands, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Langlois moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, December 12, the debate on the motion of Senator Neiman for the second reading of Bill S-19, to amend the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Criminal Code.

● (1410)

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I would like in the first place to congratulate Senator Neiman for the introduction she made of the bill now under consideration. As usual, she has done it with much tact, intelligence and in clear and concise terms.

I also wish to congratulate those senators who took part in the debate—Senator Sullivan, Senator Hicks and the others who also made a contribution.

It is a sensitive question and I find it difficult. The bill referred to the Senate by the government gives rise in that institution to an extremely important and sensitive discussion. This debate, as you know, is followed very closely by the young generation who is requesting that major changes be brought to the use of marijuana and cannabis sativa. It is also followed, as we see in newspaper reports, by the older generation who, by the way, would like Parliament to pass a stricter legislation on the use of marijuana, a legislation with teeth which could possibly provide harder penalties than at the present time.

These two positions are therefore totally irreconcilable, because the older generation find it difficult to adapt to changes as sudden as those which youth have undergone these last few years. I believe the Senate should take its responsibilities courageously, without show of emotion, and consider in what way we could bring about changes acceptable to society as a whole.

Let us say, first of all, that the present status quo is no longer acceptable. It is not a remedy to solve the problem and correct the situation. The use of cannabis sativa has become a custom and a habit amongst about 50 per cent of our young people. By taking a step backward, we would show to the young generation unforgivable ignorance of the problem we are faced with.

What arguments, medical, scientific or legal should we put forward to find a positive and intelligent approach to the solution of the problem we are faced with?

I think we all have looked through the LeDain report on this complex matter. There again, having read this report, we are unable to come to final conclusions about the consequences of the use or non-use of some drugs.

We heard a very learned dissertation by Senator Sullivan, a doctor of great reputation who demonstrated to us that, in his opinion, the use of marijuana by the young necessarily led to harder drugs. Other doctors hold opposite opinions.

The fact still remains that from what I read and heard on the question it is not proven that marijuana is used by our young as a whole and that it inevitably leads to harder drugs later on. I know a good many who have used and still use marijuana and are satisfied with that drug; they do not go for heroin or other high potency drugs. So let us say that those are debatable solutions that are not conclusive. We are still doing research.

I read recently that an American doctor, Margaret Mead, a researcher of international reputation on those questions of narcotics, could not reach the same conclusion as some scientists, or doctors, as to the damageable effects of marijuana on the health of individuals.

Of course, I would not go as far as discussing the conclusions of researchers and the medical conclusions of those who studied that question but I conclude from all that that we still do not have sure evidence that the use of marijuana necessarily has disastrous effects on humans.

So the fact now still remains that when in a society a law is not respected by a large proportion of its people consideration must be given, of course, to amending it. That happens in all countries. We had evidence of that in the twenties when the United States prohibited the sale of alcohol. They were forced to pass legislation to abolish it.

The bill before us does not even get anywhere near the drug problem. It merely softens the penalties for the convicted. I think it is an extremely negative approach to the question, an extremely negative approach.

Of course, the government of this country, like any other government throughout the world, is in hot water, when the time comes to deal with drugs and marijuana. However, I contend that by introducing this bill reducing penalties, the government is not considering all the aspects of the problem we are faced with. It does not solve the problem in any way. If we want to be realistic, we must find out what the actual situation is and not close our eyes to the truth. I think we must resolutely come to grips with it.

More and more Canadians today smoke marijuana. That is a fact. On the other hand, thousands of young Canadians have criminal records because they were found temporarily in possession of marijuana. Some of them were unlucky enough to get caught, not while trafficking but having marijuana in their possession; these young people are often invited to smoke a "joint" and the police, coming unexpectedly, catch them. They are brought to courts. They are sentenced and get a criminal record in the process.

The present legislation does not do away with the criminal record at all. The offence is merely transferred from one statute to another, but the consequences are the same for the young people who have criminal records. We know that in Quebec a youngster who has a criminal record will never be able to become a professional man. He will be unable to study law or attend medical school. He will be unable to study engineering or become a notary.

The third finding that we must make is that the underworld controls the sale and importation of drugs. It is the underworld or the mafia, in other words. There is no reference to it in the bill.

At the present time, the government has no educational program to make people aware of the consequences of the use of the drug involved. There is no national scheme. There is no television program. There is no researcher going through large centres to advise young people and people generally. No. We only have a legislation prohibiting the drug. In addition, marijuana sold on black market is often of a very poor quality, thus endangering the health of the users.

What does the government do to meet the existing situation? We are presented with a legislation alleviating penalties for possession of marijuana, for trafficking, for importing, and for growing it. As regards statements that penalties are alleviated for possession, I am in complete agreement with Senator Hicks, who gave the example of an individual found with marijuana, who had to prove to the court that he had the drug, not for trafficking purposes, but for his own personal use. This is contrary to the main thrust of our Criminal Code, according to which the accused is innocent until the Crown proves him guilty. The burden of proof is reversed, as it was by the act pertaining to automobile drivers found with more than 0.8 per cent alcohol in their blood. People were forced by an act of Parliament to incriminate themselves. Moreover, when it is established that the percentage of alcohol in the blood is above a certain degree, there is no possible defence. There is automatic conviction. It may be stated that the Supreme Court made a ruling on this issue. This is so. But the fact remains that this is contrary to the Criminal Code. Criminal law provides that the accused is innocent until the Crown proves him guilty.

I agree that in committee this provision of the bill should be amended as indicated by Senator Hicks.

What does Bill S-19 do? It is simply aimed at controlling demand, but in no way controls demand, traffic nor possession. May I repeat, honourable senators, the bill makes absolutely no change in the existing situation.

Prime Minister Trudeau told young people in 1973—that this was reported in the August 12, 1973 issue of the Calgary Herald—the Prime Minister told those young people he was meeting that in his opinion drug use was a personal matter. It was comparable to alcohol. In saying so, the Prime Minister was not encouraging young people, and he said so too, to use or smoke marijuana or cannabis. I think he was reflecting an important concept of the legislator to the effect that the State should not consistently dictate every individual his personal behaviour by passing legislation. A clear cut distinction between morals and the law should be made here. The act which is passed by the legislator aims at protecting society as a whole. People with a philosophical background know quite well that morals are what prompt an individual to choose between two alternatives. That choice is extremely sacred to the individual. The State has too often tried to pass legislation in order to dictate the individual's personal behaviour. He is denied every freedom of action. The State wants to solve every individual matter of conscience.

Looking at this bill, I think it suggests no motivation, no spirit to tell young people: stop smoking marijuana and other similar drugs. There is nothing to that effect in the bill. In imposing sentences, it only has a negative effect. Penalties are somewhat less stringent, but you will still have a record if you are found guilty of being in possession of drugs, even temporarily.

Honourable senators, we have been through—and you possibly even more than myself—that experience of the 20's when—as I was saying—a prohibition act was passed in the United States. The rocketing sales of alcohol, with the consequences you know, during those years have never been matched, simply because an act prohibited alcohol consumption, an act to impose prohibition. This is human nature and it cannot be changed. It was not changed in 1920 and it will not be changed in 1974.

As I said before, the underworld and the mafia control the sales of drugs.

I repeat that, in this society, the laws of the state have to be changed when a large minority of people no longer obey them. That is indeed what we do every day here and in the House of Commons. How many pieces of legislation passed 25 or 30 years ago are sent back to us simply to be adapted to current circumstances through our modifying, changing or amending them. Therefore we have to face the fact that thousands and thousands of Canadians, most of them young people, use drugs, that it has become, as various senators said, almost a national disaster, and that the Canadian society is being endangered by a minority of citizens. What must the state do? I do not want to shock anybody today, but I will be outspoken. I think that, if we pass this bill as it is now, we are not facing up to our responsibilities, because we do not go to the heart of the problem. We simply adopt a legislation for people to say: Parliament has gone into the matter. We have passed a legislation to reduce penalties. But what is that in terms of educational means for the population and the youth?

What will that stop? What will stop the traffickers, the pushers, from obtaining drugs and reselling them? Is it the penalty? We have extremely severe penalties, but that did not stop those people. I suggest that in the same way most provinces control the sale of alcohol the government should consider similar action with respect to marijuana and certain drugs.

I said earlier that the legislation now before us only controls demand. It does not control possession. It does not control sale in any way. I know of no perfect mechanism whereby the government could control sale. However, if the government were to set up a mechanism to control sale, possession would be controlled at the same time. This would mean that minors would be protected; they could not buy it. That would also mean that the product sold by the government would be of better quality. That would equally mean that traffickers would have no more market since sale would be made by the government. Sale would be controlled by the government. Then, we would, of course, need legislation with teeth to deal with those who would be caught trafficking, extremely severe legislation that could even provide imprisonment for a first offence for those who, despite government control, would still engage in illegal sale. Severe legislation would be necessary and, I repeat, legislation with teeth. We would need legislation sentencing to imprisonment those convicted of trafficking.

Honourable senators, I expressed in a few words my opinion on the present legislation. This debate, as you know, is being followed by the whole Canadian people, and the Senate has a challenge to meet. We must do it with pride, without emotion. When this bill is sent to committee we will have to voice our personal opinions and if amendments and changes need to be made, we will have to do it. I put this question to you; honourable senators, are we going to pass a legislation—the bill now before us—which I think falls far short? This bill, as I say, does not settle in any way the problem we have to solve. On the other hand, do we want to lose forever the necessary means to correct an unacceptable situation? That is I think the challenge the Senate must accept.

[English]

Hon. Fred A. McGrand: Honourable senators, this bill is the result of serious consideration by the departments of government concerned with the drug problem in Canada. It does not offer a final solution. It recommends for the present the course our society must take to cope with addiction to drugs.

Marihuana has been compared to alcohol and to the hard drugs. Alcohol is a water-soluble drug that is eliminated quickly from the body. Marihuana is a fat-soluble drug that accumulates in the fatty tissue and is eliminated slowly. It has a very high affinity for brain tissue with the possibility of either short-term or long-term damage. It can produce sharp personality changes and can lead to a marked deterioration in what is considered good mental health, and it gives a false feeling of well-being.

Marihuana is one of the oldest and most widely used mind-altering drugs known. The Chinese described it in their literature almost five thousand years ago. It has been used in India for religious ceremonies for over two thousand years. What part it has played, if any, in the decline of ancient civilizations is not known, but it has been found in tombs erected at that time. Marihuana is used by about two hundred million people throughout the world today. Until recently it was used mainly by the lower socio-economic minority groups.

The plant contains a large number of different chemicals, only a handful of which have so far been separated and studied in depth. The main constituent that affects the nervous system of man is known as THC. In the body, this substance undergoes metabolic changes so that at least one product is several times stronger in the body than as originally found in the plant. Another recent research finding in the field of learning and education has demonstrated that marihuana interferes with the transfer of knowledge from the short-term memory bank to the long-term storage from which it may be retrieved at a later date. The importance of this finding is that if young people take this drug, it interferes with their acquiring knowledge, developing skills and absorbing the countless facts that shape future personalities and abilities. Furthermore, the presence of marihuana in the body may effect a change in the chromosomes which carry the whole genetic background from one generation to the next. It can lead to mutation of certain cells.

During this debate, it has been emphasized that this bill is not a surrender to those who would legalize marihuana. If marihuana were legalized, there are those who would try to put on the market what they would consider a better prepared and less dangerous product.

We live in a very permissive society. The death penalty which only a century and a half ago was the punishment for 240 crimes against the state is now limited to capital murder; even so it has not been carried out in Canada for the past decade. If this bill passes and becomes law, you can be sure that a year or two from now there will be a campaign to remove some of the restrictions on marihuana: if people have the right to smoke it, then they have the right to buy it—and to buy a safer product, of course; and, if people cannot buy it, they must grow their own. There are also commercial interests that could put a so-called improved product on the market in a matter of months. The arguments will be that if technology can take the caffeine out of coffee, it can take the dangerous elements out of marihuana, and that, even if it is harmful to the individual, the individual surely has a right to it so long as it does not harm others. Again: is it fair to deprive one person of marihuana and yet encourage another to buy alcohol by permitting a distillery to advertise whisky? Is it more habit-forming or does it cause more psychological dependence than reading murder mysteries, watching television or playing cards?

Those who advocate a change in the law can produce a thousand users who will declare that over the years they have smoked they have never had the desire to turn to hard drugs; a thousand criminals will declare that their "life of crime" was never influenced by marihuana; commercial interests will assure the public that they can produce a harmless product. I would like to know more about the extent of this habit. Is marihuana a passing wave that is now at its crest and will fade away in the next generation?

This problem has been around for a long time—time enough for us to have most of the answers. Is it true that the majority of teenagers who smoke marihuana give up the habit in their early twenties? And what percentage of smokers in their early twenties are still smoking in their thirties? No doubt there will be demands to lessen the controls on marihuana; it will be argued that people have the right to do their "own thing" and groups will probably appear on Parliament Hill urging "marihuana on demand". There is in the United States today a powerful lobby group known as "the National Organization for the Repeal of Marihuana Laws", and there is now a hearing in progress before the United States Senate.

It can also happen here!

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I should like to add a few comments to the debate on this particular piece of legislation. We have heard a number of constructive and well-thought-out assessments of this bill. Without reservation I should like to identify myself with two of them, one being the comments just made by Senator McGrand, and the other the excellent assessment of this legislation given last week by Senator Lawson.

It has been pointed out repeatedly that this bill is in no sense a solution to the drug problem as we know it today. In fact, it does not purport to be. If there was an obvious solution to a problem of this magnitude, it undoubtedly would have been translated into legislation long ago. We have to recognize that there is no simple solution to this problem, which has been with us for a long, long time, and which has reached increasingly serious proportions in recent years.

The basic fact we have to keep in mind in discussing this question is that prevention is certainly far more effective than attempted cures. We spend a tremendous amount of effort and money on care and rehabilitation for those whose lives have been partially, if not wholly, destroyed by the illicit use of drugs, but we do not spend nearly enough time on or give enough attention to the aspect of prevention, which I believe is the key to dealing with this whole problem. I have tried to examine this legislation from that standpoint. Frankly, I cannot see that this legislation contributes anything in the area of prevention. The specific provisions of the bill are of no great significance, but the psychological impact of this bill is entirely contrary to any real concern in the field of prevention.

Senator Lawson pointed out in his speech last week that, rightly or wrongly, the public assessment of this legislation and the assessment in most of the news media of Canada, has been that it represents a backing away on the part of the government from the degree of concern it has had over the illicit use of drugs. That conclusion is perhaps unwarranted, having regard to the provisions of the bill, but it is the interpretation that has been placed on this legislation in many newspapers and in many comments on the legislation.

Certainly, this impression has become quite firmly established in the public mind, and I submit that that in itself is detrimental to the concept of prevention. Anything that gives to our young people the erroneous impression that the use of marihuana, or of the more severe drugs, is not a matter of deep concern, certainly contributes nothing to efforts to prevent the destruction of people's lives in this way.

As has been pointed out, there is considerable conflicting medical opinion as to whether the use of marihuana does lead inevitably, or in the majority of cases, to the use of more damaging drugs. My own belief is that it does, but I cannot submit any very meaningful argument in support of that belief, because there is a conflict of medical opinion. I do, however, submit that whether the use of marihuana inevitably leads to the use of more serious drugs, it is a door, perhaps the principal door, most frequently used by young people for their entrance to the drug subculture of our times. For that reason it assumes an importance far greater than would otherwise be the case. Anything that gives young people the impression that this common entrance into the drug subculture is to be treated as less serious than in the past, constitutes a disservice to our young people. It is an unwise and undesirable step to take.

The other aspect of the bill with which I cannot agree is the provision for the lessening of penalties for those possessing marihuana for the purposes of trafficking. I recognize all the arguments that have been advanced about the right of the individual to mar or destroy his own life, if that is his choice. There is a counter-argument to that, but let me set that aside for the moment. The trafficking in any drug for the profit of an individual or group of criminals at the expense of the well-being and even the lives of thousands of young people, is one of the most serious offences committed against society today.

Any proposal that the penalty for trafficking be reduced in any way causes me great concern. I personally would go much further than even the present law. I have been an advocate of the retention of the death penalty for murder, and I see little difference between destroying a young person's life through the use of drugs and destroying it outright. Perhaps that is beside the point for the purposes of this bill, but I point out that under the present Narcotic Control Act, possession for trafficking, even of marihuana, can lead to life imprisonment. Under this bill it is reduced to a maximum of ten years, which, under our present way of coddling criminals, probably means about four years. This is a serious and retrogressive step.

I am not going to labour this matter. I express these concerns because I believe they are shared by many thousands of citizens across this country. They are certainly shared by thousands of parents who have gone through the agony of seeing their young people's lives marred or destroyed as a result of something held to be a harmless thing but which in the end leads in so many cases to the use of more serious drugs, with the terrible consequences that result therefrom.

It is my sincere hope that when the bill is examined in committee, much attention will be given to its psychological impact on young Canadians rather than merely to its legal provisions, which are minor and in a sense insignificant. That is not the direction in which the danger lies. Rather, it lies in the psychological impact, and that must be our concern.

On motion of Senator Petten, for Senator Davey, debate adjourned.

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, December 12, the debate on the motion of Senator Langlois for the second reading of Bill C-42, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1975.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, it is not my intention this afternoon to speak at any length on this bill. Indeed, I am not even going to discuss whether or not a borrowing resolution is an appropriation, or if the bill is in conformity with the British North America Act, or the Financial Administration Act, or with our own rules and regulations. I do think, however, that since a controversy has arisen as to this bill, it cannot be resolved unless the bill is sent to committee where it can be gone over in detail with people who have knowledge of these matters.

You will recall that the Deputy Leader of the Government mentioned the other day that when he first read the bill he had some doubts as to its legality. He said that he told the officials of the Treasury Board that unless he was convinced as to its legality he would either withdraw the bill or move an amendment to clause 5. He went on to tell us, if I recall correctly, that after having done some research and having received advice from persons in authority, he not only was convinced of the legality of the bill but he was convinced that the proper course had been followed.

Honourable senators, I am sure he will understand that it is no reflection on him when I say that we too would like to have the opportunity of hearing from these "persons in authority". We would like to know who they are and to question them in committee to obtain the benefit at first hand of the advice they gave him.

There is another reason why this bill should go to committee, and I feel it is a good one. It is simply that I have not heard any good reason why it should not go. It would be greatly in the public interest for this bill to go to committee because the authorization sought concerns $2.5 billion. That is a very large amount of money even in this day and age, and yet authorization was given in the House of Commons without debate. And all that is said is that this is "required for public works and general purposes." I would think the Minister of Finance would welcome an opportunity to appear before our committee and tell the people of Canada what he proposes to do with this huge sum of money. What are the public works he has in mind?

What are the other purposes he has in mind? He is asking too much of us when he says, "Leave it to me; trust me." Perhaps we do, but at the same time I think he owes it to the people of Canada to give some indication as to how this vast amount of money is to be spent.

Honourable senators, all I ask today is that the Deputy Leader of the Government reconsider his position and allow this bill to go to a committee.

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: Are you closing the debate now?

Senator Langlois: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if the Honourable Senator Langlois speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, it is not my intention this afternoon to rehash the debate which took place on Thursday last, even though it was, to my mind, a very interesting one. However, I should like to open my remarks today by endeavouring to reply to some of the questions put to me in the course of this debate. These questions were raised, first of all, by the Leader of the Opposition, and I want to refer to what he had to say at page 393 of Senate Hansard when he posed his first question. This is what he said:

In this case, for instance, we have supplementary estimates (B), and clause 2 of Bill C-42 provides spending authority in the sum of $947 million. Then it says in clause 3(2):

The provisions of each item in the Schedule—
That is in supplementary estimates (B).

—shall be deemed to have been enacted by Parliament on the 1st day of April, 1974.

But this is not to be found in supplementary estimates (B). Do honourable senators realize what this means, in fact? It means that all the supplementary estimates (B), that are estimates that the government found afterwards it needed, could have been spent in advance by the government without any authority of Parliament, and thereby confirm illegalities. We are here giving retroactive authority to the government for the spending of these amounts. These amounts do not appear in the estimates, but they are in the supply bill, and I want to know a lot more about them.

My reply to this long question—

Senator Flynn: It was not a question; it was an affirmation.

Senator Langlois: It is an affirmation or a question, or a mixture of both, but my reply is that, first of all, there is no item contained in the supply bill presently before us which is not contained in supplementary estimates (B). I am unable to understand when my friend refers to $947 million—this point was not too clear to me—and adds that this is not in supplementary estimates (B), and then refers to the retroactive effect he was complaining of, but I would try to enlighten him by referring to page 5 of supplementary estimates (B). I have a copy in my hand, but I do not know if my honourable friend has a copy.

Senator Flynn: Go ahead, and I shall try to follow you.

Senator Langlois: On that page he will see six columns and if he looks at the total of the fifth column he will find an amount of $1,748,658,100. By looking at the third column on the same page, he will see the total of statutory expenditures is $801,502,500. If my friend deducts the latter amount from the previous one I mentioned he will find that the result is the $947 million to which he referred. In other words, honourable senators, this is the difference between the total of the budgetary expenditures and non-budgetary expenditures less statutory payments. When these first two totals are deducted the real amount voted under these estimates is $947 million.

Senator Flynn: I never said that.

Senator Langlois: You said it was not included in the estimates, and I say that it is there in black and white but you have to do a little calculation to get at it. That is the only explanation I can find for my honourable friend's being unable to find it.

Senator Flynn: If my honourable friend will allow me, I point out that he has completely missed my point, as his advisers seem to have done also. What I said was the amount that we were invited to spend, the $947 million, was not in the original main estimates. This refers to amounts which the government required after the main estimates. Therefore, honourable senators, why say that you could spend these amounts as of the 1st day of April when, in fact, you are being asked now to vote these amounts. That is the only point I made. I am not questioning the figures given by the Deputy Leader of the Government.

Senator Langlois: Well, I don't want to start a second battle of the Plains of Abraham on this question.

Senator Flynn: Your example is badly chosen.

Senator Langlois: I suppose it is not important, anyway, but the fact that you are Irish and I am French could start quite a big battle.

● (1510)

Senator Flynn: I think we all have mixed blood here.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Langlois: I grant you that. That is probably not what you intended to say, but I read again part of your speech at page 393, and you were referring to Bill C-42 and to the amount of $947,155,600, which you referred to as a retroactive appropriation under clause 3(2). You then said this was not to be found in supplementary estimates (B). You were not referring to the main estimates then.

Senator Flynn: No, I was referring to clause 2 and supplementary estimates (B). Supplementary estimates (B) did not say this amount was deemed to have been enacted by Parliament as of the 1st day of April, 1974. That is a clause in the bill, which is not referred to in the supplementary estimates (B). That is quite clear, but I suppose your adviser missed the point again.

Senator Langlois: I am prepared to follow you, but it is still as clear as mud to me.

Senator Flynn: Yes, evidently it is, because you are not even able to explain it.

Senator Langlois: Let that be, or let the chips fall where they may. I am endeavouring to understand what my honourable friend said, but the more he says, the less I understand, so let it go at that.

However, I would now attack what he really had in his mind when he said in the second part of his argument that we were trying to give retroactivity—

Senator Flynn: That is right. That is quite clear.

Senator Langlois: —to the amounts voted. First he indicated that probably there was something sinister—he did not use the word “sinister”—there was an attempt to cover up for expenditures made before this bill was presented. Let me tell him this: Most items in the supplementary estimates are part of a continuing program or programs provided for in the main estimates.

Senator Flynn: Not necessarily.

Senator Langlois: They are, except for a bill introduced this afternoon which does not provide for the continuation of a program in the main estimates, but that is an unusual bill. It was introduced for first reading today as, I hope, the last supply bill for this year. However, since these estimates refer to programs already started there must be some continuity, and the wording of clause 3(2) has been chosen to assure this continuity of spending.

For example, the Minister of Public Works has in his estimates an item covering a housing or accommodation program. If during the course of the year he runs out of the funds provided in the main estimates, either because rentals increase or unforeseen additional accommodation is needed, he will return to Parliament and obtain more funds in the form of a supplementary supply bill in order to continue that program which was included in the main estimates. In that sense this continuity is assured by this reference in the supplementary estimates to the beginning of the fiscal year.

I can assure my honourable friend that there is no sinister intention there to attempt to cover up for expenditures which have not been authorized but which were made before authorization was sought and obtained from Parliament.

Senator Flynn: But are you not ratifying by clause 3(2) any amount covered in the supplementary estimates (B) that would have been spent in advance of the passage of the bill?

Senator Langlois: No, it is a question of accounting, to my mind.

Senator Flynn: No, no.

Senator Langlois: I have been in communication with Mr. Bruce MacDonald, the Secretary of the Treasury Board, from whom I obtained the explanation which I am now giving you.

Senator Flynn: What did you think he would tell you? He would not tell you anything else.

Senator Langlois: Why?

Senator Flynn: Of course he would not. He would not say he was wrong in preparing the bill or the estimates.

Senator Langlois: Are you contending that he was wrong?

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Flynn: No, but he could have been.

Senator Langlois: I would never say that against a man when he is not in front of me.

Senator Flynn: We can quickly clear the air. If the deputy leader wishes this discussed in order to allow Mr. MacDonald to clear himself, then let us refer the bill to committee.

Senator Langlois: These items have been considered by the committee, and my honourable friend was there.

Senator Flynn: Not the provision for retroactivity.

Senator Langlois: These programs were all before the committee.

Senator Flynn: But not the provision for retroactivity.

Senator Langlois: The provision is contained in the bill, I grant you that, but all these moneys requested in supplementary estimates (B) were before the committee.

Senator Flynn: But Mr. MacDonald could not be questioned as to the retroactivity of clause 3(2) because it was not in the supplementary estimates, and now you tell us the money could have been spent under this provision. I would like Mr. MacDonald to come before us and tell us what the deputy leader is telling us now.

Senator Langlois: This is not my honourable friend's first year in this house.

Senator Flynn: I hope it is not my last either.

Senator Langlois: This provision has been contained in such bills for many years. It is not something new.

Senator Flynn: I am bringing you something new, then.

Senator Langlois: Probably something new, but what a funny way of putting it. You are not improving; to my mind you are getting worse.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps I am not, but neither are you. You are getting more stubborn every year.

Senator Langlois: The programs mentioned exist in other legislation, which includes previous appropriation acts passed by Parliament. However, the government may at times need more money, and this is why it must resort to supplementary estimates, which it is doing by the bill now before us.

I do not think I can add anything else to this, but I shall answer another question which was put to me by my honourable friend and is to be found at page 394 of Hansard of December 12. It reads as follows:

I will ask a secondary question: Why is the borrowing authority phrased as it is in clause 5 of the bill. Allow me to read it:

The Governor in Council may, in addition to the sums now remaining unborrowed and negotiable of the loans authorized by Parliament, by any Act heretofore passed, raise by way of loan, under the Financial Administration Act, by the issue and sale or pledge of securities of Canada, in such form, for such separate sums, at such rates of interest and upon such other terms and conditions as the Governor in Council may approve, such sum or sums of money, not exceeding in the whole, the sum of two billion, five hundred million dollars—

Then—

Senator Grosart: Finish it.

Senator Langlois: Then my honourable friend made a reference to the late Mr. Howe.

Senator Grosart: May I suggest to the deputy leader that he finish the reading? He has left out the last clause, which is very important.

Senator Langlois: Yes, but allow me to finish. My honourable friend has a bad habit of rising and interrupting the speech of any member of this house in order to make untimely observations.

● (1520)

When I was interrupted, I was about to say that Senator Flynn referred to the late Mr. Howe and made one of his funny jokes about him, and then finished reading clause 5:

—as may be required for public works and general purposes.

This clause is a standard clause which has been found in appropriation acts for many years.

Senator Flynn: A standard clause?

Senator Langlois: Practice is very important in a parliamentary institution. My honourable friend should know that.

Senator Flynn: I do know that, but I do not see why we cannot improve on practice.

Senator Langlois: You will have to show what improvements you have in mind.

Senator Grosart: We will do that in committee.

Senator Langlois: Madam Speaker, I have been continually interrupted. I listened to him the other day for a full afternoon. I did not say a word, and now they cannot take it, as usual.

Senator Flynn: Are you begging the assistance of Madam Speaker?

Senator Langlois: No. I am referring to your manner of conducting debates in this house, which is far from being exemplary. As I said, this clause has been in appropriation acts for many years. It merely seeks the approval of Parliament for the borrowing of money, as provided for in section 36 of the Financial Administration Act, which reads:

No money shall be borrowed or security issued by or on behalf of Her Majesty without the authority of Parliament.

The words of the clause make it clear that this authority is additional to any existing authority, and it gives authority to the Governor in Council to set rates of interest and other terms and conditions.

The phrase “as may be required for public works and general purposes” removes a restriction on the purpose for which borrowed moneys may be used as opposed to funds from other sources, the control over disbursements being the subject of the legislation. This is not an appropriation per se. We are not voting new moneys. We are borrowing money to ensure the continuity of funds to provide for the public service of Canada. That is all we are doing.

It is true that the other day an objection was raised—I do not want to put words in his mouth, but I think it was raised by my honourable friend the Deputy Leader of the Opposition—that clause 5 of the bill was an appropriation as it provided for the payment of interest, commissions, et cetera. To this objection I replied that as soon as the loan is authorized, the money so borrowed under it falls within the public debt of Canada. I added that it is only when the Minister of Finance is called upon to make payments under that item that he has to come to Parliament and, through a resolution and a supporting message from the Governor General, ask for money to repay the loans he has made.

But my honourable friend then asked, “What about interest; what about commissions?” I refer him to page 8-14 of the main estimates, Department of Finance, under the heading “Public Debt Program.” There he will see that moneys are provided to the Minister of Finance to take care of interest and annual amortization of bond discount, premiums and commissions—payable in Canada, and payable in other countries; interest on other liabilities; annual amortization of bond discount, premiums and commissions; and servicing costs and costs of issuing new loans. So long as the Minister of Finance has money left in his main estimates to take care of whatever amounts become due in connection with those loans, he does not have to come back to Parliament. He will come back to Parliament if the loans fall short under this item and he has to pay more commissions, or more interest on bonds already issued or bonds to be issued in the near future. It is at that time that the message from His Excellency the Governor General comes to the House of Commons to obtain the necessary funds to supplement what was provided for in the main estimates.

I should like to refer briefly to the remarks made this afternoon by my good friend, the Whip of the Opposition, Senator Macdonald, who said I stated that when this situation arose in the house last week, and was brought to my attention, my first reaction was—I was quite frank and honest about it—to pick up the telephone and tell the officials of the Treasury Board that unless I was satisfied that there was no illegality attached to the bill, I would have to follow one of two alternatives, namely, to ask for leave to withdraw the bill, or let someone move a motion in amendment striking out clause 5. I have established clearly enough to all members of this house, in the short time that I have undertaken my present functions, that I have never adopted the attitude that I was here either to defend the government or to attack the Opposition. I am here only to do what I consider to be my duty, which is to get legislation through. That is all. Once that is done, that is the end of my functions, so far as I am concerned, and I shall try to carry out my responsibility in that fashion for as long as I remain in my present position.

As soon as I had formed my own opinion as to what had occurred in the other place, I took the additional step of checking with the appropriate authorities. I went to the Department of Justice, and I received confirmation that all that had taken place in the other house was legal; that there was no illegality whatsoever attached to what had been done; that they had followed in the other place the practice which had been followed ever since Confederation. I therefore had no alternative but to recommend that the bill be passed and be made law, and that is what I did.

Before I left Ottawa on Friday, I asked our Parliamentary Counsel, Mr. Hopkins, to obtain from the Department of Justice a written opinion, since apparently some doubt had been cast upon my reporting of the opinion I had obtained, and which was regarded in this house as being hearsay. I have received—

Senator Flynn: I rise on a point of order.

Senator Langlois: Again?

Senator Flynn: Not again. The former occasions were not on points of order, but during the course of debate. I realize now that my honourable friend does not like debate. He likes to speak as though he were alone in this place. The question which I now raise is whether it is proper for the Senate to listen to an opinion of someone from a department without that person being called to explain before a committee of this house. My honourable friend may do as he wishes, but I think he weakens the case for his apparent refusal to send the bill to a committee.

Senator Langlois: Madam Speaker, I can hardly understand the position which the honourable Leader of the Opposition has taken. The other day he challenged the opinion which I was reporting. Today I have it, and I even read it to him this morning. I can give him a copy of it now. It is an unqualified opinion. If there is a question of legality, then this house is entitled to go to the source, and the only source is the Department of Justice from whom I have a written opinion.

Senator Flynn: I realize that. I am not discussing that. My honourable friend always distorts the positions I take. My point is that if he wants to put forward the opinion of this individual, then this individual should appear before the committee of this house so that he, himself, can give that opinion, and be subject to questioning. I do not see why I should accept the opinion of a third party who is not here and who, by the way, is an official of the government. I have the right to question that individual.

I do not object to your reading this letter into the record, but I think it is unfair of you to take the attitude that you are going to refuse the Senate the opportunity to consider this bill in committee where it can question this individual whose opinion you wish to put before us.

Senator Langlois: First of all, Madam Speaker, I am not refusing anything: I have no right to refuse anything. I am in the hands of the Senate on that point, as are all honourable senators. The Senate will decide what it wishes to do, and I cannot say anything either for or against.

Senator Flynn: You certainly can.

Senator Langlois: Perhaps my honourable friend is basing his point on the well known rule of law that the best evidence be available to the court. We are not before a court of law, and we have no such rule in this parliamentary institution.

Senator Asselin: As to the legality of the question, it is certainly proper for the Opposition—or anyone, for that matter—to ask that witnesses appear before a committee to submit to questioning.

Senator Langlois: It is not a question of legality: this is an opinion which I have obtained. I will read the opinion. It is addressed to myself, the Honourable L. Langlois, Deputy Leader of the Government, The Senate, Ottawa, and is dated December 16. It reads as follows:

Dear Senator Langlois:

Mr. E. R. Hopkins has conveyed to me your request for written confirmation of an opinion that I expressed verbally to Mr. Hopkins on Thursday last to the effect that a vote on clause 5 of Bill C-42 does not constitute a vote for the appropriation of part of the public revenue or of any tax or impost in contravention of section 54 of the British North America Act.

In my view, that opinion, as expressed by you in the Senate on December 12 and as recorded at page 389 of the Debates of the Senate for that day, is correct. Although clause 5 of Bill C-42 accords to the Governor in Council the authority to raise, by way of loan, sums of money required "for public works and general purposes", it does not, in itself, appropriate public revenue to those purposes nor does it invoke the statutory appropriations provided by sections 45 and 46 of the Financial Administration Act.

The exercise by the Governor in Council of a borrowing authority such as that contained in clause 5 of Bill C-42 will indeed have the effect of invoking the statutory appropriations provided in the Financial Administration Act but that act by the Governor in Council is separate and distinct from Parliament's act in conferring the authority to borrow. The appropriation under the Financial Administration Act resulting from an act of the Governor in Council was effectively created by Parliament at the time it enacted the Financial Administration Act and not by virtue of the enactment of a borrowing authority such as that contained in clause 5 of Bill C-42.

Although the distinction which I have drawn is a highly technical one, I am nonetheless satisfied that it is a valid distinction in law. My opinion in this regard is supported by the Parliamentary practice over the years of from time to time approving Appropriation Bills containing borrowing authorities without specific recommendations therefor and by the Government's practice of including in the Estimates amounts required for repayment of borrowed moneys and payment of the costs of borrowing and items appropriating to specific purposes moneys borrowed by it.

Finally, I wish to express my view, not previously expressed to Mr. Hopkins, that the opinion which you expressed in the Senate to the effect that the courts would not look behind Bill C-42 if it were adopted by both Houses of Parliament and received Royal Assent is correct.

Yours truly,

F. E. Gibson,

Director,

Legislation Section.

I am ready to table the original of this letter, together with a letter which accompanied it. This letter was forwarded to me through the good offices of our Parliamentary Counsel, accompanied by the following letter:

December 16th, 1974

The Honourable J. G. L. Langlois,
Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate,
The Senate,
Ottawa.

Dear Senator Langlois:

I enclose the opinion of the Director of the Legislation Section of the Department of Justice with regard to clause 5 of Bill C-42.

I concur in that opinion.

In the foregoing circumstances, it would appear that Rule 62 of the Rules of the Senate is not applicable.

Yours sincerely,

E. Russell Hopkins
Parliamentary Counsel

If I may be permitted to do so, I will table these letters.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: I will table my own opinion, too.

Senator Langlois: Very good.

Senator Flynn: This is foolish.

Senator Langlois: We on this side of the house are bound, as is the sponsor of the bill in the other place, by the opinion of the Minister of Justice.

Senator Flynn: Certainly not.

Senator Langlois: I will not be bound by your opinion.

Senator Flynn: We are certainly not bound by the opinion of the Minister of Justice.

Senator Langlois: I challenge your statement, and would ask you to establish it. This opinion, to my mind, clears the way. Speaking for myself, I see no reason why a committee should be convened to go through estimates which have already been studied by that committee.

Senator Flynn: That is not the point.

Senator Langlois: We have had difficulties before with the House of Commons, and we have not always come out the winner. This time, I feel, we have set the course to be followed. This divergence of views which we have had with the other place, I think, will certainly indicate that the Senate is doing a good job and is fulfilling a worthwhile role in our parliamentary system in Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

MOTION TO REFER BILL TO COMMITTEE NEGATIVED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

In my opinion, Senator Langlois' speech this afternoon supports entirely the motion which I have just made. In his concluding remarks, he said he did not see any use in this bill's being referred to the National Finance Committee, as that committee has already considered all of the items in the estimates. It is quite obvious that he does not understand, or refuses to understand, the points I have made.

What I am concerned about is the difference in this bill when one compares it with the estimates. The first thing, of course, is that clause 5 of this bill was not included in the estimates. This is something completely beyond the estimates—so far beyond, in fact, that the Deputy Leader of the Government has explained that it is not an appropriation. As a matter of fact, he used that as the basis for his argument that we can dispose of this bill without its being referred to committee. I dare anyone here to tell me that our National Finance Committee has considered clause 5, and the borrowing authority of the Minister of Finance for $2.5 billion. I dare anyone who opposes this motion to refute this.

The second thing that I dare anyone opposing this motion to deny is that the two clauses that make the estimates retroactive to April 1 have not been considered by the committee. When did the committee give consideration to what is suggested in clause 3(2)?

The provisions of each item in the Schedule shall be deemed to have been enacted by Parliament on the 1st day of April, 1974.

Senator Langlois says there are continuing programs. This is not entirely true. But even if there were, is he suggesting that because there are continuing programs the minister is permitted to continue spending money after exhausting the funds available, before the passage of this bill? Is that what he is suggesting? I would like to find out.

Senator Langlois: I never suggested that.

Senator Flynn: You say you did not. Then I would like the minister to tell me about this.

The third provision that is different from the estimates is, of course, subsection (2) of clause 5, which says:

Subsection (1) shall be deemed to have come into force on the first day of April, 1974.

This has a retroactive effect. It means that borrowing could have been done without authority in April, or since April and before the passage of this bill. I would like to hear the Minister of Finance, or at least an official of the Department of Finance, explain this.

The other question is whether this is an appropriation or not. I should like to question those who have given an opinion. Mr. Gibson is never going to say that the Department of Justice or the people who drafted this bill were in error. I am not surprised that he gave the opinion he did. I might say that I have grave doubts about the validity of Mr. Gibson's opinion. He may be a great lawyer; I may be a very poor lawyer, but I am entitled to my opinion as much as he is. What is more important is that the Senate is entitled to form its own opinion, not by hearsay, not by letters tabled, but by questioning the minister in committee.

I cannot understand the attitude the deputy leader takes in opposing this motion. I never thought there was any sinister purpose in his refusing to send this bill to committee, but if he persists in opposing this motion I am going to begin to think that there may be. What do you have to hide, for goodness sake? Why are you so adamant in refusing to send this bill to committee? If you persist in refusing to send this bill to a committee I shall be forced to think you have something to hide.

Senator Langlois: If you want to stick your neck out, I don't care.

Senator Flynn: I know you don't care, but sometimes I care about what you say. I have tried to understand what you are saying, and I admire your loyalty to the government. You say that your only duty here is to pass legislation. Our duty as a Senate, and our duty especially on this side of the house, is to see to it that no legislation goes through without proper examination. It is our duty to make sure that everything is in order, that there is nothing wrong, that nothing is hidden behind decisions such as the one you have taken here today in an effort to persuade the Senate not to let this bill go to committee.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I find it very difficult to understand why the Deputy Leader of the Government appears to have taken the stand on this or any other bill that when there is a request that it go to committee he will apparently take the position that he does not want it to go, and therefore hope to influence the vote on his side. Surely it is the practice of the Senate, when there is discussion about a bill and when any senator—as has happened time and again—asks that it go to a committee, it goes to a committee. Why the exception in this case? We have had apparently innocuous, "simple" bills, as they are sometimes described by the sponsors, that have almost automatically gone to committee. I agree with the Leader of the Opposition that we have to wonder why this bill should be an exception out of the hundreds that have been before the Senate, and that have been referred to committee merely on the request of a senator.

One suggestion made was that the substance of the bill had already been before the National Finance Committee. I do not think there is any question in anybody's mind that clause 5, the one we have been discussing at some length, has not been before the National Finance Committee. Even if that were not the case, even if everything in the bill had been before the committee in the estimates, surely that would be no reason for refusing to send this bill to committee in accordance with our normal procedure with other bills.

It might be asked why we would want to have it referred to committee. I am obviously making an ineffective plea to the deputy leader. I shall wait until he has finished his conversation. I have no objection to it, of course.

Senator Langlois: Do you think I missed something?

Senator Grosart: I think perhaps you did. You might have, and I am sure the deputy leader, who has a very fair mind, would not want to miss any part of my argument as to why this bill should go to committee, because there are some questions that really need to be asked.

Let us start with the letter from Mr. Gibson. Mr. Gibson, of course, gave the original advice, because he is Director of the Legislation Section of the Department of Justice. He obviously gave the original opinion that they could proceed in this way. We have now had read to us his opinion that his first opinion is still sound. Surely we are entitled to question him on how he reached that opinion, and to make some contrary suggestions that he might not have thought of. It is quite possible he has not thought of them. One in particular is, of course, the fact that clause 5 is retroactive.

The Deputy Leader of the Government has said, for example, that there are funds provided already in the main estimates. I think the reference was to page 8-14 of the main estimates, where we are told provision is made for the necessary funds to pay interest, transfer and other charges in connection with borrowings by the government. Surely we are entitled to ask in committee, "Are there funds there? What funds are there? Are there sufficient funds to meet the position that the Deputy Leader of the Government has indicated?"

Then I would suggest that a quite proper question the Senate should ask is, "Has any of this $2.5 billion already been borrowed?" We have no evidence whether it has been borrowed under the retroactive clause, and whether we are actually now sanctioning a large borrowing, running into billions of dollars, and sanctioning it retroactively. Surely the Senate is entitled to know if this is so. Surely we are entitled to know if any charges have been incurred that would bring clause 5 under sections 45 and 46 of the Financial Administration Act, which is specifically referred to in clause 5.

The Deputy Leader of the Government has told us that there are funds available from the main estimates. How do we know? Surely we are entitled to call the minister or officials of the Treasury Board before the committee and ask, "What funds have you left? Have you actually spent money in excess of the funds that we are told are there?" These are questions that are normal and appropriate to be asked in committee.

Then, in view of the quite vigorous defence which the deputy leader has made of the action taken by the government, surely we would be entitled to ask the minister who introduced the bill what he meant when he said that he was not aware that clause 5 was in it, that this was a most unusual practice—in spite of the fact that we have been told that this has been regular practice—and that he hoped that it would not happen again. This is the statement of the minister who introduced the bill, who is obviously annoyed because—

Senator Langlois: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My honourable friend is continuing in the same vein as his predecessor in discussing the bill, not the point of order. I think he should stick to the point of order and not discuss the bill or what has taken place in the other house.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, in reply to that I should remind the Deputy Leader of the Government that I am not speaking on a point of order. I am speaking to a motion to refer this bill to committee.

Senator Langlois: I did not mean a point of order.

Senator Grosart: The deputy leader has just risen and said I was speaking on a point of order. I can understand his confusion.

Senator Langlois: I rise on a question of privilege at this point, Madam Speaker. I was guilty of lapsus linguae. I meant "motion," not "point of order." My honourable friend should stick to the motion before us, and not go into the contents of the bill, as he is doing.

Senator Grosart: On the point raised, honourable senators—I address myself, as our rules indicate, to honourable senators, and not to Her Honour the Speaker—my answer, of course, is that I am speaking to the motion. I have so far done nothing but suggest questions which should be asked in committee. Surely I cannot be closer to the motion, or more within the motion, than to carry on in that vein. I am saying that here are questions that have not been dealt with in any way, shape or form in the chamber, and, surely, to draw to the attention of the Senate that these questions have not been answered, and should be answered, is not going beyond the motion itself.

I say again that it is quite beyond my understanding why the deputy leader takes this position. Except perhaps in one case, I do not remember in the 12 years I have been here that there has been refusal to send a bill to committee on a motion, and I would suggest to him that it is a most dangerous precedent to create, because time and time again we facilitate the business of the house by saying at this stage, "Let us send the bill to committee," because there are questions that can be answered in committee which cannot be answered in the house. I cannot think of an instance where this is more applicable than it is with respect to this bill, because we have had quoted to us opinions of an official of the Department of Justice, of our own Law Clerk—I have some doubts about the propriety of that, but I am not raising that at the moment—and other opinions, vague statements of "high authorities," and we have had no opportunity to question the authors. If our committee system is not set up to give us the opportunity to question evidence that has been put before us in a general way, I don't know what the committee system is for.

I therefore suggest to the deputy leader that it would be very much in the interest of the Senate to send this bill to committee, and ask these questions. A reference to committee need not delay the bill unnecessarily, and again I make this plea to him: Please do not stand in the way of what is the normal procedure in this chamber.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I have to be extremely sympathetic to the points put forward by the Leader of the Opposition and the Deputy Leader of the Opposition in their commendable zeal to have Parliament control the expenditure of government. But I remind those senators that one of the objectives of referring the supplementary estimates to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance is to overcome the problem created by supply bills coming to this house at a time close to adjournment. Indeed, in this case supplementary estimates (B) were referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, and it did hear evidence from the President and officials of the Treasury Board.

Senator Grosart: On clause 5?

Senator Everett: I will come to clause 5 in a moment but, before I do, I should like to say that the Leader of the Opposition raised the problem of clause 3(2), which deems that the provisions of the supply motion shall be retroactive to the first day of April in 1974. I would like to bring to the attention of the Leader of the Opposition that this is a standard clause.

Senator Flynn: I don't care whether it is a standard clause. We did not discuss it.

Senator Everett: It has appeared in every supply bill that has come before this house, and every time we examine the estimates and supplementary estimates we know that such a clause will appear in the supply bill.

Senator Flynn: You did not know.

Senator Everett: Indeed, we do.

Senator Flynn: You did not know. Don't say that! You did not know.

Senator Everett: Indeed, we do know.

Senator Flynn: No, you did not know, because you did not have the bill.

Senator Everett: Indeed, we do. I can refer you, for example, to the Appropriation Act No. 2, 1973.

Senator Flynn: I am not talking about an act. I am saying that by the estimates you cannot know.

Senator Everett: In the estimates? I know by parliamentary practice. Indeed, I do know, because in the case of every supply bill that comes before this house that clause appears, and in the Appropriation Act No. 2, 1973 it says that the provisions of each item in the schedule shall be deemed to have been enacted by Parliament on the 1st day of April, 1972. And so it was in 1971, and prior thereto. That is a standard clause.

Senator Flynn: But did you ever discuss it?

Senator Everett: And there is no surprise being inflicted on the committee, or on the Senate.

Senator Flynn: But did you ever discuss it in committee?

Senator Everett: There is no need to discuss it. We know when we examine the estimates and the supplementary estimates that in the supply bill they will be made retroactive to the date of those estimates.

Senator Flynn: You are not serious.

Senator Everett: I am serious, senator, and I can go on reading back year after year after year that this is the case.

Senator Perrault: You can go right back to 1960.

Senator Flynn: It is irrelevant whether it was done in 1960. I don't care about that. I am just asking whether the meaning of this particular aspect of an appropriation bill has ever been discussed in committee.

Senator Everett: If the Leader of the Opposition at some point would like to discuss with me the possibility of having the committee hold a special meeting on the problem of retroactivity, I would be quite prepared to do so.

Senator Flynn: Tomorrow.

Senator Everett: I would like considerably more time than that to talk about something going back over a long period, and I think the Leader of the Opposition would be fair enough to allow me that time.

Senator Flynn: Surely, but you don't need much time. You are brilliant. After all, it did not take you much time to find out that this has been done before down through the years.

Senator Everett: I certainly thank you, and will accept the compliment with as much grace as I possibly can. So far as surprise is concerned, I cannot believe that the Leader of the Opposition or his deputy were in any way surprised by the inclusion of clause 3(2) in this bill. I was not. You have been here a lot longer than I have, and both of you have considerably more experience in this field than I.

● (1600)

Senator Flynn: I read it for the first time, in this particular perspective. I can read a sentence a thousand times and find new meanings in it, and I refuse to say that it has a static meaning.

Senator Everett: Let us move along for a moment, because I think we have exhausted all the possibilities that can be attributed to clause 3(2).

Senator Flynn: If you do not want your committee to deal with it, suggest another one. Perhaps Senator Hayden's committee would like to deal with this.

Senator Everett: Clause 5(1) is not a matter that would normally be dealt with by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. We have not done so in the past. As I understand the operations of government, the Minister of Finance must have the right to borrow sums for the public treasury at times to be fixed by him throughout the financial year. What we are doing here is giving a general authority for him to borrow up to $2.5 billion.

Senator Flynn: It has already been done in this case. The minister said in the other place that it was just to cover the success of the sale of Canada Savings Bonds.

Senator Langlois: He did not say it had already been done.

Senator Grosart: We do not know. Why not let us find out in committee whether it has been done or not? Surely that is reasonable.

Senator Everett: I do not really think that that is what is bothering the Leader and the Deputy Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Flynn: Certainly.

Senator Everett: If I understand them correctly, they want a matter that is not normally referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to be referred to that committee. It is not something that we normally deal with.

Senator Flynn: Oh, yes.

Senator Everett: Not at all. If the Leader or the Deputy Leader of the Opposition can indicate to me one time when the National Finance Committee dealt with an appropriation of this sort—

[Senator Everett.]

Senator Flynn: The bill itself?

Senator Everett: No. I am talking about clause 5. If they can point out such an example to me, then I would like to hear about it.

Senator Flynn: If we have not done so, it is about time we did.

Senator Grosart: Would Senator Everett mind my asking this question: Has the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance ever dealt with an appropriation bill?

Senator Flynn: It has.

Senator Grosart: I would just like to ask when. The committee deals with the estimates, not appropriation bills.

Senator Everett: We deal with the appropriation bill by dealing with the estimates. That is the whole concept of having the estimates referred to the National Finance Committee prior to our considering the supply bill.

Senator Flynn: Then you could introduce anything in an appropriation bill that does not appear in the estimates, and you would be said to have dealt with it.

Senator Everett: Perhaps we could, but we are not.

Senator Flynn: We are.

Senator Everett: We are not. We are not dealing with anything here that has not normally been dealt with by the National Finance Committee.

Senator Flynn: Your interpretation of "normally" is something else.

Senator Everett: I have asked both the Leader and the Deputy Leader of the Opposition to tell me of a case in which this has been dealt with. All that is being asked here is an authority to borrow, not an authority to spend.

Senator Flynn: Why not inquire?

Senator Everett: I beg your pardon?

Senator Flynn: I say, why not inquire as to this? Why would you say that your committee would not normally deal with this—and if not your committee, which committee would deal with it?

Senator Everett: Because the National Finance Committee deals with the estimates themselves, and the expenditures of the federal government. We have dealt with them in respect of supplementary estimates (B), and we have reported back. I made a full report on behalf of the committee after hearing evidence on supplementary estimates (B), and those supplementary estimates (B) were accepted by the house. Now comes the supply bill, and the only provision that seems to bother the Leader of the Opposition is that of retroactivity, which is provided in every supply bill, and the authority to the Minister of Finance to borrow. Therefore, I say that this is not something that has been in the past, nor is it now, a subject for referral to the National Finance Committee.

Senator Grosart: I wonder if I could ask Senator Everett a question. It seems to me that he has argued that because we have not been sending appropriation bills to his committee, we should not do it now. That seems a very strange argument to me. I suggest to him that this is a different case from any other that we have had before us, and that is borne out by the statement of the Honourable Mitchell Sharp, the house leader, who, when he was introducing this bill, said:

Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member that this was a most unusual proceeding.

Senator Langlois: He was wrong.

Senator Grosart: I am quoting the minister. He may be wrong—everybody may be wrong except the Deputy Leader of the Government—but we would like to find out. We would like to find out if Mr. Gibson was wrong, if Mr. Sharp was wrong, if Senator Everett was wrong. Perhaps Senator Flynn was wrong—I doubt it, but I would like to find out.

Senator Flynn: I have some doubts myself.

Senator Grosart: Mr. Sharp said:

Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member that this was a most unusual proceeding. It was one that some of us were not aware of at the time the bill was introduced.

These are the words of the minister when introducing the bill. He went on:

However, Mr. Speaker, I want to make it clear that I am not defending the procedure that was followed. I hope we can avoid this sort of thing in future.

I therefore ask the chairman of the National Finance Committee if he does not think it would add some laurels to that committee if this bill was referred to it, and he went along with the leader in the other place and helped to avoid this kind of thing in the future.

Senator Everett: Before the question is put I should mention that the deputy leader has raised two points. He asked why we should not refer the appropriation bill to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance—

Senator Grosart: And why not?

Senator Everett: I say that in his own best interests the answer is no. We could do that, but then we would be dealing with the estimates at that particular time.

Senator Grosart: No, we would be dealing with the bill.

Senator Everett: And it is for the protection of the Opposition that we refer the estimates to the National Finance Committee prior to our receiving the supply bill, when we have ample opportunity to deal with them. He can make the argument over and over again, but I just cannot buy it. I do not understand how the Opposition can want it any differently.

Let me now deal with clause 5. I think Senator Grosart said that Mr. Sharp expressed the view that this was a most unusual procedure. Well, I do not think it is a most unusual procedure. With regard to Appropriation Act No. 4, 1970 the same procedure was used. The sum involved at that time was $1 billion, which was sought for public works and general purposes. So what is suddenly so new and different? What has suddenly caused this point to be raised?

Senator Flynn: We have just found out it was wrong. Nobody ever raised it before, not even you—or you said it without understanding it.

Senator Everett: There is nothing new or different about this supply bill, any more than there has been about all the supply bills in the past. The Opposition has had ample opportunity before the committee to review the whole matter.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Everett: What is being done here is no different from what has been done with regard to supply bills going back many years, and perhaps, to Confederation. As much as I would like to be sympathetic to the Opposition—

Senator Flynn: Oh, please, please. I have known you for a long time and—

Senator Everett: —I really do not think they have put forward an adequate argument in this case.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I just want to say that when I came to this chamber this afternoon I had no idea an issue was involved here, or what it was about, and I am afraid that up to this point in the debate my state of knowledge remains exactly the same. However, I would like to say that during my time in this house, which is now slightly over ten years, I have never heard a debate on whether a bill should be referred to a committee after second reading. Such a reference has been generally made as a matter of routine at the request or suggestion of any member of the chamber. I cannot see any reason for departing from that long-standing tradition, a tradition that makes this house a good parliamentary institution.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I just want to add something along the lines of what has been said by Senator Lang. Usually when a bill is read the second time in the Senate, the motion to refer it to a standing committee of the Senate is not debated. There is agreement between the leaders to refer, or not refer, the bill to committee.

We are now dealing with, and trying to ask questions about, a bill involving the spending of millions of dollars by the government. We have said, for our part, that this may involve illegal procedures, and I am astonished that the Deputy Leader of the Government and the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance should refuse to send a bill of this importance to a committee of the Senate. I am inclined to ask the same question that my Leader asked: Have you something to hide on this question? We are discussing millions and millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money, and we humbly ask the Senate to refer the bill to the committee because the loyal Opposition has some questions to ask of the experts from the Department of Justice and the Department of Finance. We want to clarify the situation. That is all we want.

It is not a gift you are making to the Opposition by sending this bill to committee; this is the usual procedure in the Senate when a bill has received second reading. The usual practice is to send such a bill to a standing committee of the Senate. I am a fairly new senator, and I am very much surprised that the Leader of the Government and his deputy, and even the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, should refuse this request on the part of the Opposition to refer a bill of such importance to a committee of the Senate.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: May I make a brief statement, honourable senators? I know that this has been a vigorous discussion on a matter which really should not have been the subject of such prolonged disputation. It rather distresses many of us in the chamber, I think, that suggestions have been made this afternoon that there are attempts at concealment. We have heard the question, "What have they to hide?" and so on. I would remind Senator Flynn, who served, as I recall, in a federal government of another political persuasion, that during his time in the other place precisely the same procedure was followed with no objections at all, and no suggestions as to alleged impropriety or indecency or illegality or other inferences of the kind that we have heard here this afternoon. Such suggestions really do not add to the stature of Parliament.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Perrault: Again, I would like to remind honourable senators that it has been parliamentary practice over the years since Confederation to approve appropriation bills containing borrowing authorities without specific recommendations therefor. It has been government practice—accepted by all sides—to include in the estimates amounts required for repayment of borrowed moneys and payments of the costs of borrowing, and items appropriating for specific purposes moneys borrowed by it. This has been standard procedure since the founding of this nation. The practice proposed in this instance has been followed.

Senator Macdonald: May I ask my honourable friend a question?

Senator Perrault: May I continue my statement?

Senator Macdonald: If that is the case, why did Mr. Sharp say that it was an unusual procedure?

Senator Perrault: May I remind honourable senators once again that admittedly the house leader in the other place may have been in error in some of the remarks he made the other day. This has been admitted and established by the Deputy Leader of the Government in this house, but at this point to suggest that there is some impropriety, or that there is an attempt at concealment, adds very little, I think, to the stature of this place.

The government is adopting its position this afternoon on the basis of principle.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Perrault: Yes, on the basis of principle, and therefore we must insist on this side that this bill be not referred to committee.

Senator Flynn: I thought so. That proves exactly our point.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I think that this house ought to afford the courtesy to any group of senators, who want a bill referred to committee, of sending that bill to committee. Therefore, in normal circumstances, I would be in favour of referring a bill to committee, even though the reasons for doing so seemed to me to be trivial. But I think there is a different principle involved here, and we have only to refer to our own rules to see what that is. At page 134 I read this:

Supply bills are not referred to a committee of the whole or to a select committee. However, the estimates on which a supply bill is based are referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance when they are tabled in the Senate. See Bourinot, Fourth Edition, pages 443 and 444.

Those pages say:

XII. Supply Bill in the Senate. The supply bill is sent up immediately after its passage in the Commons to the Senate where it receives its first reading at once. The bill is generally passed through its several stages on the same day, and is never considered in committee of the whole.

Bourinot then goes on to explain this in a manner which seems to me to relate all of this to the jealously guarded prerogative of the House of Commons not to have the Senate interfere with supply bills. I think, therefore, that it is not necessary to refer this bill to a committee.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. The point raised by Senator Hicks is entirely irrelevant. This has nothing to do with our present rules. He may quote from authors of 100 years ago, but this is not the problem at all.

Senator Hicks: I was reading from the current edition of our rules.

Senator Grosart: May I point out that the honourable senator was not reading from the rules, but from pages at the back which contain vague opinions, most of them completely out of date.

Senator Hicks: But they state the practice.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald, that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the "nays" have it.

And more than two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, December 10, the debate on the motion of Senator Godfrey for the second reading of Bill C-14, to incorporate the Federal Business Development Bank.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I am prepared to proceed, unless there is a more urgent matter. I shall not detain the house long as I am not now in the same mood as I was a few moments ago, and also this is a rather heavy bill. To judge by its volume, it is an important bill. It contains 26 pages and 60 clauses. It was treated to quite a lengthy speech by the sponsor, Senator Godfrey, who should be complimented for having presented a great deal of detail and, I would say, all the relevant information with respect to it. Another fact that would indicate the bill's importance is the time consumed in the other place, in the house itself and in committee, in consideration of it.

However, I am not too sure that on close examination the bill is seen to justify the amount of attention or even the volume of verbiage or the printing that was accorded it. The intention of the government is primarily to show interest in small business. All who have spoken elsewhere in support of this bill declared that they were in favour of assisting small business, and that this legislation would achieve that purpose. In fact, however, closer scrutiny of the bill indicates that it is simply a face-lifting device for the bank which it replaces, the Industrial Development Bank. It is not therefore a bad bill, because if one can improve something, that is a good thing. I merely want to draw the attention of the Senate to a few items which will show that after all we should not get too excited about this piece of legislation.

My first comment concerns the name of the new bank, the successor to the Industrial Development Bank. The bank is now to be referred to as the Federal Business Development Bank, and, in French, as la Banque fédérale de développement. It is rather interesting to note that they have not used the French equivalent of the word "business". The main purpose of the bill is to move away from the word "industry" to the more general word "business", and to encompass in the objects of the corporation promotion and assistance in the establishment and development of any kind of business enterprise in Canada. It is strange that they have not been able to find anything to convey this meaning in French.

In French the present bank is called la Banque d'expansion industrielle, and the new bank is called la Banque fédérale de développement. It seems to me that this name does not conjure up the same idea as the English name, which is the Federal Business Development Bank. The word "business" is absent from the French version.

Secondly, I wish to draw the attention of the Senate to the fact that the purposes of the corporation are described in section 4 of the bill, which provides:

The objects of the Corporation are to promote and assist in the establishment and development of business enterprises in Canada by providing, in the manner and to the extent authorized by this Act, financial assistance, management counselling, management training, information and advice and such other services as are ancillary or incidental to any of the foregoing.

The present bank—that is, the Industrial Development Bank—has its mandate described in section 15 of chapter I-9 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970. Section 16(1) states:

Subject to section 15, where in the opinion of the Board or of an officer authorized for that purpose by the Board

(a) a person is engaged or about to engage in an industrial enterprise in Canada,

(b) credit or other financial resources would not otherwise be available on reasonable terms and conditions, and

(c) the amount invested or to be invested in the industrial enterprise by persons other than the Bank and the character of that investment are such as to afford the Bank reasonable protection, the Bank may lend or guarantee loans of money to that person—

The rest is not relevant to the point I wish to make.

If honourable senators compare clause 4 of the bill with section 16 of the Industrial Development Bank Act, they will see that the emphasis is on business generally, whereas the present bank, which is to be replaced, was limited in the scope of its operations by the words "industrial enterprise". It was also limited in the fact that it had to show that no other private banking or loan organization was willing to make a loan to that industrial enterprise.

I understand that it is not proposed to depart from that practice, but it is strange to note that this is no longer to be found—unless I am mistaken—in the bill which will incorporate the new Federal Business Development Bank.

This very point was dealt with by the sponsor of the bill, Senator Godfrey, who defended the record of the Industrial Development Bank. I have had some contact with the bank, and I agree that it has a good record. A criticism of the new bill was made in the committee of the other place on this very point, that this federal or state bank should not compete with a private banking or loan system.

I do not know whether the restriction I have quoted from section 16 of the Industrial Development Bank Act will be adhered to in practice by the new bank, but I wanted to draw the attention of the Senate to this fact. I understand that the general manager of the present bank reassured the committee of the other house in this connection, and said it was not the intention of the new bank to depart from that rule.

I refer again to the speech by Senator Godfrey in moving second reading, and draw attention to the fact that nearly all the other changes brought about by the bill are really matters that could have been dealt with—the same thing applies to what I have just mentioned—by mere amendment of the present act incorporating the Industrial Development Bank. The changing of the name could have been done by mere amendment. The changing of the purposes, which I have just discussed, could also have been made by a simple amendment. The capital structure of the bank could have been altered by mere amendment. The same thing applies to the set-up of the board of directors, and also to the transfer of authority from that of the Minister of Finance to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

The bill, on the whole, appears to be a face-lifting job. Possibly the bank, or someone in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, felt it was easier to draw up a new incorporating act and forget about the past, allowing, of course, for a transitional adjustment.

On the whole, this is a good bill. It is not fundamentally a departure from what has existed for some years. However, it would be useful in committee to question the intentions of the department and the management of the bank, which I understand will remain the same in the new corporation. I do not think anyone will oppose the bill, and therefore I have no objection to its being read the second time.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Senator Flynn: You have no objection this time?

Senator Langlois: No, it is not an appropriation bill.

Motion agreed to.

● (1640)

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I intend to move that the Senate do adjourn during pleasure, to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately 8 o'clock. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is ready to convene immediately after the Senate rises to consider Bill C-14, which has just received second reading. The witnesses who will be appearing before the committee are present in the gallery. That committee may also sit tonight, and in that event I shall move the appropriate motion.

Senator Flynn: The committee may sit this evening?

Senator Langlois: Yes, in the event that it does not complete its consideration of Bill C-14 this afternoon.

Senator Flynn: The chairman was reading my mind when he called the witnesses for this afternoon.

Senator Langlois: I move that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately 8 o'clock this evening.

Senator Flynn: Is it necessary for the Senate to sit this evening? I gather the purpose is to proceed with second reading of Bills C-45 and C-36, both of which received first reading earlier today.

Senator Perrault: That is correct.

Senator Flynn: I do not think the Senate need sit this evening for that purpose.

Senator Langlois: The motion is before the house.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

NATIONAL FINANCE

ESTIMATES OF MANPOWER DIVISION OF DEPARTMENT OF MANPOWER AND IMMIGRATION—COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE AND REPORT

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Everett that the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine in detail and report upon the estimates of the Manpower Division of the Department of Manpower and Immigration for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1975.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I moved the adjournment of this debate last night largely because I felt it was wrong in practice and in principle that an item set down for tonight on our agenda be brought forward by unanimous consent a day earlier, and because there was a suggestion that the debate might be terminated last night. However, I am rather glad that I did adjourn the debate, because in my mail today I received a couple of items which I think justify my saying a few more words on this motion.

Last night honourable senators who were able to attend despite the severe snowstorm will recall that Senator Everett, the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, referred to the 1974-75 estimates of the Manpower Division amounting to about $550 million. He referred to six major functions of that division, and then added that, in addition to the six functions outlined, the Manpower Division administers special programs for groups which have particular problems in the job market, such as job creation programs like LIP, OFY, LEAP and CEP. Then he gave an outline of what, as chairman, he suggested would be nine types of questions that, if the motion is carried, would be suitable questions for study by his committee. He concluded by saying that he thought the major question for the committee was whether $550 million of expenditure per year was justified, and was the Canadian taxpayer getting his money's worth.

I referred last night to the fact that I had knowledge of the fact that some 13 delegates from Canada had returned over the last weekend from a study in Germany of manpower problems. I indicated that the delegation was representative. Besides three officers and members of the executive council of the Canadian Council on Social Development the Canadian delegation consisted of William Rompkey, Liberal Member of Parliament and Parliamentary Secretary for Manpower and Immigration; Mr. Lincoln Alexander, Progressive Conservative Member of Parliament and his party's labour critic; David Orlikow, New Democratic Party Member of Parliament and his party's labour critic; Charles Caccia, Liberal Member of Parliament; John Hunter, director of the Manpower Operations Branch; R. L. Beatty, special adviser to the Unemployment Insurance Commission; William H. Wightman, manager, industrial relations department, Canadian Manufacturers' Association; Mr. Pat Kerwin, assistant director of social and community program development, Canadian Labour Congress; Jean-Guy Houde, Assistant Deputy Minister of Social Affairs for the government of the Province of Quebec; and Miss Margaret Weiers, editorial writer for the Toronto Star. I said that in my mail today I received certain correspondence. One item was a letter dated December 6 from Frankfurt in West Germany. My personal correspondent reported as follows:

This very assorted group is getting on splendidly, and I think we are all having a tremendous experience. The people we have been meeting in Germany do not seem to class us as an ordinary group of visitors. The questions asked back and forth are all very pertinent and acute, and I am extremely pleased with the way this is progressing.

I also received a copy of a press release issued by the director of the Canadian Council on Social Development,

Mr. Reuben C. Baetz, and I will quote briefly from this fairly extensive report. He says:

While the miracle of West Germany's economic development since World War II has been a well-known success story, frank and intimate discussions with many Germans over the last two weeks have convinced me that the country's social development is just as much to be envied, and is in fact proof of the interrelatedness of the two—

He goes on to say:

While in Canada we have tended to concentrate too much on assisting persons after they have become unemployed, the West German emphasis is on employment promotion and unemployment benefits are provided only as a last resort—

I am told that to promote employment opportunities many special provisions have been enacted in West Germany to assist various groups in the population. Mentally and physically handicapped persons who are able and willing to work are assisted to do so by a special law making it compulsory for employers to provide six per cent of their positions to the handicapped, or pay a sum of money into a fund for this purpose.

My personal informant brought back a newspaper dated the date of departure, December 13. This announced steps that were being taken by the government of the Federal Republic of West Germany to fight the twins of unemployment and inflation, and reflecting Germany's commitment to full employment. While Germany's current rate of unemployment of 3.5 per cent, and inflation of 6.5 per cent, are enviably low, announced plans are designed to reduce the 800,000 unemployment by 300,000. Depressed industries will be subsidized to retain some of the workers who would otherwise be dismissed or placed on reduced time.

Workers who have lost their jobs and only able to find work at reduced levels of pay will be subsidized temporarily to maintain their previous income level if they work. Industries will receive incentive subsidies of 7.5 per cent which, in addition to the 7.5 per cent some industries are now receiving in economically weak regions, are expected to produce new jobs. The already heavy retraining program of workers will be further bolstered during the recessionary period.

All these expenditures, I am informed, will be possible in spite of previously announced income tax cuts for the middle and low income population effective January 1, 1975, largely due to a ten billion mark reserve which the Germans garnered during their boom years and earmarked to be spent during periods of recession.

The program was indeed an interesting one. It was sponsored by a unique organization, the Friedrich Ebert Stiftung Foundation, which is named after the first president of the Weimar Republic, who was world famous as a social reformer.

From the program itinerary that I found this morning, I see that in Berlin they were met by the Deputy Director of the International Department of the Foundation. They also had lectures on the conception and function of a social insurance company, as it is referred to over there. Another address dealt with professional rehabilitation and preventive measures in order to preserve capacity of work.

Another was on co-operation with Canada in the field of intergovernmental agreements on social security.

They visited Nuremburg, Frankfurt, Dusseldorf, Cologne and, of course, the capital, Bonn, where they met with parliamentarians and others, and members of the Parliamentary Committee on Labour and Social Affairs. They visited the federal Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs. At Cologne they visited the Confederation of German Employers' Associations, receiving information on industrial relations and labour policy, and the Central Association of Building Trades. I find on the program that at Dusseldorf there were talks with members of the works council and managers. At Nuremburg there was a visit to a federal labour office.

Honourable senators, I do not want to extend these remarks, but they will be of special interest to some of my colleagues here, particularly Senator Fergusson, who is a member of the governing board of the Canadian Council on Social Development, and, of course, my deskmate, Senator Croll, who has introduced the subject of the work ethic as an immediate concern for the Senate at the moment.

I made these remarks also because members of the House of Commons who were on this delegation would, under the rules of that place, probably be unable to refer before Christmas, or even in the near future, to the visit or to the information that was obtained during it. Perhaps I make these remarks now also because I expect to be specifically briefed and regaled at home with comparisons between manpower policies in Canada and those in West Germany. Therefore, I warn my fellow members of the Senate committee that as our examination proceeds I shall be making frequent references to West German practices learned, perhaps, at second hand but, I might add, at very close hand.

Motion agreed to.

REPRESENTATION BILL, 1974

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Second reading of Bill C-36, intituled: "An Act to provide for representation in the House of Commons, to establish electoral boundaries commissions and to remove the temporary suspension of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.—(Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C.)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to provide a new method of determining the number of members in the House of Commons—

The Hon. the Speaker: Is the Honourable Senator Perrault moving second reading of this bill?

Senator Perrault: Yes, I so move.

Senator Choquette: If it is of any consolation to Senator Perrault, I might inform him that his predecessor never learned, even in his latter days here, that he should move second reading.

Senator Perrault: Obviously I follow in worthy footsteps. I must apologize for my eager anticipation of the contents of this blessedly short speech.

[Senator Benidickson.]

Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to provide a new method of determining the number of members in the House of Commons to represent each province of Canada in the next and succeeding Parliaments.

This is not an easy question; in fact it is a very vexatious matter to attempt to determine how the areas of Canada are to be represented in the other place. The redistribution of seats based on the 1971 decennial census, the present distribution method provided by section 51 of the British North America Act, was received with disfavour by all parties in 1973. The reaction, to say the least, was mixed. For this reason Parliament decided at that time to suspend the process of electoral boundaries readjustment until January, 1975, to give time for the development of a more satisfactory approach.

In February of this year the former President of the Privy Council, now the Secretary of State for External Affairs, presented to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections of the House of Commons various possible methods of distributing seats among provinces. While the deliberations of that committee were interrupted by the dissolution of Parliament, the possible approaches had been carefully considered by that time, and a general consensus had emerged that the approach, now described as the "amalgam method," best met the exigencies of democratic principles and of the federal structure of Canada.

A bill based on the amalgam method was, as honourable senators know, introduced in the House of Commons on November 22 by the President of the Privy Council, who in that case once again stressed that the subject of redistribution was one that rose above partisan politics, and that the government's aim was to find an equitable method which would be acceptable to the vast majority of members on both sides of the house. The question of redistribution is almost as complicated as the matter of establishing indemnities, and that is complex enough.

In this spirit the bill was examined by the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, which proposed various amendments in its report. The resulting bill contains the basic precepts of the amalgam method, with modifications to eliminate what are regarded as anomalies produced by the vagaries of emerging population trends within Canadian provinces. Population projection is a relatively exact science, but it is difficult to be absolutely precise in relation to the population growth which may be anticipated in the provinces of Canada.

It has been recognized since Confederation that, while the fundamental principle of representation in the House of Commons must be representation by population, the Constitution of Canada must also be reflected in the membership of that house. It is for this reason that the original distribution method contained in the British North America Act provided that no province should lose a member of the other place unless its population relative to that of the nation had decreased by 5 per cent or more. For that same reason it was provided in the year 1915 that a province should be entitled to at least as many members in the other place as it has senators. These and other provisions enacted since that time have ensured that no province will be deprived of an effective voice in the other place.

[Translation]

The distribution method provided for in this bill is based upon an adequate representation for each Canadian province in the House of Commons which does not involve any decrease in the number of provincial seats. Therefore, any province which, following the redistribution, would be provided with a number of members less than that of a less populated province, should get the same number of seats as the latter.

The amalgamation method is based, secondly, upon the principle of representation by population. The provinces are divided into three classes within which representation by population applies.

The small provinces are those whose population has increased since the preceding census but is still less than a million and a half. The number of members to be assigned to those provinces will be known by dividing the population of an average constituency in the provinces having a population under a million and a half at the time of the preceding redistribution.

The province of Quebec is the pivot when it comes to figuring the number of members in the case of large provinces, namely the provinces having a population greater than two and a half million. The province of Quebec will be assigned 75 members at the next readjustment and thereafter four additional members in each subsequent readjustment, according to the method proposed in this bill. For the larger provinces, there shall be assigned a number of members equal to the number obtained by dividing the number of their respective population by the population of an average constituency in the province of Quebec.

[English]

Provinces in the middle category will also have their representation determined approximately on the basis of "rep. by pop." If the population of a province is 1,500,000 to 2,500,000, and has increased since the previous decennial census, it will be allocated a number of members determined by halving the increase in seats which it would have received were it to have the same average constituency population as the group of the smallest provinces.

While I realize that this may sound rather complicated I assure honourable senators that there was a great deal of committee deliberation in the other place before what is essentially a compromise involving all the provinces of Canada and, indeed, all the political parties of this country, was achieved.

It is not an easy formula. If honourable senators are interested in some of the mathematical background to this measure, and if they have a real interest in the question, I will certainly undertake to make that material available to them if they would direct their requests to my office.

Senator Choquette: At this stage, might I ask a question of the sponsor of the bill? I know that the sponsor has expressed in fluent French the explanation regarding the province of Quebec seats that will remain at 75. I should like to know why other provinces will increase their numbers, and Quebec will still remain at 75. I know it is an old formula based on population, but I would like to hear an explanation at this stage as to why Quebec does not increase the number of its representatives.

Senator Perrault: In fact, the possibility is held out for increases in the number of seats in the province of Quebec in subsequent redistributions of seats across the country. The proposed formula means that no province is really frozen in its present representation should there be a population increase.

However, I will undertake to obtain additional information for the honourable senator, in view of his inquiry. It should be pointed out that originally the province of Quebec was the base upon which proportional redistributions across Canada took place.

Redistribution is a matter of population, of tradition, combined with a pragmatism to provide adequate representation for all parts of Canada. If it were strictly representation by population, certain parts of Canada would be grossly under-represented, and I do not think any party really supports that concept. For example, if representation were based solely on population, the Maritime Provinces, because the population may not be increasing as rapidly as other parts of Canada, would suffer a reduction in representation.

Senator Asselin: We have the same problem in the province of Quebec.

Senator Perrault: There are some constituencies, of course, of vast geographical size. It is almost impossible for the members of Parliament for those constituencies to carry out their responsibilities in the other place. Yet, on a representation by population basis only, representation from such constituencies would be reduced. In any event, I do not think any party really supports the concept of representation based strictly upon population. While we all subscribe to the general idea that people, not territorial limits, or trees, mountains or resources, should be represented in the other place, I think we are equally agreed that the historical approach to Canadian representation is the best one.

Senator Grosart: Is Senator Choquette's question not completely covered in Part I—section 51(1), rule 1? That seems to state very clearly the answer to Senator Choquette's question.

Senator Perrault: If I may, I will just finish my statement and then I will turn to other statistical background to answer Senator Choquette's inquiry.

The provinces in the intermediate category would also have their representation determined approximately on the basis of "rep by pop." If the population of a province is 1,500,000 to 2,500,000 and has increased since the previous decennial census, it will be allocated a number of members determined by halving the increase in seats which it would have received were it to have the same average constituency population as the group of the smallest provinces.

So, we have three designations of representation: large provinces, medium or intermediate provinces, and small provinces. For the purposes of the present redistribution, the larger provinces are designated as being Ontario and Quebec; the intermediate provinces as being Alberta and British Columbia, and the rest of the provinces are assigned to the small population category.

The number of members representing provinces in the House of Commons under this bill will rise immediately to 279. An increase of this order or magnitude was desired to ensure that the number of constituents which each member will represent would not grow to a size where it would be excessively difficult to represent them effectively.

It has been recognized, however, that it would be unwise to allow the size of the house to grow to the point where a member might become less effective inside the House of Commons itself. The feeling was that a balance must be struck, and it has been struck in this bill.

Some honourable senators may be wondering about the question of accommodation in the other place.

Senator Asselin: That is not a problem.

Senator Perrault: It is not a problem, as Senator Asselin has pointed out. There is adequate space to meet the next anticipated increase in size of the other place. Beyond that, the ingenuity of the Public Works Department and affiliated organizations can well cope with any space problem which might arise in the future.

The bill also provides for an automatic review of its provisions by a committee of the House of Commons in 1979, at which time accurate projections for the populations of each province in 1981 will be available. It is hoped that a review at that time will avoid the necessity of changes at a later date, which might be made necessary by unforeseen changes in population patterns across Canada, and these contingencies have to be taken into consideration.

I would like to remind honourable senators that passage of this bill is required before Christmas in order that commissions might be established to begin the process of electorate boundary readjustment in the new year. Failure to adopt this measure in that time would result in the adoption and application of a distribution method deemed to be undesirable by all parties.

I have some figures that will be of interest to honourable senators with respect to the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons, showing some of the projected figures by provinces. The present Newfoundland figure is seven; under the application of the proposed new rules for redistribution after the 1981 census that figure will go to eight. For Prince Edward Island the figure presently is four; under the application of the proposed new rules the number will be four after 1981. For Nova Scotia the figure is 11 at the present time, and it will go to 12. For New Brunswick the present figure of 10 will stay at 10. For Quebec the present figure of 74 will go up to 79.

You see, Senator Choquette, it is not frozen at the present figure; there is provision for expansion.

Senator Asselin: What about Ontario?

Senator Perrault: For Ontario, at the present time, the figure is 88; under the application of the new rules that number will increase to 110.

Manitoba is presently 13; that number will go up to 15. Saskatchewan is presently 13; the number will rise to 14. Alberta is presently 19; if the new rules are adopted the number will increase to 24. The present British Columbia representation is 23; under the application of the new rules that will increase to 32 after the 1981 census.

Under the new rules as applied to the next federal election, if everything proceeds on line, and if this measure is adopted and the commissions carry out their responsibilities without difficulty, this is the way the seats will line up for the next election: Newfoundland seven, Prince Edward Island four, Nova Scotia 11, New Brunswick 10, Quebec 75—an increase of one over the present figure.

Senator Asselin: One more.

Senator Perrault: Quebec goes from 74 to 75. Ontario 95, Manitoba 14, Saskatchewan 14, Alberta 21, British Columbia 28, for a total of 279. The total membership of the other place in the year after the 1981 census will be 308.

Senator Macdonald: Honourable senators, I wonder if I may ask the Leader of the Government whether those figures are in tabular form. If so, perhaps the table could be inserted in Hansard.

Senator Perrault: I should be pleased to accept Senator Macdonald's suggestion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

*This is based on a projection obtained from Statistics Canada of 23,967,800 in 1981.

Senator Perrault: As I said earlier, and as all members of this chamber are aware, because all of us are aware of the political process, the formula does not represent perfection so far as any province is concerned, but it does represent a compromise, an agreement, in the best Canadian tradition. It does permit a review in 1979 based on real population growth at that time, and there are opportunities down the line for the evolution of a better formula, if in fact it is possible to develop that kind of formula.

Senator Bélisle: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question. When I was going through the clauses of this bill I noticed that the province of Quebec was mentioned quite often. I noticed also that the increase in its future number of members of Parliament would be rather limited. My question is this: Knowing that we have been issued today with a report from the International Development Agency, which says that a large sum of money will be made available to a particular university in Africa to find out why a certain group of the society, either the ladies or the men, are non-productive, is it possible that the same amount of money could be made available to those provinces which have a low birth rate?

Senator Perrault: I had not realized the honourable senator was so interested in demographic matters, but I am sure, if he were to pursue his research in the form of a resolution before the house, that all of us would listen to his remarks with interest. So far as the province of Quebec is concerned, it should be observed that redistribution is closely related to population growth—at least, that is one of the fundamental aspects of redistribution—and I believe the honourable senator is aware that the birth rate in the province of Quebec is one of the lowest in the country at the present time. I do not know whether the honourable senator has some constructive ideas on how that situation may be alleviated.

Senator Bélisle: I could certainly give you the material I was reading this afternoon, which indicates that the government has decided to spend a large amount of money for research on who is who, and who is defective.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Just a few remarks, honourable senators, following the presentation the government leader has made of this bill.

Of course, I have no intention of questioning the formula the experts have agreed upon to provide each province with a fair representation, but I have reservations about the current method used to distribute seats in the new Parliament.

When I sat in the other place, I often said that, whenever they established electoral boundaries, the commissioners did not give enough consideration to the geographical characteristics of the constituencies in which the members of the other place had to operate: They used to consider only the demographic aspect and decide in a very drastic fashion that there would be between 50 and 60,000 constituents in every riding, without taking into account, I repeat, the geographical aspect. They would come up with very arbitrary electoral boundaries which did not serve in any way the economic or social interests of the people within the same constituency. Here is an example of what I mean.

When I was a member of the House of Commons in 1965, my constituency was about 300 miles long. In 1968, when the electoral boundaries of my constituency were altered, I was given a constituency 500 miles long but with the following difference: one part of my constituency, on the social and economic levels, could not be united with the other part. I was then representing a riding both extremes of which had entirely different interests. On the demographic point of view alone, I was given 35,000 electors, while the electors from one part of my county did not know those from the other part. In addition, their economic interests were completely opposite.

When the government leader tells us that the entire amalgamation formula was considered according to the needs of some provinces, especially Quebec, I object to that formula for the following reason: We have in Canada a French Canadian province which must be adequately represented in the Canadian Parliament, especially in the House of Commons. If we apply the amalgam formula such as introduced in the House of Commons and as suggested by the government leader, in a few years Quebec would be poorly represented. I feel that it would be extremely unfavourable to the Canadian Confederation for Quebec to be inadequately represented.

The Leader of the Government tells us that this formula is based on the population of the two largest provinces in the country, Ontario and Quebec. Now, we know that the birth rate has been steadily decreasing for some years in Quebec. This is not a reason for reducing our representation in the House of Commons. I gave the reason for this earlier; it is because Quebec represents an important element within confederation as far as the language, the institutions and the economy are concerned. Quebec will always be the only French-speaking province within Confederation. Because of the decreasing population, we will have fewer representatives in the House of Commons than the largest province in Canada, namely Ontario. According to the Leader of the Government, Ontario will have up to 110 representatives, whereas Quebec will only have 79 following the readjustment. I presume that there will be some imbalance when we shall make representations to Parliament.

Those are the remarks I wanted to make.

I say that amalgamation formula, which other members of the House of Commons and myself did study does not live up to the expectations of the people of Quebec at the present time. Quebec cannot put up with such an unbalanced representation as compared with the representation of Ontario in the years to come. I am saying that, and I repeat it, because Quebec has a particular character, because it is not a province like others—even though other senators or other members of the House of Commons believe there should be a melting pot, and Quebec should be blended with the rest of Canada, and I think Quebec deserves particular treatment.

I am not asking for any favours from other provinces of Canada. But if Canadian Confederation is to be kept alive, Quebec should have the same number of members as the largest province, Ontario. In that respect, I suggest, even if the Leader of the Government wants that bill to be passed before Christmas, that this bill should be referred to a Senate committee. We shall then be in a position to bring in witnesses and stress those points we from Quebec want to make, because we insist that those figures stated by the Leader of the Government respecting representation will be extremely prejudicial to Quebec. As a citizen from Quebec, that is something I cannot put up with.

[English]

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, I propose to be blessedly short. I should like, first of all, to point out that this bill is essentially an amendment to section 51 of the Constitution.

I refer honourable senators to the report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada, and to recommendation 42 in chapter 14, which reads as follows:

The mechanism of redistribution of seats in the House of Commons as well as the limitations implied in the 15% rule and the Senate rule should be retained in the Constitution. The formula of representation, however, subject to our recommendations on the Bill of Rights, should be the exclusive prerogative of the House of Commons, to be dealt with by ordinary legislation.

I emphasize the words "should be the exclusive prerogative of the House of Commons."

Obviously the bill before us does not, or has not, considered this recommendation of the joint committee, to which I subscribed at the time, and to which I still subscribe, in that clause 2 of the bill, at lines 15 to 19 thereof, says:

[Senator Asselin.]

—be readjusted by such authority, in such manner, and from such time as the Parliament of Canada from time to time provides, subject and according to the following Rules—

I do indeed regret that that recommendation of two years ago was not taken into consideration, but as long as—

Senator Asselin: You know that there was a minority report.

Senator Lafond: I was talking of the majority report, of which I approved, and of which I still approve.

Until such time as this measure has been changed, therefore, I cannot refrain from expressing my opposition to what I consider as tampering with section 51 of the Constitution. I have used the same expression previously with respect to bills that change the names of constituencies, et cetera.

The Leader of the Government has told us that the endeavour was to find a solution acceptable and equitable to all or most members of the other place. Well, if I may say so, both figuratively and literally, when legislation affects the seats of members of the other place, I am not ready to take it as the fount of all wisdom.

[Translation]

I have heard and read everything that was said in connection with this bill in the other place. Furthermore, I have listened carefully to the remarks voiced here by the sponsor of the bill. However, I have not yet found any real motive to depart from the formula applied until now. I do not find in the new one any improvement to the democratic process or representation. I doubt very seriously that the new formula could bring important improvements in the Commons.

[English]

To my mind, honourable senators, this bill is manipulation for the sake of manipulation. In the 1950s, when the formula heretofore in effect was approved, every politician and every party was claiming that the purpose, again, was to have the hands of Parliament, and the hands of politicians off the redistribution process.

It did not happen the first time, but to my mind, on the second opportunity, the temptation will have proven irresistible. Therefore, I must record my dissent to this bill. I think it is a retrograde step.

On motion of Senator O'Leary, debate adjourned.

APPROPRIATION BILL No. 5, 1974

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Léopold Langlois moved the second reading of Bill C-45, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1975.

He said: Honourable senators, you will recall that royal assent has already been given to three supply bills covering estimates for the current fiscal year. The first provided interim supply for the months of April, May and June, and the second, agreed to on October 17, 1974, provided full supply for the balance of the main estimates as well as full supply for the first supplementary estimates. The third, which was read a second time today, provided full supply for the second supplementary estimates.

The bill now before us provides for full supply for the third supplementary estimates, which total $365 million. These estimates, supplementary estimates (C), consist of a single item which is requested to provide for the costs of equalization of oil prices in eastern Canada—that is, for that part of Canada situated east of the Ottawa Valley line. That is for the balance of the current fiscal year.

The passage of this bill is necessary due to the fact that the petroleum administration bill has not been passed in the other place. If this present bill is passed, the total estimates of this year will attain a grand total of $26.316 million.

There was a degree of debate in the other place, but there was a general agreement, since Bill C-32 was not going to be passed before the end of the year that supplementary estimates (C) were the only means of providing the necessary funds to carry over until March 31, 1975, and this bill got very speedy passage in the other place. For that same reason, and considering the agreement arrived at in the other house, I commend this bill to your favourable consideration.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, it is certainly not the intention on this side to delay passage of the bill, but I think some further comment may be in order and, therefore, I move the adjournment of the debate until the next sitting.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, December 18, 1974

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-14, to incorporate the Federal Business Development Bank, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Godfrey moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he can tell us what is the program for the remainder of this week, assuming that we are going to adjourn on Friday for the Christmas recess.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I shall undertake to communicate that information as quickly as possible. However, at this stage it is impossible to know what measures will be coming to us from the other place. I shall endeavour to keep the house fully informed.

INDIAN OIL AND GAS BILL

THIRD READING

Senator McDonald moved the third reading of Bill C-15, respecting oil and gas in Indian Lands.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, before the question is put I should like to say a few words on this bill. I had hoped that Senator Laird might have said something about yesterday's committee meeting when representatives of Indian unions and associations, primarily from Ontario, were heard. They expressed concern about some aspects of this legislation, particularly with respect to the power of the Governor in Council to make regulations concerning the development of oil and gas reserves on Indian lands. Some suggestions were made as to the possibility of getting the approval of a band before such regulations are made. It appeared in committee, however, particularly from some remarks made by Senator Williams, that the problem was really one of amending the Indian Act itself in order to ensure that the decision of the Indian band was the decision of the entire band and not of a few individuals, be they members of the council or members of the band. We came to the conclusion that this was a matter to be dealt with eventually by way of amendment to the Indian Act.

I wanted to put on record that the Senate committee had heard representations from some Indian unions and associations, and that we listened to their views. I hope that eventually the department will see fit to bring in amendments in accordance with the representations they made.

Senator Laird: Honourable senators, as the member of the committee who was probably responsible for the adjournment to allow this particular group from Ontario to be present, I can say that the Leader of the Opposition has correctly stated what happened. All I can do at this stage is emphasize the fact that both in committee and outside afterwards I urged them to give more intensive study to the propositions they had advanced so as to be prepared to make further representations at the appropriate time.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

APPROPRIATION BILL No. 4, 1974

THIRD READING

Senator Langlois moved the third reading of Bill C-42, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1975.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, since yesterday's debate I have given much thought to the problem which faces us due to the refusal of the Senate to refer this bill to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. It is not my intention, as it would be contrary to the rules, to criticize the decision of the Senate. However, I should like to draw the attention of honourable senators to some problems. It seems to me, first, that the position taken by Senator Everett and endorsed by Senator Hicks, that a supply bill does not have to be referred to a committee, in which view they were supporting the implicit attitude of the Deputy Leader of the Government, is very dangerous indeed. The main argument used by Senator Everett was that supply bills simply were not referred to committee. He was supported in this by Senator Hicks, who quoted from certain authorities contained at the back of our book of rules, opinions not at all reflected in our rules. That was a rather naive and barren argument. There is no such thing as a rule which will not afford to the Senate the opportunity to consider a supply bill, as distinct from the estimates, in committee.

Of course, it has been the practice in recent years, which has proved to be an improvement, to consider the estimates in committee. However, that procedure was not intended to prevent or refuse opportunity to examine a supply bill in committee. It is inherent in the remarks made yesterday by Senator Everett that he feels that the mandate or terms of reference of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance permit it only to examine the estimates and have nothing to do with the supply bill itself.

I have previously said here that sometimes problems raised by a supply bill are one thing, and those raised by the estimates are something else. Over the years in the other place the estimates have been considered and then the supply bill has also been debated in another manner than the estimates themselves. Senator Perrault said that I was a member of the former government in 1962. I was in the House from 1958 to 1962, and I remember very clearly that previous to that period the supply bill itself had not been very often debated in the other place. When I was there, the practice developed—it was probably as a result of the initiative of my honourable friend's predecessor, our former leader, Senator Martin—to arrange a debate on the supply bill. I am quite sure that Senator Benidickson, who was then the Opposition's financial critic, remembers that consideration of some of those supply bills took up a lot of time in the other place. I will not say that the time was necessarily usefully spent, but it was, nevertheless, spent.

This now having been made the practice, I would say again that there is nothing in our rules which states that the supply bill should not go to committee. If it should go to a committee, I suggest that under our rules it should be the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. If that has not often been the case, it was the case on at least one occasion. I should like to refer to what happened during the previous Parliament, when we dealt with Appropriation Bill No. 1 of 1973. If honourable senators will refer to Hansard at page 293 and following, they will find there was a debate in this place on the supply bill. It was probably due to the efforts of the Opposition, but nevertheless honourable senators will find that the present deputy leader, who was then acting deputy leader because he had not yet been confirmed—he has since been confirmed by the present leader, which is very good—moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. That was done, and there was quite an extensive hearing in committee. It is reported in the proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance of Friday, February 23, 1973. It says:

Complete proceedings on Bill C-141, intituled: "An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1973."

That was the case I referred to a few days ago when we were wondering whether there was not a contradiction between the estimates, which were the schedule of the bill and section 2 of the bill, which appropriated a certain amount of money. That was cleared up in committee more or less satisfactorily, but at least we did our job with respect to this question mark, which to me is still a very important question mark, of what we are to do when the supply bill in some way contradicts the estimates themselves. That was the case in this particular instance.

So it is quite obvious, honourable senators, that there can be differences between the estimates and a supply bill. A supply bill need not be exactly the same as the estimates, and very often is not. That is entirely correct. I think I made that point very clear. But Senator Everett—I do not know if he did not want to deal with the problem we raised—seemed to take the attitude that the Committee on National Finance had nothing to do with the supply bill and should concern itself only with the estimates proper. That is entirely wrong, both in principle and in practice. We have done this previously; we have done it, not only because there was a vote but because the Deputy Leader of the Government at that time agreed that the bill should be referred to committee.

I would hate to think that the Senate is adopting the attitude that supply bills will never go to committee. That is nonsense; it is irresponsible. If the Senate wishes to adopt that attitude, wishes to create that precedent, I certainly will not agree. My honourable friend Senator Langlois will say, "Well, it has been the practice, and because it has been the practice it must be good." I say no. We are not slaves of habit here; we are not going to do something simply because it has been done previously. In my opinion, it is crazy to take that attitude; it is irresponsible to take that attitude. I suggest to the Senate that it is a bad principle to say that supply bills will not be referred to committee simply because the National Finance Committee has examined the estimates. That is wrong; it is bad; it is dangerous.

The second point I want to discuss is the attitude taken by the Leader of the Government. In that connection, I quote from page 416 of yesterday's Hansard, as follows:

I would remind Senator Flynn, who served, as I recall, in a federal government of another political persuasion, that during his time in the other place precisely the same procedure was followed with no objections at all, and no suggestions as to alleged impropriety or indecency or illegality or other inferences of the kind that we have heard here this afternoon. Such suggestions really do not add to the stature of Parliament.

A little further down on page 416, Senator Perrault said:

This has been admitted and established by the Deputy Leader of the Government in this house, but at this point to suggest that there is some impropriety, or that there is an attempt at concealment, adds very little, I think, to the stature of this place.

Honourable senators, I want to deal, first of all, with the suggestion that a similar clause to clause 5 of Bill C-42 has been contained in previous appropriation bills. I agree with that. I am not disputing that. But this is not the case with all appropriation bills. I would say that in only one out of three appropriation bills would such a clause be found. Once a year, as a rule, a clause relating to the borrowing of money is inserted in an appropriation bill. Here again I would remind you that the practice in the other place for many years was to deal with supply bills in another phase, after the estimates. Supply bills were not dealt with at the same time as the estimates, and it was not taken for granted that supply bills merely reflected, word for word and dollar for dollar, the estimates. Therefore, if such authority was found in a supply bill, there was an opportunity to question the minister as to why he needed this additional borrowing power of $1 billion, $2 billion or, as in the present case, $2.5 billion.

Whether members of the other place were interested in finding out the reason for the borrowing authority, or whether honourable senators were interested in the reason for the borrowing authority, is not relevant. I do not care whether there was a debate or not. My point is that there should always be an opportunity for members of either house to question the minister with respect to the borrowing authority. But because of an order which was made in the other place in relation to Bill C-42, the members of that house were taken by surprise. They were unable to secure information from the Minister of Finance because the Speaker ruled there was an order of the house that there should be no debate. Therefore, the bill had to pass or not pass. It passed. But in practice, if they had known what was to happen they would not have accepted the order of the house that there should be no debate on the supply bill. They did so only because they assumed that the bill would merely reflect the estimates.

When I moved that the bill be referred to the National Finance Committee, I did not want the committee to go over what it had gone over before. I did not want anything like that. I did not want any repetition. I merely wanted, as was mentioned but apparently not understood, that the minister be invited to tell us what were the circumstances that incited him to ask Parliament for authority to borrow $2.5 billion. Is that an insignificant question? Is it an unimportant question? Is it an unimportant matter, authority to borrow $2.5 billion?

Senator McIlraith: Will the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Flynn: Certainly.

Senator McIlraith: If that is what is in his mind, why did he not frame his motion differently instead of merely in the language of referring an appropriation bill back to the committee?

Senator Grosart: Not back to the committee.

Senator McIlraith: To the committee, I am sorry; not back.

Senator Flynn: When I move the motion I have prepared there will be an answer to Senator McIlraith's question and he perhaps will vote for the motion, because that is exactly what I am going to move.

Senator McIlraith: Why didn't you do it then?

Senator Flynn: Because I thought the Senate would understand that that was the only point I was making. I did not intend to have the committee go over all the estimates. I was very clear, I thought, but apparently I was not understood, so I am going to try harder to be understood today.

My point is that we are occasionally very interested in sending a supply bill to committee. We should not decide categorically that we will never send a supply bill to committee merely because the National Finance Committee has gone over the estimates. That is my point. I do not want the committee to go over again what it has already gone over. I think this point is very important. Let us say that tomorrow we find not only a clause like clause 5 of this bill but another clause in an appropriation bill—because there is nothing to prevent the government from inserting other provisions in an appropriation bill. This is the thesis of the deputy leader. He said that in an appropriation bill you can find anything. That is true. The one dollar items are sometimes legislative provisions that have no real money significance. You can insert all sorts of clauses, but according to this strange reasoning, because the estimates had been examined by the National Finance Committee, we would be unable to secure information through an examination of these clauses in committee. I am speaking now of clause 5, and I am speaking of sub-clause (2) of clause 3. It is not because it may have been done since Confederation, as mentioned by the Leader of the Government, that we should not be able to question officials of the department or ministers about the exact meaning of certain clauses.

Senator Everett considers that everybody understands a clause because it has been found in bills for years and years. That has not been my experience, and I would say it has not been the experience of most members of this house, whether or not they have been in government. We find that some clauses have a different meaning today from what they had in previous times and that meanings change with the years. Naturally, it is a useful thing to try to inform us. We are not again going, I repeat, to make decisions with our eyes closed.

But now I come back to what I was saying before. I discussed the fact that the Leader of the Government said that this procedure had taken place over the years. Again, I don't care! If I am not satisfied that this procedure is correct, I am, I think, entitled to some explanation in committee, and I suggest to you that nobody should be prevented from obtaining adequate information. I may be more stupid than all of you, but—

Some hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Flynn: I know, I know. That would not, of course, worry my good friend Senator Greene. All he ever worries about is whether I am speaking for my party. Unlike him, sometimes I am able to speak for myself. I may be more stupid than he, but at least I try to understand. I don't take for granted that anything my party does is right. Maybe he does. That is his own business.

I now come to another point. Yesterday the leader said that it was improper for us to allege impropriety or indecency or illegality. Illegality! Just imagine! He said that if you suggest illegality you do not add to the stature of Parliament. You cannot raise the problem of legality, because you will hurt Parliament if you do. This is what Senator Perrault said. The second thing he said was that you do not add to the stature of Parliament if you speak of impropriety. Just imagine! What are we here for, if we cannot discuss impropriety, if we cannot discuss illegality? What are we here for?

Then he said that we should not argue indecency. Indecency! Well, I did not argue indecency until I saw the Deputy Leader of the Government stubbornly refuse to send the bill to committee without valid justification.

Well, when somebody says, "No, I won't give you any reason. I am satisfied with the opinions I get from Mr. Gibson"—or from someone else—"and you should be satisfied," I say no. I am entitled to question, to wonder and to suggest—no not indecency. I did not say that. What I said was "Have you anything to hide?" Well, if I cannot put that question without offending against the dignity of Parliament, as is implied in the suggestion that such an accusation would not add to the stature of Parliament, then I wonder what I am doing here. I wonder what I am doing here if I must have the same responsibility as the Leader of the Government and that of his deputy, which responsibility was described by that deputy yesterday as being the responsibility to rush legislation through, or to push legislation through?

Senator Langlois: I never said that.

Senator Flynn: You did say that. You can read it in Hansard. You said that. You said, "My only responsibility is to push legislation through."

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I have been accused of having said yesterday that I was putting the legislation through forcibly. I challenge that statement and I ask the Leader of the Opposition to withdraw it or to cite Hansard to that effect.

Senator Flynn: You ask me to withdraw it? I will not withdraw it. I was here when it was said, and it is your problem. If you want to deny that you wanted to say that, I will accept that correction.

Senator Langlois: I deny it.

Senator Perrault: He must have been hearing voices.

Senator Flynn: I heard you say that yesterday, and nothing will change that fact. This is my position.

Senator Perrault: You must have been hearing voices.

Senator Langlois: What is your position?

● (1440)

Senator Flynn: I say that I heard it, and nobody is going to question my statement that I heard it.

Senator Perrault: You heard voices.

Senator Langlois: From your side, probably.

Senator Flynn: No, no. From your side. From your mouth.

Senator Langlois: I challenge that.

Senator Flynn: Whether you challenge it or not, you said it.

Senator Langlois: Prove it.

Senator Flynn: I do not have to prove it. I can state what I heard. Whether you wanted to say it or not is another thing. If you say you didn't want to say it, I will accept your correction. But you said it.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I rise on a point of order? May I suggest that the honourable Leader of the Opposition is engaging in the old practice: "When one has a weak case, start yelling." I do not think the presentation this afternoon really adds to the stature of this house. Just as I said yesterday, the inference of concealment on the part of the honourable Leader of the Opposition is a base calumny, without any substantiating evidence, when the government is moving ahead with respect to this measure as has been the case down the years, legally, constitutionally and fairly. But this kind of inference, that somehow there is an attempt at concealment, very much detracts from the statute of this house, and I think that it bears repeating.

Senator Flynn: I do not mind Senator Côté and Senator Greene applauding the Leader of the Government. I could rise on a point of order because he accused me of calumny, and this is not parliamentary; but I will not ask him to withdraw that at all. I did not say anything that was not parliamentary as far as Senator Langlois is concerned, but the Leader of the Government, who has a huge voice and who criticizes others because they raise their voice occasionally, has accused me of calumny. I will not ask him to withdraw that accusation; nor do I care whether he withdraws it or not, because I have not been guilty of any calumny as far as Senator Langlois is concerned. I said that I heard him say, "My responsibility here is to push legislation through."

Senator Langlois: I did not say "push."

Senator Flynn: What did you say, then?

Senator Langlois: "To take legislation through."

Senator Flynn: Well, I accept—

Senator McDonald: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition is continuing to state that he heard certain utterances, certain words, from the Deputy Leader of the Government. If those words were said I suggest that they will appear in Hansard.

Senator Flynn: Oh, no. Not these words.

Senator McDonald: I cannot find those words in Hansard, and I suggest to the Leader of the Opposition—

Senator Flynn: Oh, no.

Senator McDonald: —that if he wants to repeat words that appear in Hansard, our official record, then nobody is going to complain; but I want to suggest to him that it is improper to make suggestions that anybody said anything in this house that does not appear in our Hansard. I challenge him either to produce it from Hansard or to remain quiet or to withdraw it.

Senator Langlois: Withdraw.

Senator Flynn: Senator McDonald, do not get excited.

Senator McDonald: I am not getting excited, you are. Just stick to the facts.

Senator Flynn: You should be happy with what Senator Langlois said. He said, "I did not say 'push', I said, 'take'," and I am willing to accept the statement of Senator Langlois to the effect that he said, "I have my responsibilities to take legislation through." But even if we replace the word "push" by the word "take," I am sure you will agree that the meaning is the same. I am sure you will understand it the way I do.

Senator McDonald: I understand, and it is quite a different understanding.

Senator Flynn: It is a problem of interpretation. It is very subtle. Let us see what it was that the Leader of the Government said when he came to the rescue of his deputy—who deserves a lot of merit, by the way, in trying to do the job that he does.

Senator Perrault: It was a fine speech.

Senator Flynn: Yours?

Senator Perrault: No. I am talking about the deputy.

Senator Flynn: Oh, yes. At page 416 we find the following:

SENATOR PERRAULT: Yes, on the basis of principle—
Just imagine, principle!

—and therefore we must insist on this side that this bill be not referred to committee.

Now, that would please Senator McDonald. I am quoting word for word from Hansard. There is no dispute as to semantics, or anything, as regards “push” or “take.”

Senator Perrault: Did you say you had a motion?

Senator Flynn: Yes. What is your rush?

Senator Perrault: There is no rush, but we would like to study it.

Senator Grosart: He has been speaking on third reading. Why do you not learn the rules?

MOTION IN AMENDMENT NEGATIVED

Senator Flynn: We will deal with my motion in due course. I am not in any mood to quarrel with my honourable friend. I like him too much. He is participating much more than usual, and that pleases me. I hope he goes on this way in the days to come.

Yes, on the basis of principle, and therefore we must insist on this side—

“On this side.” What is “this side”? It is your side, and of course, senators of Liberal allegiance on our side; but more, of course, you Liberal senators on the right of Madam Speaker.

“We must insist on this side.” That is a call to arms. “Come on. Solidarity first and forever. Come on, supporters of the government, we have a job to do whether the Opposition is right or not. We have to push this through; we must vote against this motion.”

That attitude, I think, is unacceptable in the Senate, especially on a problem which would have been resolved, I suggest, easily, quickly, and to the satisfaction of honourable senators generally if it had gone to committee.

I beg you to reconsider this decision. I think it would be a very bad precedent if you were to say today, again, that a supply bill will never go to a committee. You have accepted that it go to committee on at least one previous occasion. On this occasion I suggest that there are very important questions to deal with that would clear the air, and I am quite sure that they would help the government. If they did not, at least they would help Parliament. For this reason, honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Grosart, that the bill be not now read the third time but that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance with instructions

(a) to obtain information from the Department of Finance on the meaning and ramifications of sub-clause (2) of clause 3, and of clause 5;

[Senator Flynn.]

(b) to obtain information from the Department of Justice upon and to consider the legality and constitutionality of clause 5; and

(c) to amend the bill, if deemed advisable, possibly by deleting clause 5.

I think the motion speaks for itself. We have already debated the problems, and again I point out to you that the committee would not repeat anything that it has already done. It would serve to solve a specific problem. It would, I suggest, help both Parliament and the government, and certainly the Senate would be seen to assume its responsibility, and we on this side, we think, could join with the other members of the Senate and say, “The Senate has done a good job.” But I do not think that you on the other side should be treated the way the leader treated you yesterday.

● (1450)

Senator Benidickson: Could I ask the Leader of the Opposition a question?

Senator Flynn: Certainly.

Senator Benidickson: I believe you made reference to the time when you sat on the government benches in the other place and I sat on the Opposition benches and there was a discussion on a supply bill. My recollection of that is not very clear, and perhaps you have refreshed your memory by current investigation. I am just wondering if you suggested that at that time a supply bill in the other place was referred to a committee contrary to the rule cited by Senator Hicks last evening.

Senator Flynn: It was not a rule that he cited.

Senator Benidickson: Well, a ruling.

Senator Hicks: A statement of practice.

Senator Benidickson: Well, shall we say, appearing in our rule book. There was no referral at that time in the other place of a supply bill to a committee. You were referring to a debate in the other place?

Senator Flynn: Yes, but if Senator Benidickson will bear with me for a moment, what I said was that at that time it was not ordered that the supply bill should be passed without debate. The problem which arose in the other place was because of the order which was made that the bill, this supply bill, should be passed without debate. I was underlining that fact. I was not saying it was the practice. But Senator Hicks is suggesting that this practice is compulsory. It is not compulsory and the fact remains that in the past in this place we have referred a supply bill to a committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Langlois, seconded by the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., that this bill be read the third time.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Grosart, that the bill be not now read the third time but that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance with instructions

(a) to obtain information from the Department of Finance on the meaning and ramifications of sub-clause (2) of clause 3, and of clause 5;

(b) to obtain information from the Department of Justice upon and to consider the legality and constitutionality of clause 5; and

(c) to amend the bill, if deemed advisable, possibly by deleting clause 5.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: The question has been put.

Senator Langlois: I am speaking to the motion.

Senator Perrault: May we have the courtesy of having a copy of your motion in amendment?

Senator Grosart: It has been sent to the Chair as our rules require.

Senator Cook: Oh, oh!

Senator Flynn: I have no objection. Please don't groan. I would do anything for Senator Cook. Perhaps the Clerk will arrange for copies to be made available.

Senator Benidickson: Would Senator Flynn repeat the date of the referral of the supply bill? I think he said it was in 1973.

Senator Flynn: Yes it is at pages 307 and 308 of Hansard for February 22, 1973. At the end it says:

On motion of Senator Langlois, bill referred to Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, if I may now proceed with my remarks, the Leader of the Opposition in his opening words referred to that attitude I had taken yesterday. He said that I had taken an implicit attitude, if I understood him correctly, that supply bills should not be sent to a committee. I beg to correct his wrong impression or interpretation of my remarks. I merely said, and I took the precaution of adding that I was speaking in my own name, that I thought that this particular bill, not all supply bills, should not be referred to committee.

Senator Flynn: That is why I used the word "implicit."

Senator Langlois: I expressed my attitude quite clearly, and I am repeating now what I said at that time. I must add that I was impressed when later on in the debate Senator Hicks referred to page 136 of the Rules of the Senate of Canada and quoted the following:

Supply bills are not referred to a committee of the whole or to a select committee. However, the estimates on which a supply bill is based are referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance when they are tabled in the Senate. See Bourinot, Fourth Edition, pages 443 and 444.

Today, and I think yesterday also, my honourable friend said that this was antiquated. I think that is the word he used.

Senator Flynn: Bourinot is antiquated.

Senator Langlois: But this is the citation in our rules. I would refer honourable senators to this note on page 94 of our rules:

These forms and proceedings, formerly known as "Forms of Proceedings" have been revised in accordance with present practice and the new rules of the Senate. They are included as an appendix to the rules pursuant to the order of the Senate dated December 10, 1968.

If this is antiquated, honourable senators, then I do not know what that term means.

Senator Flynn: It does not mean that it is not antiquated.

Senator Langlois: In 1968 these forms and proceedings were included in this book by an order of this house. So I say that this quotation referring to "Forms of Proceedings" and forming part of our rules is not antiquated but is very much in accordance with today's practice.

Senator Flynn: That is not to say that it forms part of our rules.

Senator Langlois: May I be allowed to make my speech in peace this time? I was interrupted twenty times yesterday by my friend, and the same thing is happening again. Madam Speaker, I ask that my honourable friend be called to order on this point.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps you should challenge the non-ruling.

Senator Langlois: I am sorry, I did not hear you. Would you repeat what you said?

Senator Grosart: Perhaps you should challenge the non-ruling.

Senator Langlois: I think this deals with the opening remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition.

He then referred to this incident which took place a few years ago when a supply bill was referred by me—at his request, I grant you—to the National Finance Committee. I must add, however, that after I had done that in 1973 I was told outside of this place by a former leader of the Senate that I was wrong in doing so.

Senator Flynn: That does not prove anything.

Senator Langlois: I checked to find out whether I was wrong, and I came to the conclusion that I should not have done it. The reasons were given yesterday by Senator Hicks and by me, speaking generally in connection with supply bills. I do not believe I need to add further to this.

● (1500)

My honourable friend stated that I refused to refer the bill to the committee without giving any valid reason. I had hoped to be able to convince him before I rose in the Senate yesterday, but I am not surprised that I apparently failed. He spoke of me as being stubborn. I think this qualification applies equally to him.

Senator Flynn: But it is not the worst.

Senator Langlois: No, it is not the worst, but especially in your case it is. The honourable Leader of the Opposition again today referred to the assumed attack to which he was subjected yesterday by my leader when he said the leader should not have said what he did and accuse him of indecency. Today, however, the Leader of the Opposition seems to have given the impression that it was indecent on my part not to accede to his request to refer the bill to committee.

Senator Flynn: No, I never said that.

Senator Langlois: You gave this inference, though.

Senator Flynn: All right; I have no objection. I will not do as you did, and ask you to withdraw.

Senator Langlois: Speaking of "indecenty", I would like to refer the Senate to my honourable friend's statement today when he said that I had stated that the duty of the deputy leader is to rush legislation through.

Senator Flynn: "Push".

Senator Langlois: I opened my remarks yesterday by saying that during the short period that I had been acting as deputy leader I had made it clear to all that I was not here to defend the government or to fight the Opposition. I went on to explain what I considered to be my duty here as the Deputy Leader of the Government. I said this—and I am quoting from page 409 of Hansard:

I am here only to do what I consider to be my duty, which is to get legislation through.

There is a world of difference between "rushing legislation through" and "getting legislation through".

Senator Flynn: I am very satisfied with this, as it proves my point.

Senator Langlois: That is exactly what I said, and my honourable friend, who claims that he has a monopoly on decency and honesty—

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Langlois: —should admit that there is a world of difference between what he said today, "rush legislation through"—

Senator Flynn: "Push".

Senator Langlois: —and what I said, which was "get legislation through".

Senator Flynn: I said "push", not "rush".

Senator Langlois: I am ready to admit that my choice of words in English is not as perfect as his.

Senator Flynn: No, no!

Senator Langlois: I am ready to admit that humbly, but I am sufficiently familiar with the English language to know that "to get legislation through" is quite different from "to rush" or "to push" legislation through".

Senator Flynn: Hear, hear!

Senator Langlois: I come now to the motion presently before us, and, Madam Speaker, I wish to raise a point of order. The motion was moved by my honourable friend yesterday in which he intended to do exactly what his motion does today, to wit, refer the same bill to the same committee, the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance—

Senator Flynn: Yes—

Senator Langlois: Please allow me to finish.

Senator Flynn: Yes, but it is only for a question.

Senator Langlois: Are you rising on a point of order?

[Senator Langlois.]

Senator Flynn: Yes, just on a question pertaining to the rules. I have no objection if this point of order is raised, but if the deputy leader wished to raise a point of order on the motion that is the first thing he should have done.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Flynn: Yes, right after the motion was put, and before speaking to it. However, if he says he has finished with the substance of the motion—

Senator Langlois: I have not even put it.

Senator Flynn: But you said you rise on a point of order at this stage.

Senator Langlois: Well, allow me to put it.

Senator Flynn: Yes, but it should have been put before.

Senator Perrault: Listen to the facts here.

Senator Langlois: Madam Speaker, yesterday I was in the house—

The Hon. the Speaker: I should bring to the attention of the honourable senator that the Honourable Senator Langlois has the floor, and should be given an opportunity to be heard.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Langlois: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Yesterday I was in the house when the honourable Leader of the Opposition moved a motion to refer the supply bill presently before us to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. As I read the motion he has just moved, it pursues the same purpose, of referring the same bill to the same committee.

I raise the point of order, Madam Speaker, that the Senate cannot be asked to deal with two motions of the same intent and purpose during the same session. That is a well accepted principle under the rules of our house, and for that reason I submit that the motion presently put before the Senate is out of order and should be so ruled.

Senator Flynn: I understand the question now, Madam Speaker, is on the point of order.

Senator Langlois: Yes.

Senator Flynn: That is really what I wanted the deputy leader to explain. There is the substance of the motion, and the validity of the motion, to which he now objects. I have no quarrel with the manner in which he is proceeding, but if the question is on the point of order, I would first say to the Senate and to Madam Speaker that we have no rule which would support the views of the deputy leader. The practice and the principle have been that the same question as a whole, but not similar bills, can be debated in the same session. However, we all know that at all stages of the proceedings of a bill—second and third reading—the debate can be started all over again when a motion is put after second reading and before third reading to refer a bill to a committee. When an amendment is proposed at the stage of second reading it can be disposed of, but the same amendment can be moved at third reading. It is not the same question that is in dispute at all.

The second and most obvious point is that supported by Senator McIlraith. The motion today is not merely to refer the bill as a whole to the committee, but to refer two sections or parts of the bill, with specific instructions. That makes quite a difference, and the problem faced by the committee would be not the same at all. Yesterday, as was observed by Senator McIlraith, my motion would have had the effect of having the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance deal with the complete bill, including schedules and estimates contained therein. Today, however, my motion refers only to two parts of the bill, with specific instructions to find out about these two points, which is entirely different.

I have no objection, but attempting to hide behind a point of order is again demonstrative of the questionable attitude of the Deputy Leader of the Government.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I think we have generated far more heat than light on this subject this afternoon, and it would be in the interests of this house to have a ruling from Madam Speaker. Before this request is made, however, let me say that clearly the words of this motion proposed by the Leader of the Opposition are these:

I therefore move, seconded by Senator Grosart, that this bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred to the National Finance Committee with instructions—

● (1510)

The motion again is that the whole bill be referred. Yet we have heard the fallacious argument by the Leader of the Opposition that somehow it is only one aspect of the bill that is being referred, when his very words refute what he is trying to say this afternoon.

Senator Flynn: Finish the motion before you speak like that. You are distorting what I have said.

Senator Perrault: Here again are these wild charges by a wild man. It is unfortunate that the Leader of the Opposition has to engage in tactics of this kind, to make charges of this kind. I was always under the impression that people in Parliament, members of either house, were generally honourable men and women. We expect that our intentions are going to be regarded as being honourable intentions.

Senator Macdonald: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. It has been implied—

Senator Perrault: That is not a point of order.

Senator Macdonald: The Leader of the Government has implied that the Leader of the Opposition is not an honourable man.

Senator Perrault: May I earnestly solicit, senator, your close attention to what is being said on this side of the house—

Senator Macdonald: I have been following you.

Senator Perrault: —that those who occupy places in this chamber are honourable people, and have to be regarded that way. Inferences and suggestions by the Leader of the Opposition that somehow there is an attempt to deceive, distort or prevent democracy from working are simply untrue. If we do not have the right to challenge the wording in this particular resolution or ask for a clarification of the rules, we do not have a properly and democratically operating Senate. I again point out the words:

—that this bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred to the National Finance Committee with instructions—

Then there are three instructions. Yesterday, as reported at page 411 of Debates of the Senate, Senator Flynn said:

Honourable senators, I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

It is the same referral. It is the same bill being referred.

I think we would all appreciate a ruling from Madam Speaker on this subject, and are willing to abide by that ruling. But let Senator Flynn not say, "I am not referring the bill at all, but only part of the bill." His own words are that he is referring the entire bill. If it is referred then the whole bill is before the committee. I am sure that we all feel we should have a ruling on this particular resolution.

Senator Flynn: It is a dangerous question that you are putting. You should be more careful.

Hon. Allister Grosart: On the point of order, honourable senators, there are two matters to be considered. One is the question of whether we have a rule prohibiting the same motion in regard to a committee on third reading. My first question is whether we have such a rule. It has not been quoted. On rising on a point of order, the Leader of the Government did not quote any such rule.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, for the sake of progress in this place, and of shedding light on this subject, I am making the suggestion that we have a ruling from Madam Speaker on this particular matter. I have served in many elected assemblies, and generally the rule, as I understand it, is that you simply do not move two consecutive motions if their intent is the same.

Senator Grosart: I am asking: Is this a rule of the Senate? That is the first thing I ask.

An Hon. Senator: Rule 47.

Senator Grosart: Yes, it is rule 47, which says:

A motion shall not be made which is the same in substance as any question which, during the same session, has been resolved in the affirmative or negative, unless the order, resolution, or other decision on such question has been rescinded as hereinafter provided.

The question is: Is it the same in substance? The rule says:

A motion shall not be made which is the same substance—

What is the substance of this motion? The substance of the motion presented by the Leader of the Opposition is to instruct a committee. In the previous motion there was no motion to instruct the committee. This is an essential difference, and I suggest on that ground that the rule I have just quoted does not apply. There is a significant difference—

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators—

Senator Grosart: Allow me to finish. I am on a point of order, to which the Leader of the Government has already spoken. There is a significant difference in substance. We have had this question discussed in this house, and we have had rulings on this very matter, that there is a significant difference between a motion to send a bill to committee and a motion to send a bill with instructions. That is a ruling that has been made in the Senate. The Leader of the Government was not here, but the deputy leader was and he may remember that particular ruling being made by Speaker Fergusson.

Given that the substance of this motion is not the same, the question is whether it comes within a convention. If it does not come within a rule, does it come within a convention or custom of the Senate? I am not aware that it does. This was a matter raised by the Leader of the Government, who took the position that in other legislatures he believed this to be the practice and custom. I will not dispute that.

I would say, on the first ground, that certainly if there is a ruling to be made, it should be clearly understood that the position we take here is that there is a definite distinction between a motion to send a bill to committee, which is a routine motion, and a motion to instruct a committee. The fact is that the wording "the bill be referred" with the instructions is absolutely necessary if we are to instruct the committee. We cannot instruct a committee without sending the bill and telling them what they are to deal with. Therefore, I suggest that these are two completely separate motions and are quite within our rules and within our conventions.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, it always strikes me that the Senate should be careful, when raising points of order, not to endeavour to define the rules in such a narrow way as to circumvent its own purposes and make it more difficult for the Senate to operate.

It is my understanding of this rule about repetition in a session—and I speak merely from memory—that we cannot move the same motion twice if the motion deals with something other than the action of second or third reading of an individual bill.

Senator Grosart: Quite right.

Senator Argue: If my memory serves me correctly, the following is an example of a motion that cannot be moved twice. If, in the course of the Throne Speech debate, there was a motion regretting that old age pensions are not being increased, and a vote was taken on that motion, it would not be in order a few weeks later, at some other stage, for someone again to move regretting that old age pensions are not being increased, because it would be the same motion in the same session.

To my mind, the second reading stage and third reading stage stand separately, and a fight to do something on second reading that is lost in no way prevents one, under our rules, from making the same attempt on third reading of the same bill.

If a motion to give a bill the six months' hoist on second reading is defeated, it is perfectly in order on third reading to again move the six months' hoist. The third reading should stand by itself or the Senate, this deliberative body, will find it impossible to function.

Many things may have happened between second and third reading that might cause members to vote in a different way on third reading. The whole purpose of the second and third reading stages is to give the body discussing the measure an opportunity to determine precisely what it wishes to do at those stages.

● (1520)

My advice, as a member of the party with the majority, is to refrain from raising unnecessary points of order. There is no danger that the Conservatives are going to run this chamber. Why not just generally allow such a motion to be put before the chamber and a vote taken thereon?

Apart from that general attitude and general practice, I feel that this motion on third reading is, in fact, in order.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the motion in amendment of the Leader of the Opposition is, in my opinion, acceptable. In that connection, I wish to read from Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure Fourth Edition, at page 329, as follows:

Consequently, if a question or bill is rejected in the Senate or Commons it cannot be regularly revived in the same house during the current session. Circumstances, however, may arise to render it necessary that the house should reconsider its previous judgment on a question, and in that case there are means afforded by the practice of Parliament of again considering the matter. Orders of the house are frequently discharged and resolutions rescinded . . . Sir Erskine May says on this point, which is one involved in some difficulty: "The only means by which a negative vote can be revoked is by proposing another question, similar in its general purport to that which had been rejected, but with sufficient variance to constitute a new question; and the house would determine whether it were substantially the same question or not."

Will those honourable senators who are in favour of the motion in amendment please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion in amendment please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And more than two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

REPRESENTATION BILL, 1974

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault for the second reading of Bill C-36, to provide for representation in the House of Commons, to establish electoral boundaries commissions and to remove the temporary suspension of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, having enjoyed myself immensely all afternoon, I am sorry to have to submit you to dullness now. If I were to conform to the current popular terminology of this house, I would begin by saying, "This is a simple bill." Well, it is a simple bill but, unfortunately, the way they have written it they have made it almost as complicated as the Einstein theory. Frankly, when I read some of the bills that come here, often stating a simple proposition and one capable of being treated that way, I almost revert to a belief in capital punishment.

Actually, I suppose, the primary interest or concern of this house in this bill should be merely to see to it that no province is deprived of its rights in so far as representation in Parliament is concerned. I was interested when Senator Asselin said yesterday that he hoped a situation would not arise under this formula of representation by which Quebec would lose seats, and a province like Ontario would gain seats.

I am supposed to represent an area of Ontario but, frankly, I am an exile from Quebec, and I would hate to see anything occur in this country which would reduce the representational power of the province of Quebec in this Parliament. After all, as Senator Asselin pointed out, Quebec and Ontario were the two main forces in Confederation. I wonder if Sir Georges Étienne Cartier and the other people from Quebec who fought "as bold as a lion" for Confederation, would have been as bold if they had thought the situation would arise in which the province of Ontario or the other Anglophone provinces would have a preponderance of power over Quebec. After all, we talk a great deal in this country about national unity. I submit to you, honourable senators, that national unity will not be promoted in this country, will not be served, if year after year or decade after decade we see Quebec representation decline proportionally in the Parliament of Canada.

I sometimes feel strongly about these representation bills. Personally, I am opposed to the boundaries of constituencies being determined by commissions. I think the character of constituencies in this country, geographically and by population, should be determined by members of Parliament themselves, and not by some commission composed of people who are not familiar with the democratic process.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator O'Leary: This I believe; and I cannot understand why members of the other house, and, I suspect, of this house, voted to have this right, this power, taken away from members of Parliament and placed in the hands of people who are not too much interested in democratic processes, and who are sometimes contemptuous of Parliament. This is wrong.

Another point is this: Why are we always increasing the number of parliamentary representatives? Surely to God 265 people can write the laws of Canada. What is all this haste, all this hurry, about getting more and more members of Parliament and placing more and more laws on our statute books?

Sometimes I go to New Brunswick, which is my second home in Canada, and last year I had occasion to look at the boundary representations devised there by these commissions, and, really, they are scandalous. The boundary of a riding will start in Saint John, New Brunswick, and will meander all up and down the Saint John river and end up somewhere near Fredericton. That is nonsense, surely.

I am always opposed to commissions and bodies outside Parliament determining what should be done about Parliament and to parliamentarians. Most of all, I am opposed to too many members of Parliament—too many members of Parliament, too many laws, and too much big government.

I can recall when I first went to the parliamentary press gallery in 1912. That is a long, long time ago. We fought World War I, with 500,000 men overseas, with 14 cabinet ministers. We fought World War II with 21 cabinet ministers. Now we are getting up to 30 or 40 cabinet ministers, and, as for parliamentary secretaries, you could not throw a snowball on Parliament Hill today without hitting one.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator O'Leary: This, honourable senators, is absolute nonsense. So what do you have? You have more laws, more work for the government, more control by the state. We used to complain in this country that the government looked after people from the cradle to the grave. Now, my God, they are looking after them from the womb to the cradle. This is not good. We do not need all these laws.

The members of Parliament in the House of Commons now say they are overworked, and I think they are. But why are they overworked? It is because there are too many laws, too many petty things, to look after. They are ombudsmen. That is what they are. They are not members of Parliament at all.

The members of Parliament in the House of Commons do not think or believe they are there to give to this country the benefit of their judgment. They think they are there—and this is what makes the work for them, this is why they say they are overworked—to get jobs and patronage and what-have-you for their particular constituents. This is what is happening with these large parliaments. I am against it, frankly. As one of the few small "I" liberals left in the country, I am against big government, just as I am against big unions. Everything is big this, big that, big the other thing—high rise apartments, and what have you. This thing is really complicating government in this country, and making it more difficult.

It is giving rise to the sort of thing we had in the other place last week about people saying we must be paid more. I am against our being paid more. I am certainly against people being paid more in the Senate. We don't earn the money. If a bill was brought in to give a bigger indemnity to the members of the House of Commons, I would have gone for it, perhaps, under certain conditions—not the tax-free proposition, though. I think they are deserving of more money, but I don't think many members of this house are deserving of it. There may be two or three who are deserving of it, but I am not, and I don't know of too many others who are deserving of these increased indemnities. Even so the bill was not presented properly. The government said, "We'll give you 50 per cent," but then they're going to take it all back again. Nobody even pointed this out. This great increase of 50 per cent isn't 50 per cent at all. I'm a poor man. It would mean something to me. But I look across to those on the other side of the house, and realize it's all going to be taken away from them. Those of us who belong to the poor man's party could have done with this money, perhaps, but looking over at my friend, Senator Langlois, and people like him, I wonder what it means to them? Nothing. They have to pay it all back.

Something was said in the debate yesterday that I am inclined to agree with. I always listen to Senator Lafond with great interest, but on this occasion I could not quite understand the constitutional point he made, though there may have been some validity to it. Senator Asselin, however, pointed out two or three things that I go for, and that some others in this house could go for.

The main thing I am concerned about is: Don't let us keep adding and adding to the numbers of the members of Parliament, and for heaven's sake, and for the sake of national unity in this country, don't let us do anything that will surround Quebec, or submerge the people of Quebec and their culture and their language, by getting more and more members of Parliament from other parts of Canada. I am prepared to fight that to the end. As I said, I am an exile from Quebec, but I am against all this business of having more members of Parliament, more parliamentary executives, more parliamentary assistants. As I said, if I went out this afternoon and threw a snowball on the hill, I would hit one. We don't need all of these people. I remember Senator Crerar when he was here. When Senator Crerar was in the Cabinet he refused a parliamentary secretary, and he refused a parliamentary assistant. He said, "I don't need them. They'll just get in my way." You can't get into the parliamentary restaurant nowadays without running over a parliamentary secretary.

What are we doing in this country? We are building a bigger and bigger government, complicating the democratic process, and creating disrespect for Parliament. On this subject, don't make any mistake about it. If ever we have seen evidence of this disrespect and distrust for Parliament, we have seen it in the press in the past few days. This is what has happened. We have too many members of Parliament, too many senators, too many laws. We have too many regulations and too much interference. For God's sake let us get back to good Liberal-Conservative principles.

I am sorry, honourable senators; I have spoken too long. Even so, despite what I have said about you gentlemen on the other side, and despite your political heresy on that side, I do hope, though your conscience may forbid it, that you have a fairly happy Christmas.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: I would like to say a few words about this bill.

[English]

Honourable senators, I would like to say a few words on the subject of this bill, but before I do so I would like to ask two questions of the Leader of the Government.

I refer the honourable Leader of the Government first of all to page 422. There he said:

I would like to remind honourable senators that passage of this bill is required before Christmas in order that commissions might be established—

Could the leader elaborate, and give us a few additional details about the urgency here? If some of us have reservations about this bill, and feel that we need additional information, what harm would be done if this bill were passed after the holidays? That is my first point.

My next point is: If this bill receives second reading, is it the leader's intention to move that it be referred to a committee?

These are the two points I wish to raise, at this time, though I may add a few things later on.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it was decided in the other place a number of months ago that the distribution of seats, under the terms of the 1952 formula, was generally unsatisfactory to all parties. Thus it was agreed that this redistribution process of establishing new boundaries, and allocating those new boundaries and proclaiming them, would be suspended until December 31, 1974. If Parliament does not act before that date, the suspended 1952 formula will come into effect again and it will apply. It will mean, for some of the provinces, real difficulties.

For example, if you will refer to the table which I made available yesterday afternoon you will see a diminution in the seats of the Maritime Provinces, if the 1952 formula is applied, for example, to 1971 and 1981 population projections. If we leave the formula untouched we will see a decrease in the number of seats in the province of Quebec to a projected 68 after 1981. If we go with the 1952 formula based on the 1971 census figures, in the next election the province of Quebec will lose one or two seats. So this is a very serious thing as far as the provinces, the regions and the political parties of Canada are concerned.

Parliament has undertaken to devise a fairer and more acceptable formula, but the deadline for this is December 31 of this year. Hence the urgency.

Along with other honourable senators, I think it unfortunate that the measure could not have come over here more quickly, but the proposal is the result of long hours of deliberation, debate and discussion in the other place, and the formula has been a difficult one to evolve.

As I said yesterday, it is not totally satisfactory to any province or, really, to any party; but it represents an agreement, an accord, a compromise, in the kind of tradition we have established since Confederation.

Senator Deschatelets: That was exactly my point. The leader says that this piece of legislation is a compromise, but this compromise is based on new criteria. This is exactly the reason why I would like to have this bill examined before a committee.

In any event, the leader did not answer my question. Does he intend, if we pass this legislation on second reading, to move that it go before a committee so that we may have more details?

Senator Perrault: Senator Deschatelets, I would hope that we would not find it necessary to refer it to committee. Let me remind you of a sentence or two from an excellent speech made yesterday by Senator Lafond when he was speaking on this subject. He referred to the report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada which discussed this matter at length. I will read the recommendation he quoted. It is found on page 424 of Debates of the Senate of yesterday.

The mechanism of redistribution of seats in the House of Commons as well as the limitations implied in the 15% rule and the Senate rule should be retained in the Constitution.

This is the important sentence:

The formula of representation, however, subject to our recommendations on the Bill of Rights, should be the exclusive prerogative of the House of Commons, to be dealt with by ordinary legislation.

I think that generally in this place we support the view that members in the other place should have a very decided prerogative to move and make recommendations in the area of redistribution.

This bill is the result of a great deal of committee work over there, and I think the time urgency facing Parliament is such that referral to a committee here would be necessarily very brief indeed. We would be going over much of the ground already covered in the other place. So I would hope for the sake of the electoral system, and for the sake of making sure that the wishes of the various regions of Canada are reflected in legislation, that we would attempt to expedite this by the December 31 deadline if at all possible.

The general principle of the proposed redistribution method—and you questioned the formula involved—features these salient points reduced to their very essence. No province shall lose a seat as a result of any redistribution. That is point number one. There is a general feeling that it would not be fair to the Maritime Provinces, for example, or Quebec, or any other region of the country, to see a reduction in their number of seats in view of the increasing population in various parts of the country and increasing problems which have arisen regionally.

Senator O'Leary, in his excellent speech, made reference to the fact that he thought perhaps the number of constituencies is becoming too large. I think honourable senators may be interested in these facts, that if we go on—

Senator Grosart: Is the honourable Leader of the Government closing the debate?

Senator Perrault: No, I am not. I am simply trying to answer a question.

Senator Deschatelets: I have a few more questions.

Senator Perrault: Very well; ask them, and I shall try to answer them.

Senator Deschatelets: I do not have much to add to this except to say that if the leader assures me that because of the time factor it is not possible to refer this bill to committee then I shall still remain dissatisfied with this bill, and my dissatisfaction—

Senator Flynn: You will be like me.

Senator Deschatelets: —is because I sense that with the new criteria it is going to mean that after the 1981 census Quebec would have 79 seats and Ontario would have 110, which is a substantial difference of 31 seats. I honestly do not feel that I have enough information to convince me that this bill will not, in the long term, be prejudicial to my province. This is why I would have liked to see it referred to committee so that we can obtain all the explanations necessary, and examine other possibilities and other solutions. But if the situation remains as it is today, then I shall have to register my dissent.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, if there is a general feeling in the Senate that this bill should be referred to a committee, that is one thing, but it would have to be disposed of by December 31 because there is a real time urgency associated with it.

In so far as you are concerned about the reduction in the number of seats in Quebec, Senator Deschatelets, in relation to the other provinces, or the question of a smaller proportion of seats in Quebec in relation to the total population of Canada, or in relation to the total number of seats in the House of Commons after the 1981 census particularly, the fact is that the natural rate of growth in the province of Quebec is the lowest in Canada today. Under the formula which has been developed no province shall have more members per constituency than the province of Quebec. So the formula really involves assessing the situation in 1981 and the population of Quebec at that time, assessing the seat per population ratio in Quebec at that time, using the average constituency size in the province of Quebec, and dividing that into the province of Ontario projection which gives 110 seats.

Senator Hicks: Did I understand you to say that you are not closing the debate?

Senator Perrault: No, I am not, but it is difficult to answer these questions without going to some length, and I am trying to be helpful in the process. If you have a question I should be glad to hear it.

Senator Hicks: I do not have a question, but I should like to make an observation, by way of a brief intervention in the debate, to point out that while it is true that the number of seats accorded to Ontario under this bill will mean a substantial enlarging of Ontario's representation in comparison with that of Quebec, exactly the same thing applies to Ontario's representation in comparison with that of the Atlantic Provinces. At the present time the Atlantic Provinces together have 32 members, while Quebec has 74 and Ontario has 88. Under the bill and after the 1981 census two members only will be added to the Atlantic Provinces' representation; they will go from 32 to 34. Here I am not taking each province separately; in total they will go from 32 to 34.

During the same period, five seats will be added to Quebec and, as has been pointed out, during the same period 22 seats will be added to the province of Ontario.

I understand all the difficulties that have been referred to in relation to representation by population when we compare one province with a rapidly increasing population with another province whose population is not increasing so rapidly. But I would not want anybody to think that this constitutes any kind of deliberate discrimination on the basis of language or racial origin of the people of a province, because exactly the same thing that happens vis-à-vis Ontario and Quebec under this bill will happen vis-à-vis Ontario and the Atlantic Provinces as well.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, as a senator from Saskatchewan I take my regional responsibilities very seriously and so I have to stand and support as best I can the bill we have in front of us and which is under discussion today. It is all very well to hear Senator O'Leary so ably, as he always does, defend the status quo and indicate his disappointment at the growth of government. But, on the other hand, we have to recognize the unique problems of those areas of Canada which are not growing in population. It would be very well to conclude that representation by population should apply mathematically but, as we know, this is not the case in every constituency, and it is important that we maintain at least a modicum of able representation defined by the geographical areas that can properly be served.

My fellow senators from Saskatchewan will well recall the days when we had over 20 members in the House of Commons. If this act had not been proposed for redistribution in the next election Saskatchewan would have lost another seat, reducing the number to 12. Under the terms of the bill the number of our seats will, in fact, increase to 14. I suggest again, in the interests of my region, that it is very important that we have that number of representatives in the House of Commons if the area is to be adequately represented. I am sure that my colleagues would agree with me.

In my opinion, this is a step in the right direction. I agree with Senator O'Leary, that big government does not necessarily mean good government, and that we are inclined to keep adding. However, we do not wish to find, as we look into the future, many areas of Canada literally wiped out with respect to representation. We have seen this happen in Saskatchewan, as I say, having gone down from over 20 seats to what would have been 11. The areas are the same; it is just the fact that many of our rural areas have been depopulated. That does not mean that the member of Parliament has less problems or responsibility. I suggest to you that allowing those areas which are not sharing in the population growth to have the adequate representation that they deserve has been a very good compromise.

I agree with Senator O'Leary when he says we have too many laws. You will remember the old saying, "There should be a law against it." We have listened to that, but I sometimes feel today that we should change that dictum to "There should be no law against it," because we seem to be moving in the direction of regulating everything. However, I do not believe that that particular aspect of the problem has direct bearing on the representation problem which we are endeavouring to solve by means of this legislation.

Certainly, for these reasons, I hope the bill goes through as quickly as possible, so that those areas of Canada which need this kind of representation can maintain it and, indeed, gain in numbers of seats through this legislation.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I seek clarification. I am a bit puzzled as to the answers given the questions put by Senator Deschatelets. Am I not correct in saying that if this bill does not pass before December 31 the old provisions will again come into force.

Senator Grosart: Remain in force.

Senator Flynn: Presently they are suspended, so they will come back into force. The problem would not be that we would not be able to enact this legislation after December 31. However, the coming back into force of the old regulations would engender useless effort because those regulations are no longer to apply and it would occasion unnecessary expense. But the harm would not be irreparable, and we would be able to enact this legislation. However, I agree that it creates a problem and if we can dispose of this bill immediately there is no objection on my part.

The questions that Senator Deschatelets has in mind are very specific, and I believe we should hold a meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs tomorrow morning, with the officials concerned with this bill in attendance to answer these questions. The bill could then be given third reading tomorrow afternoon. I merely suggest that to the Leader of the Government. It seems to me that it would not create any problem, because in one way or another this bill will pass third reading tomorrow and receive royal assent on Friday. I hate to think that the questions presently troubling Senators Deschatelets and Asselin will forever remain unanswered.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not resist that idea at all, as I said earlier. It is certainly not our intention to bulldoze anything through the chamber.

Senator Grosart: Push.

Senator Perrault: I do not know whether this constitutes concluding the debate, or if other honourable senators wish to speak.

Senator Flynn: No, it is in order.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must inform the Senate that if the honourable Senator Perrault speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I know that a number of sensitivities are aroused by any form of redistribution. I know the attitudes in my own province, and in Quebec, Ontario, the Maritime Provinces and Newfoundland. However, this information may be of interest to you, that based on present population projections, if we proceed with the 1952 redistribution method applied to 1981 census figures, the average constituency size in the province of Quebec would be almost 94,000. Under the new formula the average constituency size would be 81,000, so there is substantially better representation under the new formula. Ontario would have almost 95,000 per constituency under the continued formula; under the new formula that number would be exactly the same as for Quebec, 81,000. Manitoba would have 60,000 per constituency under the new formula; under the continuation of the 1952 arrangements the average constituency size would be 95,000. Saskatchewan would have 65,000 under the new measure; if we proceeded with the 1952 plan the number would be 82,400. Alberta would have 78,000 under the new program, and 94,400 under the 1952 plan. British Columbia would have 82,000 under the new program. My own native province, in other words, is rated as a major province at that time, and is in the same category as Quebec and Ontario. If we proceed under the 1952 formula, the average constituency would have 94,000. Newfoundland would have 73,000 compared with 98,000. Prince Edward Island would have 29,000, compared with 29,500. Nova Scotia would have 69,000, compared with 82,900. New Brunswick would have 67,000, compared with 67,500.

I believe that completes the list. The projected Canadian average after 1981 would be 78,000 per constituency compared to 91,500 under the formula as it exists at the present time.

I have a comparison with some of the other countries in the world. I will not go through the entire list, but to give you some idea of average constituency sizes in some of the other democracies—and Senator O'Leary made reference to the fact that perhaps we are being over-governed in Canada,—I would point out that the Canadian average at the next election will be 77,500 per constituency, and this compares with average constituency size in Finland of 23,000; Norway, 26,000; Israel, 26,000; Denmark, 27,000; New Zealand, 34,000; the United Kingdom, 85,000; Italy, 85,000; France, 105,071; Germany, 118,000. The United States—of course, a far larger country—has an average constituency size of 480,092.

We face some particular problems in Canada by the nature of our geography. The urban centres of Canada present far fewer problems for most members of Parliament than do some of these northern constituencies. We have areas in Western Canada, just as they exist in Eastern Canada, into which half of Europe could be put. That is a very difficult kind of constituency to represent, and I do not believe that we can just proceed on the basis of population in such circumstances. Historically, I think that has been the Canadian position.

If I may go through the salient, or cardinal, points involved in this so-called amalgam method, number one is that no province shall lose a seat as the result of any redistribution. Parliamentarians are agreed that we do not want to take members away.

The second principle is no province shall have, as a result of a redistribution, a lesser number of seats than any other province with a smaller population.

● (1620)

The third principle is that once a number representing the seat total to be accorded a given province has been calculated, any remainder is to be dropped. In other words, if there are fractions, we recognize the fact that we cannot designate one-half of a member or a quarter of a member.

Senator Flynn: Are you sure?

Senator Perrault: At least, physically we cannot. I refer here to provinces with a population of less than 1.5 million—the so-called small provinces. Whenever there is an increase in the population of a province, its total number of seats will be determined by dividing its population at the most recent decennial census by the average constituency population of the provinces with a population of less than 1.5 million in the previous redistribution. If the population of such a province has not increased, its seat total will remain the same.

We have, therefore, the three categories of province, small, medium and large—like shirt sizes.

Provinces with a population of 1.5 million to 2.5 million: whenever there is an increase in the population of a province, it receives one additional seat for every two additional seats it would have received if it were a province in group (a) with the same average constituency population as the provinces in group (a). If the population of such a province has not increased, its seat total will remain the same.

In drafting the legislation, it was important to cover all possible, as opposed to reasonably foreseeable, eventualities. Thus there are rules in the bill providing for situations where there are no provinces with a population of under 1.5 million, by furnishing a new means of calculating the seat totals for provinces in the middle group. It is, of course, most unlikely that there will ever come a time when every Canadian province has a population of 1.5 million or more, considering that the population of Prince Edward Island is currently approximately 100,000.

That is the third category. I shall not go on at length. However, this should be included as part of the Senate record.

For the elucidation of honourable senators who may be involved in the committee study, the province of Quebec will receive 75 seats in the first redistribution, and an additional four seats after each decennial census. In other words, after 1981 there will be 79 seats. The other provinces in this group are allocated the number of seats obtained by dividing their populations by the average constituency population of Quebec.

The bill also provides for a review of population projections in the year 1979. For example, should there be a dramatic upsurge in the birth rate of the province of Quebec, the province of British Columbia, or any province—an increase because of natural reasons, immigration, and so on—it means that the Representation Act will again be reviewed by Parliament. The President of the Privy Council will again refer it to committee in the other place for review to ensure that the provinces are treated fairly.

So there are a number of safeguards in the proposed measure and attempts will be made to ensure that adequate review procedures exist to assure all the provinces of continuing fair representation in the other place.

Senator Lafond stated yesterday that this appeared to be, in his view, "manipulation." In my opinion, all types of redistribution involve some degree of manipulation, accommodation, or whichever word is used.

In 1952 a formula was evolved and developed which was really open to question by Canadians in many parts of the country, but who said, "For the sake of unity we have to come to an agreement. This is the way we are going to handle it." The parliamentarians of that day evolved the 1952 formula believing that in the years to come it would be effective and Parliament would have the right to reassess the position in the light of Canada's developing population. Today's parliamentarians in the other place made a new assessment and a new judgment, and in this place we should respect that judgment.

Therefore, honourable senators, I urge your support for this measure on second reading.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by Senator Perrault, seconded by Senator Langlois, that the bill be now read a second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Lafond: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Senator Perrault, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Langlois for the second reading of Bill C-45, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1975.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, approximately half an hour ago the Senate made a decision that Appropriation Bill No. 4, 1974 should not be referred to the National Finance Committee. The general argument was that the estimates on which that appropriation bill was based had already been before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

We now have the reverse situation. We have an appropriation bill based on supplementary estimates, those supplementary estimates not having been, as far as I know, referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

The authority of the appendix to our rules was quoted with approbation by a number of honourable senators, including the Deputy Leader of the Government, as being applicable. It was on this basis that the Senate was persuaded to make that decision. The paragraph that was quoted reads:

Supply bills are not referred to a committee of the whole or to a select committee. However, the estimates on which a supply bill is based are referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance when they are tabled in the Senate.

We seem to have the reverse case. I wonder if the management of the house intends to decide to have this both ways. So far as I can ascertain, supplementary estimates (C) were tabled in the house last night. As far as I know, they have not been referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. So the question that again faces us is: Is this a rule? Do we pay any attention to it? Do we say that the essence of the situation is that we do not debate an appropriation bill until the estimates on which it is based have gone to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance? Or do we say, "Let us forget it. We can have it both ways, whichever way the government wants to read it?"

In support of the fact that that has been the decision, taken as recently as yesterday, the distinguished Deputy Leader of the Government at one point said:

I see no reason why a committee should be convened to go through estimates which have already been studied by that committee.

● (1630)

I would paraphrase that as meaning, "I see no reason why the Senate should deal with an appropriation bill if the supplementary estimates on which it is based have not gone before a committee."

Also, the Chairman of the National Finance Committee, Senator Everett, as reported at page 413 of yesterday's Hansard, said:

—one of the objectives of referring the supplementary estimates to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance is to overcome the problem created by supply bills coming to this house at a time close to adjournment.

That, surely, is the precise situation with which we are faced now. Senator Everett, again on his authority as chairman of the committee—and this was only yesterday—as reported at page 414 of yesterday's Hansard, said:

We deal with the appropriation bill by dealing with the estimates. That is the whole concept of having the estimates referred to the National Finance Committee prior to our considering the supply bill.

Again, Senator Everett told those of us on this side:

—it is for the protection of the Opposition that we refer the estimates to the National Finance Committee prior to our receiving the supply bill—

I do not know why that has not been done in this case. Perhaps it was carelessness; perhaps simply an oversight. I am not entirely sure what the remedy is. Are we entitled, then, under this practice, this convention, to proceed with this bill when the whole procedure seems to be in such complete violation of what we were told only yesterday was the practice—and the specific practice upon which the decision of the Senate was made not to refer the estimates on which Bill C-42 was based to the National Finance Committee.

Perhaps at this point I should ask the Deputy Leader of the Government whether he would agree now to send supplementary estimates (C) to the committee. Perhaps the Deputy Leader of the Government could indicate, as it would save me a lot of time, as well as the time of the Senate, whether he is prepared now, even as a gesture, to say that the government is prepared to make a reasonable effort to comply with the rules—a reasonable effort not to take whatever interpretation they like at 3 o'clock and a different one at 4.30. I am sure the committee could meet very quickly.

It may, of course, be said, "Well, there is only a single item in these supplementary estimates." That is true, but it is a very important single item. It is an item on which there was discussion and questions raised, not merely in relation to the $365 million but as to the $1,165,000,000 which is involved in the program to which this relates.

I therefore ask at this point whether the government would consider, for the reasons I have outlined, referring supplementary estimates (C) to the National Finance Committee. If that is done, I am quite sure we can expedite the passage of this bill, which I am sure is desirable.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I have no objection to the suggestion made by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition. I might say that it would have been much easier to comply with had it been made yesterday when we started debate on this measure. We may have some difficulty, at this late stage, arranging a meeting of the committee with the appropriate officials present. I have just spoken to the deputy chairman, and he seems to think the committee could meet tomorrow morning, if it is the wish of the Senate that these estimates be referred to the committee. However, I am in the difficult position of not being able to give any undertaking that the minister will be in attendance. The minister, of course, is the main witness the committee would like to have before it in order to explain this appropriation. I do not even know whether he is in Ottawa. That is why I say it would have been much better if this suggestion had been made yesterday.

Perhaps Senator Grosart could adjourn the debate on second reading at this point, so that we can then have a motion to refer the estimates to the committee.

Senator Flynn: Do you think the committee will be empowered to look at the bill?

Senator Langlois: No, not the bill, but the estimates.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps I might reply. I appreciate the point made by the Deputy Leader of the Government. First of all, I thank him for the change in mood—

Senator Langlois: It is not a change of mood.

Senator Grosart: Allow me to finish the compliment, if you will, before you take issue with it.

Senator Langlois: I want you to phrase it properly.

Senator Grosart: I want to compliment the Deputy Leader of the Government on his change of mood, although I am not sure whether it is a change of mood or whether he suddenly found that, for once, we on this side are correct. Whichever it is, it is welcome.

Senator Langlois: It is very seldom that you are right, I must say.

Senator Grosart: It is a fairly important occasion. I would not agree that it is very seldom that we on this side are right, because we very often agree with our friends on the other side. Of course, we were told yesterday that the President of the Privy Council, the Honourable Mitchell Sharp, was wrong in a statement he made in the other place, so we can all be wrong.

I agree with the Deputy Leader of the Government that this suggestion should have been made yesterday, and I apologize for the fact that I did not raise it at that time. Quite frankly, I was busy, on the instructions of my leader, with another appropriation bill, which took up a good deal of my time. I was not expecting that we would have another appropriation bill so soon. I underestimated the government completely. I was not expecting we would have one appropriation bill one day for well over $1 billion, and the very next day have one for $365 million. I underestimated the spending power of the government, and for that I apologize.

Senator Flynn: Its capacity to spend.

Senator Grosart: The government's capacity to spend, yes. In addition, we were dealing with two or three closely linked matters, all involving spending power. I welcome the opportunity to deal with supplementary estimates (C) on which this bill is based in committee, and we on this side, of course, will do everything to facilitate the passage of this bill.

I therefore move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

CRIMINAL CODE (COMMUTATION OF DEATH SENTENCE)

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud presented Bill S-21, to amend the Criminal Code (commutation of death sentence).

Senator Denis: Honourable senators, would the sponsor tell us what the purpose of the bill is?

Senator Robichaud: Honourable senators, I intend to deal with this at length on second reading, but very briefly the purpose of the bill is to remove from the Governor in Council the authority to exercise clemency in cases of convicted murders of policemen and prison guards where no clemency is recommended by either the jury hearing the case or the presiding judge. Let me say that this bill is not prompted by recent sad events in my native province. I have had this in mind for several months, but what happened recently in Moncton simply helped to convince me that I should do this now.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Robichaud, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

REPRESENTATION BILL, 1974

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Laird, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-36, to provide for representation in the House of Commons, to establish electoral boundaries commissions and to remove the temporary suspension of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Perrault: With leave, now.

Senator Deschatelets: Honourable senators, before third reading, may I inform the Senate that a detailed explanation of this bill was given this morning in committee. The explanation convinced me that the provisions of Bill C-36 represent the best compromise to the complex problem relating to representation, province by province, in the House of Commons. I therefore support third reading.

Senator Flynn: Are you happy that I suggested the bill be referred to committee?

Senator Deschatelets: May I remind honourable senators that I am the one who made that suggestion.

Senator Flynn: On a point of order, I do not mind giving credit to Senator Deschatelets, but—

Senator Langlois: It is a question of privilege.

Senator Flynn: The honourable senator was willing not to send it to committee had the Leader of the Government not agreed. I am the one who really succeeded in convincing the leader. He was in a good mood after the vote yesterday.

Senator Deschatelets: In the current mood of Christmas, I am willing to give all the credit to the Leader of the Opposition.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C) TABLED

Senator Sparrow, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, tabled the following report of the committee, to which was referred the supplementary estimates (C) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1975.

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which the supplementary estimates (C) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1975, were referred, has in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, December 18, 1974, examined the said estimates and reports as follows:

(1) In obedience to the foregoing the committee made an examination of the supplementary estimates (C) and heard evidence from the Honourable Donald S. Macdonald, Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources; Mr. M. Foster, Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister; Mr. N. Stewart, Chairman, Energy Supplies Allocation Board; and Mr. M. Bryant of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

(2) The supplementary estimates (C) total $365 million and are needed in order to make payments for the restraint of prices of petroleum products to consumers primarily in the Atlantic Provinces, Quebec and that part of Ontario east of the line known as the Ottawa Valley Line. This amount will cover the three months of the new year from the 1st January to the 31st March, 1975, and will bring the compensation payments for the fiscal year 1974-75 to a total of $1.165 million. The necessity for this increase has been brought about by the fact that Bill C-32, the Petroleum Administration Act, which had been envisaged being passed by the 1st January 1975, has now been delayed until the new year. It was pointed out to your committee that this total does not include the $240 million appropriated for the last three months of the fiscal year 1973-74, i.e. from the 1st January to the 31st March, 1974.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources informed your committee that there is a surplus balance of over $200 million from the revenues of the export charge after compensation payments, that to date there has been no charge to general revenue, and that it is his objective to continue in this vein if possible.

Respectfully submitted

H. O. Sparrow
Deputy Chairman.

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, December 20, 1974, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon.

Motion agreed to.

[Senator Deschatelets.]

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government tell us what is expected of the Senate before we adjourn for the Christmas recess, be that tomorrow or just on the eve of Christmas? I am sure all honourable senators would like to know what is expected so that they can make plans.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I believe we will be in a position to know the remaining business either later today or early tomorrow morning. There is a possibility of two measures being referred to us from the other place. It would be our intention to proceed with those measures and, if possible, to conclude our consideration of them before the Christmas recess. As I say, we hope to be in a position to know more about that within the next few hours, and the information will be immediately communicated to the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Flynn: Is it expected that we will know before the Senate adjourns today?

Senator Perrault: We are hopeful that we will have information from the other place with respect to two relatively minor measures and, possibly, one major measure.

Senator Grosart: A "simple" bill?

Senator Perrault: Some people may believe it is simple. I think it unlikely, however, based on recent communications, that we will be required to extend our deliberations to Christmas Eve.

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK BILL

THIRD READING

Senator Godfrey moved the third reading of Bill C-14, to incorporate the Federal Business Development Bank.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 5, 1974

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Langlois for the second reading of Bill C-45, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1975.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, it appears that we are now in a position to proceed with the consideration of this appropriation bill. Whether it is by rule of the Senate, convention of the Senate, custom of the Senate or merely the appendix of the Senate, I am not quite sure.

Senator Langlois: Anyway, we did a good job.

Senator Flynn: I agree.

Senator Grosart: I thank the deputy leader for the use of the word "we," if it includes us on this side.

Senator Langlois: Of course.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps I should make a few comments, which will incorporate the comments I might have made on the report we have just heard from the committee which considered the estimates upon which this appropriation bill is based.

As the report pointed out, this $365 million that we are now asked to approve is part of a much larger sum required to implement this new petroleum policy of the government necessitated by the oil crisis, with which we are all familiar. The report pointed out that the total sum for the year—that is, carrying this through to the end of the fiscal year—will be $1.165 billion, to which we must add the $240 million of the last fiscal year, giving us a total of $1.365 billion, which is the total cost to date of implementing the government's policy in this respect.

I should point out that this whole program has been initiated almost entirely by appropriation bills. This is an extraordinary situation, where a program involving these large amounts of money has been initiated merely by appropriation bills. This is perhaps explainable, possibly excusable, in the circumstances of the suddenness of the oil crisis, the election and other matters. Nevertheless, we would hope that this will not be taken as a precedent for launching programs of this size by means of supplementary estimates and appropriation bills.

This has been described as an interim measure made necessary by the fact that the bill designated as C-32, which would give statutory recognition—statutory other than in an appropriation bill—to the whole program, has not been passed by the other place. The same applies to Bill C-18 of the last session, which would have initiated the program originally, and which died on the Order Paper when Parliament was dissolved. So we are in the position now, by these appropriation bills, and finally by this one, of authorizing this program which is not yet in normal statutory form.

The minister said this morning, as the report indicated, that these very large amounts will not be a charge on the general revenues of Canada, in the sense that the revenues required will not be provided by a general tax on the public, but rather from the revenues derived from the special export surtax. The minister did give us an assurance that, as far as he could see, this situation would carry on until the end of next year. That was his hope and his prediction on the basis of the facts before him at the time. He did say that the situation is changing so rapidly that this might not be so, but it was good news that it is unlikely that there will be a charge in respect to this program on the general revenues, in the sense I have indicated, until the end of the next calendar year.

The purpose, of course, is to compensate oil refiners for the costs of supplying oil east of the Ottawa Valley line at a price that is more or less the same across Canada. I think there would be general agreement that this is a highly desirable purpose.

The sums of $470 million, $330 million and $365 million will be administered, not by the department itself but by the Energy Supplies Allocation Board, which has been established by Parliament. This final appropriation will be handled by that board.

I am glad to say that the Chairman of the Board, Mr. Stewart, was with us this morning, and although he was not able to be there all the time he did give us afterwards some interesting and useful information.

It is also true that the purpose of this interim method of dealing with the necessary supply has, as one of its important intentions, the hope that the first ministers of the federal government and the provinces will soon be able to get together to remove some of the irritations which have developed as a result of the federal oil policy, and to deal with certain of the provinces' protests about it. I am sure we all hope that in granting this supply we will, in some small measure at least, be contributing to the solution of the more important problems which have arisen between the federal government and the provinces.

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Langlois speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I wish to add just a few remarks to what the Deputy Leader of the Opposition has said. I agree with him when he says that we had an interesting and worthwhile meeting this morning. We were lucky indeed, on short notice, to have such an array of qualified witnesses, including the minister himself, the Chairman of the Energy Supplies Allocation Board, the Secretary of the Treasury Board, and others. It was gratifying to be able to obtain important information so easily.

If I may be permitted, I should like to make one slight correction to what my honourable colleague has just said about compensation payments. Not only are compensation payments made to refiners in this country, as he said, but they are also made to importers of refined petroleum products.

I am happy to say that, in answer to a question of mine this morning, the minister cleared up a matter which was raised a few months ago by some of our domestic refineries to the effect that these allocation payments made to independent companies were detrimental to them. There was, first, a statement made by those operating the Gulf Oil refinery at Point Tupper, who claimed that they had to stop their operation because they could not meet the unfair competition, as they called it, they were getting from those independent companies who were importing refined products and getting the compensation. We had a similar complaint voiced by the operators of the St. Romuald refinery in Levis County—the former constituency of my colleague, Senator Bourget. They claimed they had to stop their operations because, again, they could not face the so-called unfair competition.

The minister this morning drew the attention of the committee to the fact that in the case of Point Tupper the refinery there was built particularly to refine oil in Canada for export to the east coast of the United States, and its main market is the export market, not the Canadian market. They were, therefore, not as much affected as they claimed by these compensation payments.

In the case of St. Romuald the situation is a little different. This is a specialized refinery. It was not so much affected by these compensation payments as by the fact that it was due for some maintenance work, and the operators took advantage of the slackness in the market to do that. It was a very convenient time for them to do so.

The reason invoked, therefore, for closing down the refineries, or slowing down their operations, was not the reason that had been published in the newspapers. So I am glad that this point was clarified this morning.

I was under the impression up until this morning, as some other honourable senators were, that the allocation board was not fully "on stream," to use a term quite often used in the industry, and I thought this was why the minister had said in his statement in the house, when he introduced the bill, that he had asked the Auditor General to look after the accounting involved. As I say, I was under the impression, as some other honourable senators must have been, that this calling upon the Auditor General to do part of the accounting work was because the allocation board was not fully in operation. I was therefore pleased, as we all were, to learn from the minister this morning that this is not a temporary arrangement but a permanent one, and that it will ensure proper accounting, which is not easy under any circumstances in that field.

Another matter that was clarified by the minister was the statement made in the United States by Senator Jackson when he was replying to the criticism, often voiced across the border, to the effect that Canada was taking advantage of an unusual situation to sell petroleum products to the American market at the world market price. Senator Jackson, who is a very prominent senator south of the border, said that Canada was merely following the example of the American producers, who were selling oil on the domestic market at the world market price. The minister gave us an extraordinary and astonishing explanation of the oil pricing system in the States. He explained to us that in the United States they have a system of oil pricing in terms of which they make a distinction between old oil and new oil. The old oil sells at a lower price than new oil, which is being sold at the world market price, namely, the same price that Canada is selling at now to the United States market.

When I asked the minister to explain to the committee what they meant in the United States, within the context of this pricing system, by "new oil," he just said that it is oil that has been newly discovered. It is not certain where the deadline is. Senator Prowse commented that if one had a well already producing oil, then in order to get the higher price for new oil all one had to do was drill another one beside it, call the oil "new oil," and sell it at the higher price.

This was very interesting, and I think it disposes once and for all of the criticism voiced against Canada south of the border. We are not taking advantage of the world situation any more than the American producers are doing in their own country nowadays. For that reason, I think our committee meeting this morning was very worthwhile; it was interesting and informative.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

[Senator Langlois.]

Senator Langlois: With leave, now.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I just want to put a few words on the record at this stage in view of the events of yesterday and the day before. Honourable senators will have noticed that, after second reading of this bill, I did not move that it be referred to committee, and for two very good reasons I do not intend at this stage moving an amendment that the bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred to committee.

First of all, this bill is entirely based on the estimates examined by the committee except in one respect and that is where it says in clause 3.(2):

(2) The provisions of the item in the Schedule shall be deemed to have been enacted by Parliament on the 1st day of April, 1974.

I questioned the meaning of this paragraph in the previous bill, Bill C-42, but in committee this morning, so far as this bill is concerned, we were given the explanation that, whatever might be the meaning of this paragraph, the money is required for the last three months of the fiscal year, that is, from January 1 to March 31, 1975. For that reason I did not need to ask that this bill be examined separately from the estimates. However, I wanted this to be on record because I do not want anyone to say afterwards, "You did not ask for this bill to go to committee." I did not ask because I did not need to ask.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT NARCOTIC CONTROL ACT CRIMINAL CODE

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion on the Honourable Senator Neiman, seconded by the Honourable Senator Deschatelets, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill S-19, intituled: "An Act to amend the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Criminal Code".—(Honourable Senator Davey).

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, in the absence of Senator Davey, may I have the permission of the Senate to speak now?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I believe that Bill S-19 is probably one of the most important pieces of legislation to come before this house this session. I say that because this is a piece of legislation that affects the youth of our nation; what we say here respecting it could very easily influence many of the young people throughout this country.

I should like to make it clear at this point that I support Senator Neiman in her presentation of this bill because I believe that we are, and have been, ridiculously hard where the question of possession of marihuana is concerned. However, I also want to make it particularly clear that I am not, and the Government of Canada is not, proposing to make the use of marihuana legal. That is not the purpose of this bill, and that is not the interpretation that should be placed on it. I know that many people across Canada feel that we are softening the statute, and that our next step will be to make the use of marihuana legal. I want to say now that I support this bill, but I do not support in any way the making of marihuana legal in this country. Therefore, honourable senators, once again I congratulate Senator Neiman on her presentation of this bill.

I also want to say that this legislation will come into effect only when proclaimed, and, in my view, that is a good thing because it gives us time for thought, time for study, and time for research. Therefore, I hope that this bill will spend some time—some considerable time—in committee before any recommendation is brought back to the Senate. I have looked up the rules of the Senate, and noticed that certain committees here are responsible for certain things, but at this point I suggest that the non-medical use of drugs is not simply a legal problem; I suggest that it is a social problem, a health problem, an educational problem and a welfare problem, as well as a legal problem. Furthermore, I believe that every senator should have an opportunity to hear the evidence presented, to question witnesses and to vote on the recommendations to be brought back to this house. Simply to refer this bill to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee is, in my view, really not good enough. The members of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science should also have an opportunity to participate, listen to the evidence and make comments on it, and try to persuade, if necessary, the members of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. I think they should also have the right to vote.

Therefore, honourable senators, I suggest to you at this time that it would be wise to have this very important measure referred to both the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee and the Health, Welfare and Science Committee so that they may bring back a joint report. In that way each and every member of those committees could have an input.

Should that procedure not be adopted, then after the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee has presented its report perhaps we could go into committee of the whole house, where what we have to say would be on record, and where we can ask questions of witnesses and vote on amendments, whether introduced by the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee or not. I just feel that this question is too big and too important to the youth of our nation for us to consider the legal aspect of it without going into the health, social, physical, economic, and education aspects.

Basically, I wish to get across to the people of Canada that we in the Senate are not proposing to make marihuana legal. The legislation before us states that there is a penalty for possession, a penalty for trafficking and a much greater penalty for importing or growing, with which I agree. If I were to propose an amendment today without any further research, I would recommend tripling the penalty for those who are importing, growing and trafficking in marihuana, sentencing them to 30 years in the penitentiary because, in my opinion, it destroys the youth of our country. However, for a young person of 12 or 13 years of age, who casually smoked a cigarette because his friends were doing so, to be put in the penitentiary seems ridiculous.

There are those who believe that marihuana, or tetrahydrocannabinol, its active ingredient—THC as it is called—is harmless. There are those on this continent who are pushing to make it legal, and to reform all laws so that it will not be illegal to possess it. One of those groups, known as the National Organization for the Reform of Marihuana Laws, is working actively throughout North America. There is no doubt that this group will lobby our committee and others in an attempt to persuade us to propose amendments making it legal. If this happens, I would suggest to those senators who are approached that they listen attentively but not form an opinion too quickly on the advice given by this group.

I suggest that the Canadian Medical Association supports the view that marihuana is a dangerous drug and that the Department of National Health and Welfare should take a strong hand in informing the people of Canada of the dangers of this drug. It should explain the harmful effects of the use of marihuana, as reported in all recent surveys. I feel the Department of National Health and Welfare should issue a statement to the effect that this drug is harmful. Judging by all the recent medical research, it produces very harmful effects. If the department can go to all the trouble it does with respect to the advertising of cigarettes, and making the manufacturers note on every package that the contents are harmful, and become increasingly harmful the more they are used, surely, as recommended by the Canadian Medical Association, it can issue an announcement with respect to the harmful effects of this drug.

The annual meeting of the General Council of the Canadian Medical Association in 1972 was attended by 220 delegates, of whom only two voted against that resolution. Another resolution passed by the Canadian Medical Association General Council in 1973 is as follows:

Whereas recent and ongoing studies of the long term effects of cannabis support the persistently cautionary clinical opinions of physicians over the years and reinforce the conclusions of the recent national commission studies in Canada, Britain and the United States, that the use of cannabis should be discouraged on grounds of individual and public health concerns, be it resolved that the C.M.A. reaffirms its 1972 annual meeting resolution and clearly advises the Canadian public against the non-medical use of cannabis.

Two hundred and twenty-five delegates attended that annual meeting, of whom only two opposed the resolution.

In view of that kind of medical opinion held throughout Canada I suggest that there is a great need for the federal and provincial governments to inform young people of these opinions, and what they are getting into when they start to use a dangerous drug such as marihuana, hashish or other drugs of this nature. I believe the federal government should make funds available to the provinces to assist them in educating the youth of this country in the elementary, consolidated and high schools, as to the effects of this drug, its dangers and what it will lead to.

There are those who feel the drug is no worse than alcohol or cigarettes. Let me inform you of the difference. Alcohol is taken often with food and water and is eliminated at the rate of one ounce per hour, being water soluble. If a person were to drink 24 ounces of alcohol, in 24 hours it would be eliminated. There is no evidence that alcohol causes cancer, or deformity in the offspring of those who use it. In order to reach the stage of long-term psychotic phenomena or mental disturbance by the use of alcohol a person must drink it over a period of 10 years at a quite excessive rate. The same applies to psychological changes. Alcohol is naturally in the bodies of animals as well as humans in small quantities, and is sometimes used medically as a vasodilator. Any damage caused by alcohol is usually paid for by the older age group, as it builds up. Those using alcohol in this fashion may, therefore, die five or 10 years earlier—at 70 rather than 80 years of age.

Cigarettes are different. They are taken for relaxation. Smoking, which is a nervous habit, is thought by some to slow down a person in his work; it is thought by others to improve one's mental acuity. Cigarettes contain tar and while they do not cause abnormalities their prolonged use can cause lung cancer. It is not a natural constituent in the fat of either animals or humans. It has no medical use, and smokers may shorten their lives by five years as a result of getting emphysema, or they may die from lung cancer. It is a high price to pay, and there is a particular danger to smokers in the older age group.

Marihuana, on the other hand, is taken mostly for its psychological effect. It is a soluble drug and is accumulated in the system. It builds up and is stored in the fat cells. Its effects are persistent for a long time.

With regard to carcinoma of the lung, the tar in a marihuana cigarette is 20 times that of the tar in an ordinary cigarette. Taking marihuana over a period of three years can cause more lung damage, according to microscopic examination, than by smoking cigarettes over a period of 20 years.

It has been shown that 40 per cent of marihuana users have changes in their chromosomes, and this produces some malformation in the second generation. The fact is that marihuana causes not only cancer but malformation. It is even likely to produce "thalidomide" babies in the third generation. Such results were produced in mice when they were experimented on, and it could happen to humans. Marihuana has no medical use, and its effect on our young people between 14 and 20 costs our society dearly. These youngsters lose their initiative, drive, sense of purpose, and their ambition to succeed.

On Sunday last I talked with two lads who had been smoking marihuana for four years. One started when he was in grade 7, at which time his marks averaged 92 per cent. A year later, after smoking marihuana "to be one of the boys," his average dropped to 64 per cent. He barely passed. The next year he failed grade 9. He is now in his second year in grade 9 and is averaging 63 per cent. He told me that he was not concerned with getting ahead, that he was just concerned with getting tomorrow's supply of marihuana. He was smoking up to 20 marihuana cigarettes a day, at $1 each. To get money for this habit he had to resort to crime; he had to find some fast way of making a buck. Then he heard about the ill-effects of marihuana on a special program arranged by the provincial Department of Education, and he decided right then and there to stop. He has been three weeks now without using marihuana, and his views on the future are already changing.

This drug not only destroys the initiative of youth, but it has a long-term effect on the user. If it is used steadily over a long period of time, permanent brain damage can result. However, if the user gets off the drug after only a short time, chances are that he will revert to his former self. His thinking will be clear again.

There is still much research being done on marihuana, but there are many new and proven facts that should be made known. It has been proven that the drug is dangerous to youth, and its use should not be encouraged. We should make it perfectly clear that the Senate and the Government of Canada have no intention, either now or in the future, of making marihuana legal in Canada. We should also make it perfectly clear that we are not reducing the penalties for trafficking in marihuana or for importing it; we are reducing the penalty for possession of marihuana.

There is a great need for educating the public, particularly our youth. We in the Senate have the opportunity to start the ball rolling by making a strong recommendation to the government to listen to the evidence of scientists, psychiatrists, neurologists and others who know the facts about this drug, and to bring those facts forward to the Canadian public. If that is done, we shall have done an important service to our nation, and particularly to our youth.

Hon. Frederick William Rowe: Honourable senators, first, may I congratulate Senator Bonnell on the points he has raised on this very important matter. Two things emerged from his speech—and I am sure that all honourable senators are pleased that they were brought out. The first is a perfectly obvious one. I do not wish to be critical of either Senator Bonnell or Senator Sullivan. I am sorry that the latter is not in his place today, because some of the things that I wish to say relate to the speech that he made in the Senate on December 5.

I say in passing that it is a pity the medical profession has taken so long to conclude that marihuana is harmful—something which should have been obvious to any person. You simply cannot take a foreign substance into your lungs day after day, especially a foreign substance containing the chemical ingredients which are contained in marihuana or tobacco, without doing yourself harm. It is against all the laws of common sense that one can take these things into one's lungs day after day, week after week, month after month, year after year, without doing damage and, in some cases, irreparable damage.

I am grateful to Senator Bonnell for bringing out this point today, sorry as I am that the medical profession throughout the world has been dragging its heels in this respect. Marihuana has been a problem for 25 years in our society, and for most of those 25 years the medical profession has done absolutely nothing about it, just as it has done practically nothing about the problems of alcohol or tobacco addiction.

In his remarks this afternoon, Senator Bonnell made the point that we have to educate our children. I am sure what he was implying—and certainly this is what I infer from what he said—is that we cannot solve a drug problem by putting our young people, whether they are 16 years old or 21 years old, in jail. That, simply, will not solve the problem. Again, it has taken us a long time to come to that conclusion. At this very moment there are tens of thousands of young people, in both Canada and the United States, wasting their lives in jails. The lives of these young people have been destroyed by the due process of law in the great democratic, freedom-loving countries of the United States and Canada.

I am sorry Senator Bonnell is unable to remain in the chamber to hear the rest of what I have to say. These things have to be said, and we will be discussing them again and again during the course of this debate.

Senator Bonnell referred to an organization in the United States known as NORML, and perhaps left the impression that it was the aim of that body to legalize marihuana. In fairness, I should emphasize that the aim of that body is not to get the use of marihuana legalized; that has never been its aim. As a matter of fact, I have the constitution of that organization in my file. The aim of that body has been to do what a lot of us have been attempting to do over the years, that being to bring about a saner approach to this matter—to do away with the emotional approach and, in particular, to stop destroying the lives of our young people by putting them in jail simply because they use or fool around with marihuana.

Incidentally, that organization includes some of the world's outstanding pediatricians, heart specialists, and medical scientists of one kind or another, many of whom are attached to such great medical faculties as those of Harvard, Yale, and Johns Hopkins, as well as such great scientific faculties as those of MIT and UCLA. These are persons of the calibre of Dr. Benjamin Spock. Does anyone really think that a man such as Dr. Benjamin Spock, who has devoted his whole life to the welfare of children, who has probably had to deal with more children in his practice than any other pediatrician alive today, would argue for something which he thought might be injurious to those children? Dr. Spock is a leading member of that organization.

To repeat, the aim of that organization is the decriminalization of the law respecting marihuana. That is a long and awkward word. I shall be referring to it again in the course of my remarks.

I have every regard for Senator Bonnell, as I am sure all in this chamber are aware. He is a highly qualified and recognized medical practitioner, and I have every respect for him. Nevertheless, he would be the first to admit that the points he made in his remarks today in relation to alcohol and tobacco are highly debatable. There are equally respected and recognized medical practitioners of one kind or another who would take issue with what he said in that respect. We have all heard and seen the evidence in respect of alcohol and tobacco from time to time. I do not think Senator Bonnell meant to treat it in a frivolous way. Perhaps he inadvertently suggested that about the worst that alcohol or tobacco can do to the individual is shorten his or her life by five or ten years.

I spent about a month in the Royal Victoria Hospital in Montreal some time ago, and during my stay I became friendly with the doctor who was treating me, as well as other doctors on the staff of that hospital. When I was ambulatory one of the senior doctors in charge of that great hospital took me with him on a tour, and showed me the effects that tobacco can have on an individual. He took me to see individuals who, for months and years, had been struggling to get a bit of oxygen into their lungs. Some of these people were dying agonizing deaths from lung cancer, young men included. These men were literally coughing out their lungs. I think Senator Bonnell would agree with me on the ravages of alcohol and tobacco.

The number of people using marihuana, both in the United States and Canada, might be several million, but that number is negligible when contrasted with the number using alcohol and tobacco to the point of addiction. I speak with some feeling on this, having been an addict of nicotine for some 20 years, and I mean the word "addict" literally. I know what control tobacco can have over an individual. I have buried some of my friends who died as a result of the ravages of tobacco smoke—people who died in their early fifties, mid-fifties, late fifties and early sixties. They literally smoked themselves to death.

I want to pay tribute to my colleague, Senator Neiman, not only for the lucid and rational exposition she gave when introducing this bill in this chamber, but for having the courage to do so, knowing, as she does and as we all do, that when one undertakes a job of this nature misrepresentation is almost inevitable.

One of the first speeches I made in this chamber was on drugs, and it was in much the same vein as I am speaking now. At no point did I ever suggest that marihuana was harmless, or that we should encourage the use of marihuana. I did argue that it should be decriminalized. I was accused of being the enemy of the youth of Canada. How about that!

As a matter of fact, rather ironically, a gentleman who lived in the Ottawa area rang me up at the time and said I should be shot. Those were his words. He sounded as though he might be—and I found out subsequently that he was—under the influence of alcohol. His reason for saying I should be shot was, he said, because I was encouraging young people to use marihuana, "pot". He went on in the same maudlin way over the telephone to tell me that one of his children was on drugs, and that it was the likes of me who had put her on drugs. As a matter of fact, I met the gentleman afterwards. I found out subsequently that he was an alcoholic, that he was coughing from morning to night because he was smoking three packs of cigarettes a day, and that one of his children, a young person, was indeed on hard drugs. I will not elaborate on that. Here was a father who was an alcohol addict and a tobacco addict. All I was really suggesting was that we would achieve nothing by taking his daughter and putting her in jail, as we had done with a lot of young women and young men over the years.

One of our problems here is that we get an emotional reaction. I say this in all honesty. I am sorry that Senator

Sullivan is not here, but he will have a chance to read what I say and, no doubt, a chance to rebut anything I say. Here we have a supreme example, in my view, of an emotional reaction. We are all guilty—if “guilty” is the word—to some extent of reacting emotionally on this sort of thing. Theoretically and academically we are against capital punishment, but if I came upon someone attacking one of my granddaughters I would probably kill him, or try to kill him—an emotional reaction. This is unfortunately the case when we discuss a matter like drugs. If there is any one problem we need to approach in a clear-headed way, it is that of drugs in Canada. I am not thinking of marihuana, which happens to be one of the, God knows, serious drugs, but relatively, arithmetically, in the absolute sense, it poses one of the least important of our drug problems, although incidentally the one on which most money is spent. I will come to that again in a moment.

Let me come back to Senator Neiman's speech. I said it was courageous. It was, not merely because of the misrepresentation there might be but because there is so much disagreement. It seems that you cannot talk about drugs without making bad friends. We senators are not in agreement on this matter. We have seen evidence of that right here. The emphases that Senator Bonnell would put on this are not exactly the same as those I would put on the problem, or that some other honourable senators would necessarily put on it. There is no way to please people on it. There are so many reactions.

Nevertheless, we have to face up to the fact that this whole problem of drugs is a complex one. I am sure Senator Neiman will not mind my referring to this. Only yesterday we had a chat about what constituted soft drugs and hard drugs. These are terms we fling around. I was interested to find, as I am sure she was, that there is even some disagreement on that. When we talk about soft drugs we are unfortunately leaving the impression that a soft drug may not be harmful. Again, we do not need to labour the fact. There is no drug, no foreign substance of that kind, that is likely not to be harmful to the individual.

How many people are there in our society today who know that the use of LSD is a problem and that it is a dangerous habit; who know that the use of “uppers” and “downers” and all the rest of them, is dangerous; who shudder at the very name of heroin, and yet to this moment do not recognize that the two most serious drugs in our society are so respectable that the majority of people do not consider them drugs at all—alcohol and tobacco? In the absolute sense, tobacco destroys more lives than any other drug in use. In the absolute sense, alcohol has more deleterious effects on our society than all the other drugs put together—not just heroin or marihuana, but all the others put together. It destroys homes, it breaks up families, it causes innocent people to be killed. The slaughter on our highways is a disgrace—not only in this country but in others. Yet I would say that the majority of people in our society refuse to face up to that simple fact.

I said earlier that I wanted to make some comments on Senator Sullivan's speech. I want to be fair to my colleague on this matter, so let me say two things right away. First, I acknowledge his right to any opinion that he expresses here, of course. Let me say also that anything I say here should not be construed—and I say this, again thinking of what can happen when we discuss this matter—as an assault or an attack on the medical profession. I am not a medical doctor. I would not be here today were it not for medical doctors. I have medical doctors in my own family. I have the highest regard for the work that doctors are doing, individually and collectively, but I should not blind my eyes to their shortcomings.

I did not hear all of Senator Sullivan's speech, but from what I did hear and from reading it—I may say I read it over three or four times, and I have it in front of me now—I got the impression that he feels that unless you are a medical doctor you have no business to be saying too much about this business of drugs. Let me give you his exact words. I think this is very important, and it is why I want to refer to it today. Referring to Senator Neiman, Senator Sullivan said:

... I was wondering whether her training had been in law or medicine.

Perhaps I am a little sensitive on that point, but the impression I got was that perhaps the matter should not be discussed too much by lawyers, because he went on to say:

This problem, honourable senators, is a medical problem. Let there be no mistake about that.

I would suggest to Senator Sullivan, and to any other doctor who says that, that this problem is not a medical problem. It is no more a medical problem than VD is a medical problem. Is there anybody here who would argue that that should be considered as a medical problem? It is no more a medical problem than is the malnutrition and starvation of the countless millions of children all over the world at this moment. Would anybody argue that the fact that children are dying at this moment in Bangladesh, in India and in a score of other countries, is a medical problem?

On that matter, the other inference I draw is that the medical profession is capable of speaking with infallibility on this subject. We have recently had a good deal of that sort of thing. Senator Bonnell cited it here today, Senator Sullivan cited it the other day, and we have had in recent weeks and months many in the medical profession making pronouncements of one kind or another about marihuana. But I find it necessary to point out something which again should be obvious, that historically, the medical profession has been wrong more often than it has been right. I say that with no intention of derogating from the medical profession, but it is true nonetheless.

You need only think of the opposition which the medical profession traditionally has put up against the advancement of every new idea. What did the medical establishment say about Pasteur? He was a fool. He was a jackass. The whole germ theory was discredited by the profession. You can go over to the parliamentary library and search back and see where the most eminent medical practitioners in the world 100 years ago discredited the whole idea of the germ theory. And what happened when the vaccines were introduced? The same thing.

Someone once said that war is too important a matter to be left to the generals. Well, this drug problem is too important a matter to be left to the doctors.

Let me quote again from the speech Senator Sullivan made last December 5—and I suggest that this was a completely emotional reaction:

The use of soft drugs leads almost inevitably to the use of hard drugs.

Honourable senators, statistically, that is nonsense. Every inquiry or investigation into the use of marihuana and cannabis has come up with the same statistics. There are 30 million people, young and old, who have used marihuana—there are at least that many—but nowhere has it ever been suggested by anyone that the number of users of heroin and other hard drugs is, at most, more than one-thirtieth or even one-sixtieth of that figure. If 30 million people have used marihuana over the years, and the number of hard drug addicts is in the hundreds of thousands at the most, how then can anyone justify the statement that the use of soft drugs leads almost inevitably to the use of hard drugs?

Then Senator Sullivan went on to say:

There is no such thing as "simple possession of marihuana," I would remind Senator Neiman. They are all either passing it on, or proselytizing. Furthermore, I am in favour of the death penalty for heroin traffickers. You now know exactly where I stand.

So Senator Sullivan says he is in favour of the death penalty for heroin traffickers. What is a heroin trafficker? In popular imagination, and we know such persons do exist, the heroin trafficker is a jackal, a person living on the misery and weakness of human nature, a person engaged in the wholesale importation and peddling of heroin, a person engaged in the wholesale program of trying to seduce young people into the use of heroin. Do I have any sympathy for such people? My answer to that is: Absolutely not. The answer is apparent. I have 8 grandchildren myself.

But take the case of an 18-year-old girl who is seduced into the use of hard drugs—and such a thing can easily happen to a girl from a broken family, a girl with no parental guidance, a girl out on her own looking for assurance, security, or popularity, and falling in with people who, by one means or another, seduce her—

Senator Choquette: She is enticed rather than seduced.

Senator Rowe: All right, enticed, or whatever word you wish to use, but she is enticed or led into the use of hard drugs. She is 18, 19 or 20 years old. She becomes an addict. At that point she becomes, for all practical purposes, an irrational person—an insane person, if you wish—who has to have that drug, who has to have a fix. Fixes cost money. According to the figures given by the police authorities, it costs on average $200 a day to maintain a heroin addiction in the city of New York. This girl has to find that money somewhere. Obviously, if she is a hard drug addict she is not likely to be working at gainful employment. Therefore, there are only two traditional methods of obtaining money open to her—one is to steal; the other, to prostitute herself. For an average girl of 18 to 20 years of age it would be most difficult to support a heroin addiction to the amount of $200 a day merely by stealing from supermarkets or jewelry stores. At best she might manage for a week or two, or even a month, but to maintain the habit day after day by stealing would be simply impossible. It is almost equally unlikely that the average 18- to 20-year-old girl could maintain the habit by prostitution, especially in this permissive age. So it is extremely difficult, indeed, impossible, for such a girl to maintain the habit, except through the one remaining avenue—trafficking. From desperation, from a kind of insanity, and in a process of irrationality, she agrees to sell heroin to some other person who needs it. She is given heroin, and she sells it to another person who is willing to pay for it. She does it in order to obtain her own fix, to satisfy her own addiction. She is now a trafficker.

What is the cure for this situation, as posed by Senator Sullivan? He says, "I am in favour of the death penalty for heroin traffickers. You now know exactly where I stand." Yes, we know exactly where he stands. The cure for this girl, this poor unfortunate derelict of society, is to electrocute her, to hang her, to use the guillotine on her, to shoot her, or to use whatever other method of disposal appeals to those who would apply the death penalty to heroin traffickers. The cure for her is the death penalty.

My belief is that this approach to the whole drug question—an approach which is not confined to a few individuals—is partly responsible, if not largely responsible, for the magnitude of the problem confronting us today.

I realize that I run the risk of being accused of going soft on marihuana, although that is not the case, but while I remember it let me say once more that the effects of marihuana on society, financially, industrially, medically, and socially, are negligible compared with the ravages of alcohol. Whatever marihuana may do to the individual—and I am sure it does some of the things that Senator Bonnell told us about—at least it is not a wholesale destroyer of family life; at least it is not responsible annually for the deaths, in Canada alone, of thousands of innocent people. Arithmetically its effects cannot be compared to those of alcohol or tobacco.

I emphasize that my plea is not that marihuana is a harmless drug and should be legalized. There you have all sorts of divergencies of opinion. No reasonable or sensible person wants to see the use of marihuana increased in our society, but certainly we should wait until the results of the medical and scientific investigations now going on are available to us before taking any serious action that might lead to an acceleration of the increase in the use of marihuana that is taking place anyway.

There is a conviction which is shared by such disparate groups as the American Bar Association, a number of the state bar associations, the American Medical Association—not noted, incidentally, for its eagerness to embrace new ideas—and the police commissioner of the most drug-ridden city in the world, which I do not need to name—the conviction that our whole approach to marihuana is unjust, discriminatory, irrational, and that because of it we have not been able to deal effectively with other more serious drug problems afflicting our society.

Further to this, only last night I was reading a current magazine that I came across, and in it there was an interview with a man who is one of the world's recognized authorities on alcohol. He is a medical doctor, a scientist, and a psychiatrist. Until recently he was attached to the Harvard medical school. His name is Dr. Chavetz, and he is at present the head of the National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism. He is not a fanatic. He and his wife, as mentioned in the article, both use alcohol. However, he pointed out that in the past 22 years there has been an 83 per cent increase in the number of problem drinkers who are women—mothers in the home and housewives. Translating this into my language, it means an 83 per cent increase in the number of women alcoholics in our society.

He further stated that the use of alcohol is now almost universal among students by the time they reach grade 12, at the age of 17 or 18. He said that five per cent of all teenagers get drunk at least once a week—in other words, 52 times a year—and that 14 per cent of all high school seniors get drunk—these are his words, “get drunk”—once a week every week. In the age group of 16 to 24 years 60 per cent of all traffic accidents involve alcohol. He is, of course, speaking about the United States, but I think we can project most of these figures in terms of the Canadian situation. In this same article he pointed out that most university students use alcohol.

I have talked to hundreds of students, if not thousands, in my professional career, and the great majority of them—indeed, I think I can say that I have never known an exception to this—will tell you that people who use marihuana tend to become introspective rather than aggressive and violent, as is the case with those who drink alcohol. The figures supplied by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare in the United States show that 64 per cent of the murders, 50 per cent of the felonies, and at least 35 per cent of the rapes are related to alcohol.

My constant references to alcohol may lead me to run the risk of being considered a modern Carrie Nation. I am not an abolitionist, however. I am not a total abstainer. I have perhaps been a total abstainer periodically, but only for reasons of diet, and no other. We use alcohol in our home, as I am sure most people do today.

Senator Choquette: You are making us all thirsty, I can tell you that.

Senator Rowe: Honourable senators will be glad to hear that I am coming to the end of what I have to say.

In the United States and Canada we have spent, over the past 20 years—and this figure is perhaps going to be a surprise—hundreds upon hundreds of millions of dollars in enforcing, or trying to enforce, laws against the use of marihuana. We have put thousands, indeed tens of thousands, of people in jail for using, trafficking, or importing marihuana. At Gander, in my own province, a young man, aged 20, came in with a cast on a broken leg, and he had some marihuana stuck inside the cast, and it was detected. He is now in jail serving the minimum sentence that the courts of Canada could give him. He is a young man from a respectable family who could have been your or my son or grandson, honourable senators, and he is now in jail serving the minimum sentence—seven years—and unless he is a superman he will come out skilled, qualified and oriented towards every conceivable crime in the book.

● (1540)

Honourable senators, has anybody ever benefited from being in jail? I realize you have to incarcerate some people; you cannot have men going around criminally assaulting women and children, and shooting up bank managers and policemen. They have to be put away; we have to be protected. But I repeat my question: Does anybody know of anybody who has ever benefited from being in jail? I am sure there are exceptions, but I do not know of anybody who has benefited from it, and I cannot think that the brutalizing process that that young man of 20 years is being subjected to under our system here in Canada will do him any good whatever. I cannot think he will be anything but anti-social when he comes out. But worse than that, he will then be skilled—he will have been taught. In addition, and apart from anything else, there will not be much else left to him but crime when he comes out. Can he become a teacher? No. Can he become a lawyer? No. Can he become a doctor? No. Mind you, honourable senators, he does not have to serve seven years to arrive at that state; seven days will do that for him.

Can a young woman in that position become a nurse? No. We will, of course, permit her to become a prostitute. She has that privilege. As Anatole France said about France, “The law in its majestic impartiality forbids the millionaire and beggar alike to sleep under the bridges of Paris.”

We have spent hundreds of millions of dollars in our efforts against these young people, and while we were spending that money—I want to make this contrast quite clear—on this irrational, ineffective and useless assault on the users of marihuana, most of them young people, we, at the same time, permitted the great tobacco interests of the United States and Canada to spend annually even larger sums of money, sometimes as much as $500 million on the advertising of tobacco. We recently stopped some of it. In the United States they are forbidden to advertise on television, but even so they are now spending $400 million a year on an advertising campaign designed, skillfully and covertly, to discredit the legitimate findings of medical science on the matter of cigarette and tobacco use, and even more nefariously spending hundreds of millions of dollars on a program linking up the use of tobacco with glamour, with athletic prowess, with handsome and virile youth by the side of the stream, meandering in the dell, or coming back from having taken a stroll through the woods. They are linking up that with the use of tobacco, and using youth and sex in their campaign, in a program designed to seduce your children and grandchildren into a habit which, without any doubt, will shorten their lives and which, as has been shown statistically, will cause a very significant number of them to hack, cough out, their remaining years—and I am not being melodramatic about this—in misery of one kind or another. In some cases they will end their lives by coughing up their lungs riddled with carcinoma caused by the use of tobacco.

We permit that, honourable senators; we do absolutely nothing about it. But we put the young girl or young man of 20 years in jail and we destroy their lives, while to these tobacco interests who are making this blood money out of the misery, suffering and weakness of the rest of us, we do nothing. And then we wonder why it is that so many young university students and others have rebelled against our hypocrisy.

Senator Sullivan said in the course of his speech:

The cleaver masters of our media suggest that patriotism is a hollow sham, that reverence for authority is weakness and that authority itself is stupid or corrupt.

I ask, in God's name, what do you expect in the light of what has happened in the United States in the last two years? What do you expect our young people to think? How can they think otherwise than that authority is stupid or corrupt? How do you expect the biology student in his fourth year, whose academic career was ruined because somebody picked him up with a couple of marihuana joints in his pocket and put him in jail, to react? His academic life has been destroyed. How do you expect such a person to react when he knows what is happening in the field of tobacco and alcohol and the other "respectable" drugs, the drugs that one can buy at the local drugstore? How do you expect him and the millions of other young students to react to that situation? Do you expect him to show some respect for authority?

The American Medical Association only this past week publicly accused the United States government—and these are their words, not mine—"of subsidizing death and disability" because of its tobacco policy. It states that cigarette smoking is the leading cause of 600,000 deaths per year from coronary heart disease, 72,000 deaths per year from lung cancer and 25,000 deaths per year from chronic bronchitis and emphysema. And yet we keep on putting our 16-, 17- and 18-year-old boys and girls in jail, or giving them equivalent punishment, because they have been fooling around with marihuana.

Honourable senators, I am going to close with this one thought, and it is not a happy one. I wonder how many people, how many adults, in Canada are familiar with this frightening fact which I am now about to state, that there has been a decline in cigarette smoking among adults, and a very substantial increase in cigarette smoking among our young children in elementary school as well as in high school. I wonder how many are familiar with this further fact that there is a steady increase in the number of school children using alcohol regularly. What is the answer to that? I do not know.

I know that most of what I have had to say today has been negative. I am supporting the bill, by the way. However, I do not believe it goes far enough. I know it is not a panacea, and it is not meant to be. I do not think it will increase the use of marihuana or that any youngsters' lives will be blighted and ruined by the effects of this legislation. I do believe and know that the lives of hundreds of thousands of them have been blighted and ruined by our present narcotic legislation. I know that, but I do not believe that this bill will destroy any lives. In so far as it goes, in my opinion it is a good bill. However, the thought I will end with is that the whole drug problem is so complex, involving as it does so many drugs, "soft," "hard drug" and "respectable," and so interrelated with other problems of our society, that a piecemeal approach to it, such as this bill represents, can never hope to do very much. I do not know if what I will now suggest would be an improvement. I am pessimistic that this idea might be adopted, but do not think it could do any harm. I believe that the government, or the Parliament of Canada, or one of the two houses—possibly the Senate—should convene a well-planned, national conference to discuss, examine and investigate, and collect information and scientific findings on, all these matters with a view to preparing a composite policy with regard to the whole drug problem of Canada. I hope that will be done.

Senator Deschatelets: May I ask a question, Senator Rowe? Do you not believe that a committee of the Senate, devoting the time deserved by this matter, could achieve exactly what you have in mind?

Senator Rowe: I am sure there is much merit in that suggestion. I have frequently thought about it. In my view a conference, hopefully a public conference which would be televised live, could do for this whole drug problem—which is partly an educational problem in the sense that our children and their parents need to be educated—what the Watergate inquiry in the United States did for that country. In my view, in the 200 years of existence of the American nation the Watergate inquiry, under Senator Sam Ervin, was probably the most beneficial process ever carried out there. This is what a conference such as I suggest might very well do for Canada in our attempts to deal with this very difficult, perhaps insoluble, problem.

Hon. Guy Williams: Honourable senators, I would like to comment on this bill from the point of view of my concern over how it may affect the Indian on his reservation, particularly juveniles. I speak with respect to the part of this bill which refers to simple possession and trafficking. The first contact of a juvenile with marihuana is usually at the school. I am informed that marihuana is trafficked in every secondary school, and even in elementary schools, in the province of British Columbia. I do have personal knowledge that marihuana is on every reservation. The question of simple possession bothers me very much.

When a juvenile of 13 or 14 years of age goes to the side of a foreign ship at the dock, and a foreign seaman is his source of supply, is he an importer, is he a trafficker? If this bill is going to encourage the arm of the law to go to the schools and take care of those who are trafficking, then I am all for this legislation.

We cannot actually compare this problem to that which destroyed the dignity of the Indian—that of alcohol. This is different. There is a belief among the Indians, not only of my province, British Columbia, but of the whole of Canada, that marihuana is harmless. As a result of the destruction of the dignity of the Indians by liquor, a law was passed on their behalf by the government of this country making it illegal for an Indian to have liquor or to consume it. This law did not stop Indians from drinking.

I read an article two days ago referring to one of the central provinces, in which it was stated that 40 per cent of those in the penal institutions were Indians. It further stated that this was a common phenomenon. Before this society came there was no liquor, so it is not a common phenomenon. I am of the opinion that marihuana causes a greater destruction of Indian youth today than liquor, causing many drop-outs. Statistics show that in many cases the suicide rate per capita is the highest among Indian young people in this country. If this bill encourages the arm of the law to take care of the trafficking in schools, I support it fully.

Hon. J. J. Greene: Honourable senators, perhaps you will allow me to speak before the debate is adjourned. I assure you that I shall be brief.

First, may I say that the parliamentary debate on this subject has been without equal in my limited experience. I spent approximately a decade in the other place. I had the opportunity of sitting in the Visitors' Gallery during World War II in the Mother of Parliaments, and I can say without fear of contradiction that the debate in the Senate on this subject is of the highest calibre. I am only sorry that the press, which should be filling the gallery on an occasion like this, apparently does not realize the importance of this bill, or the ability of the Senate to debate it effectively.

I have one point that I wish to make following Senator Rowe's excellent address. I am disappointed that the government did not consider—I hope that my few words will put the thought in their heads—the inclusion of alcohol in this measure. We have left that to provincial jurisdiction by reason of constitutional timidity emanating from two cases prior to the turn of the century, when an unenlightened Privy Council decided that the question of alcohol came only within section 91 of the British North America Act in the event that drunkenness was such a problem in Canada as to be a national calamity. From what we have heard today, some of the problems of alcoholism might well come within even that ridiculous and restrictive interpretation of our Constitution.

Secondly, now that we have abolished appeals to the Privy Council, it might well be that the more enlightened Supreme Court of Canada could modify these restricting decisions because if problems associated with drugs affect the country as a whole, so surely do problems resulting from alcohol.

I am not familiar with the laws of each province, but in Ontario, for instance, I do know that under the Liquor Control Act the court has the right, which it exercises almost automatically, for a second offence of being drunk in a public place, of imposing a jail term. This is inevitably the case with the confirmed alcoholic who is without means. The affluent alcoholic may be able to carry on his merry way, but the fellow on skid row spends almost every second month in the county jail. There is no useful attempt at rehabilitation. It costs society, in the long run, a very great deal without accomplishing anything, in just the same way, as Senator Rowe has so ably demonstrated, that putting young people in jail for smoking marihuana does not achieve any useful purpose.

I wish to suggest that the Department of National Health and Welfare and the government might well consider, despite the antiquated and now hardly relevant decision in Hodge v. The Queen, which I believe was in 1891, placing the question of alcohol under the Food and Drugs Act and treating it across Canada in a uniform fashion, just as they are proposing to treat cannabis. This will lead to education, and an ultimate resolution of the problem, in place of the cruel penalty which is of no benefit to either the alcoholic or society itself.

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of this debate.

[Senator Williams.]

Senator Lafond: On a point of order. Does not the debate stand adjourned in the name of Senator Davey?

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, Senator Davey has indicated to me that because of other commitments he will not be able to speak. He has no objection to the bill's going to committee. He will speak on the bill in committee.

Senator Choquette: As to the committee to which the bill should be referred, it has been suggested that we should send it to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications because those who partake of these drugs go on trips.

On motion of Senator Neiman, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: I move that the Senate do now adjourn to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately 8 o'clock this evening. It is possible that we may receive legislation from the other place at that time.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8.15 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I must report to you, with some degree of regret, that, because of the scheduling of activities in the other place, it is not possible to have referred to the Senate this evening any measures for our consideration. The members of the other place have been occupied, and preoccupied, today with matters of some concern to them. I think we all understand the nature of the problem. It is my hope that there will be legislation before us when we meet tomorrow morning at 11 o'clock. In any event, honourable senators will be duly notified at the commencement of the next sitting as to the day's activities.

I think it can be safely predicted that we are going to be hearing the bells ringing almost all of tomorrow, and perhaps into Saturday. As I said earlier today, however, it is not expected that honourable senators will be singing Christmas carols in the chamber on Christmas Eve.

Senator Flynn: Do I understand there is a possibility that the other place will sit on Saturday?

Senator Perrault: I am given to understand, Senator Flynn, that the matter of members' indemnities will not be debated beyond this evening and that, commencing tomorrow morning, the other place will turn its attention to expediting the remaining measures before it. We know of at least two bills which we thought would have been sent to the Senate this afternoon, but because of the nature of the debate which has been taking place in the other place that did not prove possible. We are hopeful that those two measures can be dealt with by the Senate tomorrow. Apparently, the remaining work to be done is of a routine nature, although there may be other measures as well. I should think the Senate will have something to debate at tomorrow's sitting.

Senator Choquette: Including the indemnities bill?

Senator Flynn: I am not worried about tomorrow's sitting. What I am concerned about is whether there is any understanding that the Senate will sit on Saturday, or whether there is a possibility that we will come back Monday and Tuesday of next week. If the Leader of the Government can give us some indication in that regard, it would be helpful to all honourable senators.

Senator Perrault: Barring extraordinary circumstances and developments, Senator Flynn, which are not foreseen as of this time, it is the intention to conclude the activities in the other place tomorrow afternoon at the latest, which would mean that the Senate may be called upon to sit late into the afternoon tomorrow, and possibly into the evening. Hopefully, it will not be necessary to sit beyond Saturday morning. We do not see the possibility at this time of having to return on Monday or Tuesday, and I know that in the spirit that pervades this season, there will be co-operation on all sides in order to expedite the measures to come before us.

Senator Flynn: There is always that spirit in the Senate. We on this side are always co-operative, as you know. I do not know whether you can expect that in the other place.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT NARCOTIC CONTROL ACT CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Neiman for the second reading of Bill S-19, to amend the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Criminal Code.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must remind the house that if Senator Neiman speaks now, her speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, though my experience in this chamber has been slight, I wish to endorse the remarks made by Senator Greene yesterday with respect to the quality of the debate which Bill S-19 has precipitated. It has been excellent, indeed. I am grateful that my own conviction of the importance of this bill—not only of the practical social consequences which will flow from it, but also the social philosophy underlying it—is so obviously shared by our members. I have already found, as I am sure honourable senators have found, that public and press reaction reflects not only the depth of concern but also the breadth of opinion so amply demonstrated by the speakers in this debate.

The government cannot hope to solve, by the measures proposed in this bill, all the ills caused by the use and misuse of cannabis, nor to reconcile the widely divergent views on how a solution can be found. I myself have serious doubts at the moment that some of these precise measures are the best that can be chosen. It is obvious that many honourable senators and others share my doubts. It is equally obvious that many stand on either side of the position I take now, and it is quite obvious that they will continue to stand on either side of a somewhat changed position that I might choose once we have heard the opinions of experts expressed in the committee hearings. This is the dilemma that will face all of us as we give clause-by-clause consideration to the bill in committee. I shall propose, if the bill passes second reading, to refer it to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Public concern about the potential hazards to health of cannabis users was ably demonstrated in the speech of Senator Sullivan, and again yesterday in the speeches of Senators Bonnell and Rowe. It is my belief, however, that while the government fully acknowledges those dangers it is, by means of this bill, endeavouring to establish the range and severity of the penal sanctions to be imposed for offences relating to cannabis. It would seem that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs is the most appropriate forum in which to consider those proposals.

I wish to assure honourable senators that if they concur with my recommendation, the chairman of the committee has indicated that he will by no means ignore the very real concerns of all of us—and not just of those who have concentrated in the main on the physiological results of the use of cannabis—with regard to the medical aspects of this problem. He would hope to obtain up-to-date opinions, not only from former members of the LeDain Commission but also from other medical experts and researchers in the field of drugs. Naturally, the committee would also hope to hear from various law enforcement agencies and members of the judiciary charged with enforcing our laws on drugs, as well as from representatives of the general public who have a special interest or expertise in this subject and who wish to appear before the committee.

The committee hearings on Bill S-19 will be of extraordinary importance and interest. I know all honourable senators will be anxious to assist the government in determining whether the measures it proposes in this bill strike the most rational, the best possible, balance between the conflicting widespread and extremely serious problems caused by the use of cannabis.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Senator Neiman, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

TWENTIETH ANNUAL SESSION, LONDON, ENGLAND—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, December 5, the debate on the inquiry of Senator McDonald calling the attention of the Senate to the Twentieth Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly, held at London, England, from 11th to 16th November, 1974, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the session and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada, and to the visit of the delegation from Canada with Canadian Forces in Germany.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, I intend to be as brief as possible.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, because my contribution of last Tuesday evening was somewhat off the cuff, I hope you will permit me to say what I left out. I meant to pay my respects to Madam Speaker and tell her how much we appreciate the high level of competence, charm and courtesy she demonstrates every day in the discharge of her duties.

[English]

In concluding the debate on this inquiry, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of those who have preceded me in this debate. I want to deal, first of all, with the subject of Canadian representation at such meetings as the North Atlantic Assembly and the European Parliament, which were the subjects of Senator van Roggen's inquiry and Senator McDonald's inquiries.

At the November meeting of the North Atlantic Assembly, the Canadian delegation was made up of 12 members, comprised of 11 from the House of Commons and one from the Senate. There were also two senators appointed as alternates. Let me draw some parallels. The United States delegation comprised 36 members, 15 representing the Senate and 19 representing the House of Representatives. Because the Senate of the United States is an elected body, I should like to compare the Canadian delegation with that of the United Kingdom. The British delegation, made up of 18 members, comprised six members of the House of Lords and 12 members of the House of Commons.

In my view, the selection committee should give some thought to improving Senate representation at these meetings. I realize that on occasion not enough senators have expressed the desire to attend meetings of this type, but I think the actual membership of Canadian delegations to such meetings, in terms of delegates representing each House of Parliament, can certainly be improved.

As to continuity in the delegation—and I am not preaching for a call—this year, after two year's absence from the Economic Committee of the Assembly, I found that, with a minor amount of juggling between officers and between officials, many members of that committee were the same as in 1971. They had kept in contact and had been working together, and had arrived at some consensus on most issues that were nearly impossible to question by a freshman delegate, or one who had been an absentee for a couple of years. You must have entry and some tenure in such a working group if you are going to make an effective contribution and not remain a spectator. I think that should be kept in mind as well.

In London, meetings of the association's committees were held in Lancaster House on the first two days, and the plenary sessions convened later in Church House, where Parliament met in the forties after the bombing of Westminster.

Greece was not represented at the meeting as it was at the tail end of a general election and had no legislature. Portugal, still in the process of identifying itself with the democratic option, had observer status only.

The Economic Committee, while not giving up its hold of several years' standing on multinational corporations, reflected the two major problems of the world currently, inflation and the energy crisis, and naturally the impact of each on the defence undertakings of NATO, as such, and of each of its members. Honourable senators will have followed statements emanating from several member countries of NATO, notably the United Kingdom in the last several weeks, where the projections of the defence budgets, because of the inflation situation, are being drawn back. However, Senator McDonald stated these problems extremely well in his opening speech on this inquiry, and I shall not attempt to elaborate.

The Economic Committee presented the association with two recommendations and two resolutions, which were adopted without amendment. The first of these recommendations was on economic problems within the Alliance, and the substance of the recommendation was:

1. to establish within the Alliance the appropriate decision-making machinery necessary to secure the fullest possible economic cooperation within the Alliance;
2. to implement point 11 of the Ottawa Declaration by ensuring that their security relationship be supported by harmonious political and economic relations and by removing sources of conflict between their economic policies.

The recommendation also expressed a few pious wishes to the end that the ministers of finance and ministers of economic affairs of member nations should probably meet together from time to time within NATO. However, obviously in every one of the countries the ministers of such sectors of the various administrations have a multiplicity of platforms and international committees at which to meet, and therefore have very little wish to add another one.

The second recommendation to help the member countries of the Alliance was, in substance, this:

1. to ensure, in every way possible, the maintenance of democracy in their own countries by preventing economic breakdown, financial instability and social unrest;
2. to ensure a system of mutual economic assistance through loans and credits, export facilities, transfer of know-how, and other appropriate measures.

The first draft resolution was on: multinational corporations and the Atlantic Alliance. This is one that has been hanging around the North Atlantic Council for four or five years and that is being resurrected, reshaped and re-passed at nearly every Assembly. The preamble to that draft resolution contains a paragraph to which Canada, among others, voiced some objection:

Deploping the dubious role of some multinational oil companies which artificially kept supplies off the market and cut deliveries of supplies to NATO bases;

Canada felt that this was rather strong language and hardly proven, and got some support from part of the British delegation and from the Norwegian delegation. However, we were overwhelmed in committee and in the plenary assembly as well. As I mentioned previously under the heading of continuity of representation, much spade work had been done over several months. Some of our fellow parliamentarians from the south of us, who had emerged the week previously from a general election, were obviously intent on taking a crack at some of the multinational petroleum corporations which these delegates felt had been rather unfair.

However, after the preamble, the substance of the resolution stated that it urged the member governments of the Atlantic Alliance:

1. to strengthen current work which seeks common regulations on multinational corporations;
2. to take into consideration at least the following items for any international agreement on multinational corporations: each country's policy on competition, investment, taxation, the capital market, monetary questions, the labour market and social matters;
3. to complete those measures by the setting up of an international authority, patterned on the example of GATT.

The fourth document, in the form of a resolution, dealt with energy supplies within the Atlantic Alliance and said that it urged the member governments of the Atlantic Alliance:

1. to ensure short-term energy supplies
 - (a) by seeking closer multilateral co-operation with oil producing countries to clarify mutual interests;
 - (b) by providing attractive incentives for oil producing countries' additional revenues to flow back to industrialized countries;
 - (c) by imposing strong and efficient energy conservation programs on their countries;
 - (d) by initiating, among consumer countries, a mutual guarantee on energy supplies and financial assistance for those member countries with deficits in balances of payments;
2. to ensure long-term energy supplies
 - (a) by further developing energy conservation technology;
 - (b) by giving priority to research and development work on nuclear, geothermal and solar energy as well as on other possible alternative sources, where appropriate;
 - (c) by widening international co-operation in all fields of energy research and development;
3. to ensure the security of energy supplies for maintaining the strength of military defence co-operation, in particular by providing for the immediate availability of adequate reserve stocks.

This resolution was developed, planned and put through the Economics Committee, the Military Committee and the Scientific and Technical Affairs Committee.

On top of these resolutions—the essential work of the committee—the committee was privileged to hear three invited speakers. The first was Senator Jackson of the United States. Honourable members of this chamber are familiar enough with Senator Jackson's proposals and policies, and I need not go into detail on them.

The second was Dr. Hans Tietmeyer, ministerial director of the federal economic affairs ministry in Bonn. He described to us the problems of inflation and the measures taken in the Federal Republic of Germany to fight it. Apparently they have been quite successful so far. Dr. Tietmeyer said that the inflation rate of 7 per cent in Germany meant that Germany therefore was in a more favourable position than any other country in the European Community, although the balance-of-payments surplus was overhealthy. Dr. Tietmeyer elaborated on the structure of labour unions in Germany and the arrangements for the full participation of labour unions in the management of corporations. This has meant that close tabs have been kept at all times on production and production quotas, with known effects, and that, as a result, little unemployment and few strikes have been experienced in German labour since 1945. It is ironic that this system—comprising only two or three labour unions to cover the entire nation, and closely integrated with management—was imposed on the West Germans by the British army of occupation immediately after the war. I say it is ironic that the British were able to impose such a system and be so successful with it in West Germany when one considers the labour difficulties existing today in England itself.

To return to Dr. Tietmeyer, he said that there had been other developments since 1972-73—for example, several revaluations of the Deutschmark and flexible exchange rates. From the beginning of 1973 economic policy had been not only anti-cyclical but an attempt to stop inflation completely. An investment tax had been imposed on all investments and the proceeds had been frozen. All employed persons earning over DM 24,000 had been taxed an additional 10 per cent. In other words, anything above an income level of about $12,000 to $13,000 would be taxed an additional 10 per cent. Write-off facilities for investment in the building industry were removed. The aim was to restrict demand both for consumption and investment so that the inflationary tendencies might be corrected. The policy had succeeded especially with relation to the price indices. Dr. Tietmeyer insisted that one of the keys to the success of their policy was the fact that they had tried and had succeeded in restricting demand.

The third person to address the committee was Mr. Yves Laulan, director of Economic Services at the Société Générale de Banque, Paris, former head of the Economic Directorate of NATO on the world economy and the financial situation of the Soviet Union. I will not go into detail on this, but I would like to give you the substance of one paragraph from the minutes of the meeting of November 13, 1974, as I think it will be of interest to honourable senators. At that time Mr. Laulan told us that the Soviet Union had taken advantage of the changes of the last 12 months; that its exports of 50 million tons of oil to the West had been worth $700 million a year, and that the income from the export of oil was now $3 billion a year. The Soviet Union had thus significantly increased its hard currency resources. In addition, Soviet gas was being sold to Western Europe, its wood and wood pulp exports had risen in price 400 per cent in the last year, while two-thirds of the world's reserves of coal were located within its boundaries. The Soviet Union also enjoyed some of the largest gold reserves in the world, which were estimated by Mr. Laulan as being worth over $11 billion. A further source of income was the sale of weapons. An ironical trade triangle had developed, with western countries buying oil from the Middle East, which then used the dollars to purchase weapons from the Soviet Union.

Honourable senators, that concludes my report on the Economic Committee of the North Atlantic Assembly.

● (1120)

I would like to inform honourable senators that having completed our sessions in London the Canadian delegation proceeded to Lahr, Germany. On the way we stopped at Vimy to pay our respects to the Canadian dead of World War I, and we were all very impressed with our monument there. I had never seen it before, and was deeply moved.

Our visit with the Canadian forces in Lahr was a most valuable experience. It was, however, so well described to us by Senator McDonald that I shall not deal with it at this point. I endorse wholeheartedly all that he said, and join Senator Choquette in congratulating him and thanking him for his presentation.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other senator wishes to participate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now adjourn to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately 1.30. Before the motion is put, however, I would like to say that we are awaiting legislation from the other place, and I understand there will probably be two measures for our consideration at approximately 1.30. I have been advised as well that, given the normal expedition of legislation, royal assent will probably be given at approximately 5 o'clock. This is the present estimated time.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 4.20 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Interim report of the Textile and Clothing Board, dated December 17, 1974, pursuant to section 17(2) of the Textile and Clothing Board Act, Chapter 39, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72, respecting nylon fabrics.

Report of the Textile and Clothing Board, dated July 11, 1974, on a re-examination of the situation respecting cotton terry towels and towelling.

Report of the Textile and Clothing Board, dated September 18, 1974, to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, pursuant to section 19 of the Textile and Clothing Board Act, Chapter 39, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72, respecting cotton yarns.

Report of the Textile and Clothing Board, dated December 11, 1974, on an inquiry respecting acrylic yarns.

Report of the Textile and Clothing Board, dated October 30, 1974, on an inquiry respecting men's and boy's shirts.

HON. MURIEL McQUEEN FERGUSSON, P.C.

SPEECHES AT UNVEILING OF PORTRAIT IN SENATE FOYER

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, all of us recall the memorable occasion when the portrait of the former Speaker of the Senate, the Honourable Muriel McQueen Fergusson, was unveiled in the foyer of the Senate. With leave of the house I would now request that the speeches delivered on that occasion be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-9, to amend the Export Development Act.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Léopold Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be now read the second time.

He said: Honourable senators, in April 1973 the Senate passed a bill to amend the Export Development Act. That bill, which was introduced by Senator van Roggen, was an interim measure to raise the financial ceiling for the long-term lending facilities of the corporation pending the preparation of a more comprehensive bill. I am now able to commend that comprehensive bill, Bill C-9, to the Senate.

The Export Development Corporation, known as EDC, is a crown corporation whose purpose is to facilitate and develop export trade by provision of important export-oriented financial facilities. It was established in 1969 as the successor to the Export Credits Insurance Corporation. The functions of the corporation are (1) to make loans to foreign buyers of Canadian capital equipment and services on terms and conditions which are competitive with those of other major trading nations; (2) to ensure Canadian firms against non-payment when Canadian goods and services are sold abroad; and (3) to guarantee financial institutions against loss where they are involved in financing export transactions, and to ensure Canadians against loss of their investments abroad by reason of political actions.

The main purpose of Bill C-9 is to provide for increases in the corporation's financial ceiling in each of its areas of activity. These increases are required to sustain the expansion of successful Canadian export activities, and it is intended that these increases shall serve the requirements of the Canadian exporting community for several years.

In addition, honourable senators, there are a number of technical and administrative amendments proposed, the purpose of which is to clarify some definitions and improve some administrative procedures where experience has shown that a change will enable the Export Development Corporation to serve Canadian exporters and investors more efficiently. The export credit insurance facilities apply mainly to exports of commodities, manufactured goods and services which are sold on short- and medium-term credit—that is, up to five years.

The present ceiling totals $1 billion, which is made up of $500 million for the corporation risks under sections 24 to 26 inclusive, and $500 million for the government's risk, covered under sections 27 and 28 of the act, the latter being for situations that are not normally appropriate for the corporations' accounts but which in the opinion of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the cabinet are in the national interest.

It is proposed further that the ceiling for each of these sections be raised from $500 million to $750 million, increasing the total export credit insurance facility from $1 billion to $1.5 billion. When speaking of expanded EDC activity, attention is usually focused on the growth of its long-term lending, of which I shall be speaking shortly, but it is also important to realize that there has been important growth in the sectors of exports covered by the insurance program.

In 1973 the volume of exports insured was $565 million, more than double the amount of five years ago. Prospects are that the volume of coverage for 1974 will exceed $700 million. Consequently there is need to increase the insurance ceilings to provide adequately for continued growth in years ahead.

The foreign investment insurance program was established in 1969 and is the newest of EDC's facilities. The current ceiling is $150 million and it is proposed that this be increased to $250 million. At present there are some $30 million-worth of policies outstanding, with a further $125 million-worth of projects under active consideration. The amount of the proposed increase in the ceiling is intended to provide for future requirements over at least a three-year period and will facilitate the entry of Canadian firms into international joint ventures. Such joint ventures are suited to Canadian commercial policy and the development policies of most foreign governments, because local knowledge and capital supply by resident partners can be blended with Canadian capital and engineering technology. In fact, in most countries today a joint venture is the only viable vehicle for facilitating Canadian investment in foreign markets. The joint venture ensures a foreign country of a real commitment on the part of Canadian engineers and management and protects the Canadian equity position.

An expanded foreign investment insurance service, as provided by Bill C-9, will help to encourage and facilitate sound Canadian joint ventures in other countries. The facility for long-term loans and guarantees applies to exports of capital goods and services with customarily justified credit terms in excess of five years. The current series total $1,950,000,000, made up of $1,500,000,000 for section 29, the corporate account, and $450 million for section 31, the government account. It is proposed that these ceilings be raised from $1,500 million to $4,250 million for section 29, and from $450 million to $850 million for section 31, increasing the total lending ceiling from $1,950 million to a total of $5.1 billion. This increase may be startling to honourable senators and, indeed, it is one of major significance. The dimension of the increase results from two factors: a change in the definition of the ceiling and, more importantly, a reflection of the remarkable success of Canadian capital equipment and service suppliers in winning contracts abroad. Of these, the most important reason is the remarkable continuing success of our capital goods and services producers in winning overseas orders. These exporters include suppliers of engineering and technical services, transportation equipment such as ships, aircraft, locomotives, and off-highway vehicles, telecommunications equipment, heavy duty electrical goods and power generation equipment, including our CANDU nuclear power system, forest industries equipment, steel mills and a variety of other items related to such areas as chemical processing, pollution control and scientific research.

Our manufacturers have penetrated new foreign markets and have developed a momentum of success which has resulted in the employment of a significant number of skilled Canadians. An essential element of this success has been the availability of internationally competitive long-term financing from EDC. During the sixties EDC lending averaged approximately $50 million per year, but in 1970 it reached $100 million. It has grown markedly in each subsequent year, and in 1973 signed loan agreements totalled $463 million. For 1974, EDC long-term lending will exceed $650 million. This will be made up of over $500 million under section 29 and some $157 million under section 31. This is an unprecedented level of capital goods export activity, but all current indications are that these levels can be sustained and that they will, in fact, grow in future years. Therefore, the levels of the proposed ceilings are necessary to accommodate this activity, and it is expected that they will provide a reasonable period of some three to five years before the ceilings will again have to be reviewed by Parliament. The need for the new ceilings is more urgent than might appear on the surface. The $650 million lending level for 1974 relates to projects which have been before the EDC for a considerable period. In addition to this, there is more than $2 billion in the pipeline at various stages of development. New projects continue to come forward. The point is that there is a long gestation period between an initial inquiry seeking confirmation of financing availability and the signing of an agreement.

EDC is virtually committed to the limit of its present ceilings, and difficulties will arise if new legislation is not forthcoming at this time. It is important to ensure that we do not risk disruption in the continuity of our capital goods export sales. Continued growth and competitiveness of the capital goods and services industries is, to my mind, crucial to the health of the Canadian economy.

Honourable senators, we are all aware, I am sure, that Canada has one of the fastest growing labour forces in the industrialized world and one of the largest export sectors, relative to the whole economy, among industrialized countries. The capital goods industries provide many jobs for Canadians, either directly or through the demand for components and raw materials. A healthy and growing capital goods industry will be an important element in the continuing implementation of job-creation policies.

We are trying to upgrade our raw materials for export to assure that the value added in the upgrading process takes place in Canada. We are also striving to increase the export of Canadian manufactured goods for the same reasons. If we are to be successful, the market opportunities for the products of our capital goods industries must be attacked on an internationally competitive basis.

It is a fact of life that official support institutions exist in each country with which Canada must compete. These institutions exist to make financial services available to cover risks, credit terms and credit rates which are contractually more favourable than the facilities normally available in the private sector. The existence of such official support institutions means that Canadian exporters need the same package of financial services in order to compete effectively. These services are needed because the foreign buyer considers the commercial terms offered and then compares the complete package with that offered by, for instance, the Japanese, the Americans, or the French, all of whom stand ready and able to support their exporters.

Honourable senators should be aware that the lack of a fully competitive export financing facility in Canada would critically impair the ability of the Canadian capital goods and services industry to compete internationally. It should be emphasized that the services of EDC are not provided to buy foreign orders with cheap financing—that is, EDC only matches foreign competition; it does not undercut it. Thus, EDC financing is available only to exporters who are thoroughly competitive in the commercial fundamentals of price, quality, delivery, and even after-sales service.

With the continuing need in Canada to provide jobs at an extremely rapid rate, a healthy capital goods order book will be a valuable hedge against the possibility of severe contractions in foreign demands. Additionally, in such a situation, the international competition for export orders will be intense. A strong EDC program will be an essential element in maintaining Canada's international competitiveness. In the discharge of this very important function, the EDC will work increasingly closely with the Canadian chartered banks, and it is the policy of the EDC to seek maximum private sector participation in a loan consistent with providing internationally competitive financing.

The combining of private sector and EDC financing will be structured in each case to match the financing offered by the official support institutions of other competing countries. EDC lending is, basically, undertaken on the authority of its board of directors. As honourable senators are aware, the board of directors is composed of senior government officials, as well as representatives of the Canadian private sector. EDC operates according to commercial criteria. It does not make imprudent loans to secure capital goods business at any cost. EDC requires that the terms of the loan be appropriate to the transaction and consistent with international practice, and that the project for which the loan is made is commercially viable. EDC is prudent also in arranging for the security of its commitments, and frequently obtains unconditional government or central bank guarantees of payments.

Honourable senators are aware, no doubt, of the government proposal for a Federal Business Development Bank to assist small businesses in their domestic endeavours. The legislation in connection with that was dealt with earlier this week. In addition, there will be a complete range of EDC services to assist small businesses in their export activities. There is a considerable degree of small business involvement with the export credit insurance program. At the end of 1973, 939 insurance policies were outstanding. Of this number, 727 were short term, relating mainly to sales of consumer goods, and 212 were issued for capital goods and services. Fifty-six per cent of the consumer goods policies were issued for an annual export sales volume of under $100,000, while 33 per cent of the capital goods policies were for sales of goods and services, each under $100,000.

I have pointed out that in the short- and medium-term credit areas EDC is heavily involved with small business through its insurance program. This is not to say, however, that small business does not benefit importantly from the long term financing facilities. The exporter of record may often be a large firm located in a major industrial area, but the chain of sub-suppliers extends to all parts of Canada, and down to the smallest Canadian manufacturers. This effect is reinforced by EDC's minimum 80 per cent Canadian content policy. For instance, a CANDU nuclear power systems sale would involve upwards of 200 Canadian suppliers, with contracts ranging to a low of some $500 in some instances.

In addition, EDC also makes long term loans or guarantees directly to foreign borrowers to finance export of capital goods and services sold by Canadian business. For instance, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce announced earlier this year in Winnipeg that EDC made a loan of $500,000 to Poland for the purchase of pre-stressed concrete manufacturing equipment for Spiroll Corporation of Winnipeg. That is a further indication of EDC's ability and willingness to assist small business. This very recent decision of the board will provide financing for capital projects, irrespective of size, including those below $1 million, in order to provide small Canadian businesses with lending facilities that are competitive with arrangements available to exporters in other countries.

Success in sustaining high exports and meaningful growth over the long term will depend on our success in stimulating the growth of the right kind of industries. For the 1980s and beyond, these are industries that do more than just create jobs. They must create jobs for an increasingly well-trained labour force, which in turn is essential in order to keep Canada in the forefront of high technology industries. But it is these industries that, more often than not, depend on continuous access to foreign markets in order to stay competitive.

An example is that of engineering consultants. An increasing number of them are working all over the world. Indeed, so they must if they are to stay pre-eminent in their field. It is, of course, precisely in this sector of high technology capital goods and services industries that EDC support is essential. If this support were withdrawn or curtailed in the interests of short-term considerations, damage for long term development prospects would be out of all proportion to whatever short-term benefits may be realized. It is another way of saying that export markets are essential to the long-term well-being of the company. While they are essential, the company must maintain and try to expand its foothold in foreign markets on a continuing basis. International business is much too competitive to allow us the luxury to venture around when it is convenient—for instance, when economic activity is slack at home—and to stay out of foreign markets when domestic demand is brisk.

Honourable senators, in conclusion let me emphasize that the Export Development Corporation has an essential role to play in the industrial development of Canada. The next few years are critical in this development, but they hold considerable opportunity to develop export markets as each home manufacturing industry builds on the base of our resources. The provisions of this bill will ensure that the facilities of EDC are available to technicalize to the fullest extent the opportunities of the coming year.

Honourable senators, before resuming my seat I should like to give some further information concerning this program of EDC. From information received today from the corporation, I understand there has been no loss so far with this program. On the other hand, I have been informed that the rate of financing is flexible. For example, during the last year this rate ranged from a low of 7 per cent to a high of between 8 and 9 per cent. I am told that in recent years this rate was approximately 6 per cent. With these remarks, all that is left to me is to commend to the house the passing of this bill.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, after the full explanation of the bill that we have received I am sure you would be disappointed if I did not at this time make the usual objection—usual but so far ineffective—to having to deal with a bill of this importance at this particular time and with this deadline. As a matter of fact, I am really reluctant to speak at all on this bill, under the circumstances. On the other hand, I do not want to do anything that would contribute to the reputation we get under these circumstances of being a mere rubber stamp.

We can take some comfort in the fact that the House of Commons itself has to hustle through this bill at the last moment, although it was introduced there on October 4. Under our rules I am not permitted to criticize the House of Commons, so perhaps I may suggest a criticism of the government for allowing this bill to take so long to go through the House of Commons. We have the usual story, of course, that there were other bills and that the house has been busy with other matters, and so on. Nevertheless, it seems to me incredible that a bill introduced on October 4, the passage of which is described as urgent, should not have come to us before now. Of course, it would have come to us before now if we had had the courage to say we would not deal with bills under such circumstances, by the suspending of rules and giving, as I presume we will be expected to do, three readings to a bill in about an hour. There have been threats from time to time, not merely from this group but from the other side, that one of these days we will say, "Regardless of Christmas, regardless of schedules, regardless of the convenience of the House of Commons, we won't do it." I believe that day will come. Perhaps not in my time, but I believe it will come sooner or later, and on that momentous day I think the public, the press and the members of the House of Commons will stop saying, "We can treat this place as just a rubber stamp."

I said I was reluctant to speak on the bill under these circumstances, but I think for the benefit of the Senate it is essential that we do consider that there are other sides to the glowing picture given to us by the Deputy Leader of the Government about the operation of the EDC. I do not disagree with that glowing picture, nor do I disagree with the importance that he has attached to the further development of the lending facilities, the insurance facilities and the guarantee facilities available to the EDC.

There is no question that in operating in this way nationally we are doing no more than placing our Canadian firms in a competitive position with their export competitors around the world. Without this kind of support we would be the boy scouts of the world. There have been complaints, of course, that this is again a form of non-tariff barrier. Perhaps it is. If it is, it is a non-tariff barrier which everybody is using today—and other countries are using it in a much more massive way than we are and with effects that on some occasions, of which I have personal knowledge, have made it impossible for Canadian firms to compete merely because, to use the phrase used by the deputy minister, we could not offer the same kind of concessional "package" in regard to payment for goods that other countries are able to offer.

It must be said, however, that as a country Canada is in a unique position in the world. We are the only major industrial country, with the possible exception of Australia, whose goods do not have free access to a market of at least 100 million people. The United States does have that kind of market; the members of the European Community now have that kind of market; the Chinese have it and the Indians have it; but the Canadians do not. Nevertheless, we are reliant on international trade to a degree not surpassed by any other country, with the possible exception of New Zealand. Canadian per capita trade is, for example, four times that of the United States, four times that of Japan, twice that of the United Kingdom, twice that of France and one and a half times that of Germany. So there is no question of the importance of this kind of support being available to Canadian firms.

The increase in the ceiling is of very large proportions, from less than $2 billion to more than $5 billion. I make no objection to that, because the EDC financing in the past has certainly proved its worth in many ways. I will suggest in a moment, however, that there are certain major aspects of its method of operation which should be examined.

We are facing at the present time a downward trend in export markets, which makes it all the more necessary that we should equip Canadian firms with the necessary capital and the other assistance, insurance and guarantees, that will make them competitive in these markets.

I am also happy that, so far, the EDC has required, in its lending activities at least, 80 per cent Canadian content in the goods that it finances.

Having said that, and agreeing fully with the necessity of the operation of the EDC and with the increased ceiling, I might suggest that there are some questions that need to be asked about the operation of the EDC. I am going to suggest that one of the ways out of this rubber stamp situation for the Senate might be for the chairman of the National Finance Committee—which I assume would be the committee to deal with this—to seek a reference from the Senate to call the officials of the EDC before that committee subsequently, which would be quite within our rules, in order to ask them some of the questions which I am now going to put. They are important questions, to which the Senate should have answers on its record.

Senator Benidickson: As a member of the committee, I would support that.

Senator Grosart: Thank you. Perhaps Senator Benidickson would consider conveying that suggestion to the chairman of the committee, who is probably a better friend of his than of mine. I do not wish to indicate by that that the chairman is not a friend of mine, but there are degrees of friendship in this place.

I say that the EDC is necessary, but we are not entirely sure that it is completely efficient. We should have more information about its borrowing costs, for example—that is, the cost of borrowing money by the government to provide these very large amounts, as compared to the interest rates charged. In my mind, at least, there are some serious questions that need to be asked on these matters. We are lending money to foreign governments at rates of interest that are much lower than the rate at which any Canadian businessman can borrow in Canada. The so-called “prime rate” of EDC loans is considerably lower. The Leader of the Government mentioned figures which he had just received, and these apparently indicate that EDC rates are now 7, possibly 8, perhaps even up to 9 per cent. If the prime rate is 9 per cent it is still lower than the prime rate at which any Canadian business, no matter how large, can borrow, and these are loans to foreign governments.

Of course, it can be said that we have to be competitive in the world market, but I think we should have a little more evidence as to why. Are these rates too low? What is the cost to the Canadian public? The EDC borrows money and lends it, but it does not make a profit; indeed it must have a loss—a substantial loss. As far as I know, we have no information whatsoever at this moment, as we are considering this bill, as to what the actual cost to the EDC is. We have no information at the moment on the number of loans that may be in default, the number of transactions insured by the EDC that may have lost money, or the defaults that may have taken place in the guarantees to financial institutions under this act.

Then, of course, there is the question of the identity of the people we lend this money to. To what countries do we lend it? I am not one who subscribes to any broad theory of relating our overseas activities too tightly to the political conditions in a country, but I wonder whether we should be lending money to OPEC countries—those oil-rich countries that are making life a little difficult for us at present. Should we actually be lending them money? We are talking, for instance, of lending money to Iran.

We have, of course, lent money outside of the OPEC countries, for example, to Yugoslavia, to the United Arab Republic, and to India, somewhat to our regret—certainly in respect to the nuclear reactor and the explosion that the Indians engineered not long ago.

Should we be lending to countries that are richer than we are? There are some of those in the world. We are not the richest country in the world, by any means. I am glad to say that the evidence I have is that, in order of amount, the largest outstanding loans from Canada at the moment are to Mexico, Brazil, India, Panama, and finally the United Kingdom. I think the Senate would be interested in examining the officials as to how this came about. Are these the countries to which most of our lending facilities should be extended? I do not know, but I am suggesting that it is the kind of information that we should have.

Then there is the question of distribution as between countries. There is no limit at the moment as to the percentage of the total lending facilities, insurance facilities or guaranteeing facilities that are available to any one country. It has been suggested that there should be a rule of thumb to the effect that no country should have more than ten per cent. I do not believe that that has been exceeded at the moment—that is, as far as I have been able to find out—but I must add that I have not had too much time to try to find out.

Then there is the question that the deputy leader raised and attempted to assure us on. I was not completely assured. I take no exception to the figures he gave other than to say that they are not global in the sense of the total expenditures under this bill. There is the serious question as to whether we are over-financing multinational corporations. Is the distribution of the use of these facilities as between large and small business what it should be? Personally, I do not think it is. Although I do not believe it is in the act, it seems to be a general policy of the corporation not to extend long term loans for less than $1 million. The figures which the deputy leader quoted, as I understood them, referred only to short- and medium-term loans, and the situation may well be different there.

Then there are those who say that this money might better be spent at home. Again the deputy leader made reference to that, and implied that perhaps in the short term this could appear to be justified, but in the long term it might not. I would be inclined to agree, but it has been said that we need capital in Canada very badly. Many Canadian firms in respect to their penetration of the domestic market are limited greatly by lack of capital. It is true that there are other facilities within the government structure to assist small business, but the information I have is that they are not going to get the loans at the same rate from any government agency or private sector agency as some of these foreign countries are able to get them from the EDC. It is a question that I think we should satisfy our minds on. There may be a good answer to it, but I should like to know why a Canadian firm going to the Industrial Development Bank has to pay 10 or 10½ per cent while a foreign country gets loans at 7 per cent and, even today, at not more than 9 per cent. There may be an answer to that, and if there is I should like to have it.

The deputy leader referred to the board of directors. The board of directors, as I understand it, is comprised of six public servants and five representatives of private industry, and I should be interested to know why that is the division. I would be inclined to think that the board might operate more efficiently if it had a majority from the private sector, although I can see certain objections to that.

Then, honourable senators, there is the question of the degree to which the EDC really tries to promote private sector financing. The deputy leader did refer to this point, and mentioned that they have tried to bring in the commercial banks. But there seems to me to be some evidence that we are away behind our opposite number in the United States in using government financing to induce the private sector to match that money. I believe that in the United States, as a matter of policy, they pretty well insist on the private sector matching government loans. I realize we are not in the same situation as the United States—we have less access to capital than they have—but again that is a question to which I should like to have an answer, and I believe that all honourable senators would.

Honourable senators, although I believe that in almost any other circumstances it would be our duty to recommend that this bill go to a committee, I am not going to make that suggestion at this time, and have said so to the deputy leader. I regret I have to take that position, and trust that through the offices of Senator Benidickson, the leader, or the deputy leader, my suggestion might be passed on. It would, to some extent, extricate us from this intolerable situation in which we find ourselves with respect to a bill such as this.

Senator Benidickson: You are also a member of the committee.

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must remind honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Langlois speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I deplore as much as my honourable friend the fact that a bill of this importance was received here at this late stage. Due to the pressure of time, I shall not have the opportunity to speak to all the questions posed by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition. I merely refer him to the report of the Export Development Corporation. The last one I have is for 1972.

Senator Grosart: I also have that.

Senator Langlois: I will say immediately that I welcome most heartily Senator Grosart's suggestion that the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be asked to study the operations of this crown corporation. The method by which that would probably be done is by referral of the annual report of the corporation to that committee, and at the next opportunity I shall be very pleased to make such a motion, if the chairman of the committee does not do so. I do not wish to give an undertaking on his behalf, but I am sure he will welcome the idea and, most likely, will himself make such a motion to the house at the next opportunity.

[Senator Grosart.]

The honourable senator made remarks in connection with the lower rates for this export program as compared to the rates generally charged in Canada. However, as I said in my presentation, the success of this program is based on the policy of the corporation to match competition rather than to underbid competition from other exporting countries. This explains why in many instances, generally speaking, the rates of financing must at times be much lower than those in existence in this country. This is part of the subsidization of our export trade, and I am sure that my honourable friend has no doubt in his mind that the economy of Canada is in serious need of a support program for our manufacturing industries. As I also mentioned, the economy generally benefits from this program.

It is regrettable that this bill will not be referred to a committee. I believe the deputy leader agrees that, due to pressure of time, we will not be able to have this bill considered in committee. However, I wish to assure him that this is not creating a precedent. I wish to assure him of that, and that under normal circumstances the bill would have been so referred. I repeat that I am in favour of his proposal that the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be requested to study the operation of this corporation.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be now read the third time.

PUBLIC SERVICE EMPLOYMENT ACT PUBLIC SERVICE STAFF RELATIONS ACT PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT INTERPRETATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-38, respecting the office of the Secretary to the Cabinet for Federal-Provincial Relations and respecting the Clerk of the Privy Council.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. George McIlraith, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be now read a second time.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a short bill. Its terms are straightforward and for that, among other reasons, I rather admire it. The drafting pleases me very much.

The purpose of the bill is direct and simple. It is to increase the capability of the government in carrying out its responsibility in the field of federal-provincial relations. The main intent of the bill is simply expressed in clause 1 which says that the Governor in Council may appoint:

(a.1) the Secretary to the Cabinet for Federal-Provincial Relations;

This bill was forecast in the Speech from the Throne, but the debate on the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne unfortunately did not draw as much attention to this important question as it might have.

I should like to recall to the minds of honourable senators two sentences from the Speech from the Throne:

In the inter-related society and economy of today, a clear distribution of responsibilities among the different levels of government in a federal state cannot in practical application have the neat precision that it has in political theory. Few actions can be taken by one level of government without affecting, or taking into account, the policies and programs of another.

In this era of ever-increasing incursion of government at all levels into the activities of the lives of people, it becomes more and more important that the process of consultation between the various levels of government, whether federal, provincial or municipal, be effective.

In an effort to make this consultative process effective, a division on federal-provincial relations was set up within the Privy Council in 1968 and it has operated since that time. With the increasing need for effective direction of the federal government's activity in that field, we now have Bill C-38. The consultative process has functioned continuously in the area of federal-provincial relations since Confederation, but it has accelerated with the changes in the concept of the role of government in society since Confederation.

To illustrate in a rough way that rate of acceleration, in 1964 there were some 109 federal-provincial meetings, whereas in 1973 there were 332. It should also be obvious to everyone that the activities of the government in the field of social security, having expanded as they have in recent years, and, indeed, in the field of economic development, rather than leaving it exclusively to the private sector of the country in a largely unregulated way, have also increased. One need only look at the topical subject of resource development to realize the extent to which the government's activities in that area have expanded. Another field in which government activities have been expanded is in relation to the question of the patriation of our Constitution. I, for one, regard this subject as one which will require increasing attention in the years ahead.

It must be obvious to all that there is a need for the best possible machinery to service the federal government's activities in these areas. I believe that all persons, even those who are critical of the government's actions in the conduct of its affairs in those areas, would agree to the need for a strengthening of the capability of the government in these areas.

As to the bill itself, clause 1 deals with an amendment to the Public Service Employment Act, allowing for the appointment of a secretary to the Cabinet for federal-provincial relations. There is an incidental change made in that respect about which I have not spoken. In 1940, with the formalizing of the work of recording decisions of the Cabinet, the title provided in the legislation of "Clerk of the Privy Council" had added to it "Secretary to the Cabinet." That is the designation that has been used for the Clerk of the Privy Council since 1940. This change, therefore, is made to clarify that, to correct it and bring it into line. The remaining clauses are purely incidental.

In view of the fact that I shall not request that this bill be referred to committee, I should make reference to clause 2, which amends the Public Service Staff Relations Act by adding thereto the words "Federal-Provincial Relations Office". Part I of Schedule I of that act reads:

• (1720)

Departments and other portions of the public service of Canada in respect of which Her Majesty as represented by the Treasury Board is the employer.

It is simply for that purpose.

The next amendment is:

Part II of Schedule A to the Public Service Superannuation Act is amended by adding thereto the following:

"Secretary to the Cabinet for Federal-Provincial Relations and the Federal-Provincial Relations Office"

Schedule A, Part I, of the act is a list of boards, commissions and corporations forming part of the Public Service.

The next incidental amendment is to section 28 of the Interpretation Act, and it simply provides for adding thereto, immediately after the definition "broadcasting", the following definition:

"Clerk of the Privy Council" or "Clerk of the Queen's Privy Council" means the Clerk of the Privy Council and Secretary to the Cabinet;

It is a purely incidental amendment.

Honourable senators, following the Throne Speech on September 30 a press release was issued announcing the intention of the government to appoint Mr. Gordon Robertson to the position being created in this bill if and when it received passage through the house—namely, the position of Secretary to the Cabinet for Federal-Provincial Relations. It is perhaps not appropriate to say more here than that. I think all senators will be delighted by the fact that this subject is going to receive the attention of a person of the calibre of Mr. Robertson, as the responsible administrative head of the office. I have had the good fortune to observe his work fairly closely over the last decade, and I have nothing but admiration and respect for his character and capacity as applied to his work in this field.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I commend the bill to your favourable consideration.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I am sure this is a bill of which we can approve, because I doubt if anybody would gainsay the simple statement that if anything can improve federal-provincial relations it will be very much to the benefit of Canada. I am not saying that critically, but I think the evidence is that federal-provincial relations are not generally improving with time. The oil policy is one excellent example, and there are many others.

I am sure the creation of this office will at least put federal-provincial relations on the kind of level that the provinces have asked for for a long time. Provincial premiers and others have said over and over again, "Who do we talk to in Ottawa?" I am sure this will go a long way to answering that question.

It has, of course, been suggested that we go further and have a minister for federal-provincial relations. I myself would be inclined to agree with that, if it were not that it would add to what Senator O'Leary was objecting to the other day, more big government, a larger cabinet. If I were pressed, however, I would say that there are some cabinet offices that could be dropped, and perhaps even some cabinet ministers who might be summoned here, to permit the setting up of such a ministry. That may come in time.

I agree with the remarks of Senator McIlraith, who has long experience, both with the matters that will be considered in this office and with the person it is suggested will fulfil the office. Mr. Gordon Robertson has certainly had an outstanding record in the public service of Canada, and I am sure there could not have been a better choice for this important position.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Grosart: I agree with Senator McIlraith's suggestion that it is not necessary to send this bill to committee.

Senator Deschatelets: May I ask Senator McIlraith a question? Of course, I agree with everything that has been said—but there is nothing in the bill about the exact responsibilities of the appointee, Mr. Robertson. Do I understand that from now on it is Mr. Robertson who will facilitate and co-ordinate the relations between the provinces and the federal government? Do I understand he is to be the person responsible? I ask that because there is nothing in this bill about the frame within which he is going to act.

Senator McIlraith: Yes, that will be his responsibility and the responsibility of that office. There has been a division of the Privy Council Office dealing with the subject of federal-provincial relations since 1968, and it has been headed by a deputy secretary in the Privy Council Office.

The Privy Council Office, curiously enough, is referred to in the British North America Act and the title has been brought forward from that time but there is not a statute, as in the case of the Department of Public Works, for instance, delineating the duties and responsibilities of the office.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, before this bill passes, there are some questions I should like to ask Senator McIlraith. First of all, what is going to happen to the deputy secretary who, I gather, has been more or less doing this job? Is he or she to be superseded, downgraded, or what?

Senator McIlraith: No, he will not be downgraded, and I would not say his work has been. He has not been doing the job just more or less; he has done it pretty well, and his office continues at exactly the same level as it is now. What is being sought here is the creation of the office of Secretary to the Cabinet reporting directly to the Cabinet in the field of federal-provincial relations. That is, there will be a Clerk of the Privy Council and Secretary to the Cabinet and then there will be a Secretary to the Cabinet for Federal-Provincial Relations. Formerly, the deputy secretary reported to the Secretary to the Cabinet, but that no longer will be the case. The newly created office will provide for direct reporting to the Cabinet.

Senator Forsey: The second question I would like to ask is: Is it the intention to enlarge the existing office? Is it the intention to create a further expansion of bureaucracy, or is this to be just the appointment of this secretary, with no further expansion of the office in the future?

Senator McIlraith: I believe there is no intention to increase it as such. I think I should qualify that remark—I would be less than frank if I did not—because it must be self-evident to all that the extension of activities of the federal government interact on the other governments in a way that was never thought possible even a few decades ago, and an expansion of the office is inevitable. It has a very small staff now—I believe there are about 28 officers—and it is simply unrealistic to answer no to the question. If the honourable senator intended to ask, "Is there to be any immediate buildup of staff?" then I have to answer, "No."

Senator Forsey: Senator McIlraith, if I understood him correctly, said that we might be undertaking a fresh effort to patriate the British North America Act. I hope this does not mean we are about to enter a fresh round of attempts to rewrite the Constitution, or discover some amendments that will be acceptable to everybody. If that is so, I am afraid that the best comment is that of Longfellow:

Fair and young were they,

When in hope they began that long journey;

Faded and old were they,

When in disappointment it ended.

I hope this is not a prelude to a fresh run of commissions, committees and discussions on what appears to be an almost hopeless quest.

Senator McIlraith: I indicated it was my view that in any realistic appreciation of Canadian affairs the question of patriation of the Constitution must receive attention, and I think it is unrealistic to think it can be otherwise.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be now read the third time.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

UNVEILING OF PORTRAIT OF HON. MURIEL McQUEEN FERGUSON, P.C

IN THE SENATE FOYER, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1974

[Translation]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Madam Speaker, Honourable Muriel McQueen Fergusson, colleagues and guests: It is a privilege for me to be given an opportunity to be present today for this event honouring one of our most distinguished senators and a very great Canadian. Not only is Senator Fergusson the first woman to be appointed as Speaker of the Senate, but during her entire career in Parliament she has been an example which has brought great credit to her and to the Senate.

May this portrait which I am privileged to unveil today remind this generation, and coming generations, of one who has served and continues to serve this nation with great distinction.

[English]

Hon. Renaude Lapointe (Speaker of the Senate): Dear guests, we are gathered here to celebrate the merits of a queen, a beloved queen of a very special kind, with no royal blood but with a crown of charm and distinction; with no kingdom but with a court of thousands of admirers; from coast to coast, some of the most fervent and devoted being around her today.

In her two years of gracious but too short reign as the first woman Speaker of the Senate, Muriel McQueen Fergusson has written in gold a page of Canadian history. Her unique ability and wisdom, and the contributions she had made to public life, together with her outstanding work in the Senate for twenty years had prepared her wonderfully to carry out her new duties. She accepted them because she fully deserved the honour, because she wanted to take up the challenge and also because it represented another important step forward for the promotion of women.

Not only did she perform with an extraordinary savoir-faire and a high sense of duty, but she has been the best public relations agent the Senate has ever had. Apart from presiding over Senate sessions and delivering many speeches throughout Canada, as Madam Speaker she entertained often: diplomats, distinguished visitors from abroad, party leaders and other parliamentarians, VIPs, heads of women's organizations, never forgetting her fellow senators. It is hard to meet someone who has not been her guest at one time or another. She enjoyed meeting and bringing people together, with her warm and likeable personality.

Amazingly young and zestful, continuously on the run, Muriel Fergusson has not allowed her appointment to slow her down politically in the energetic pursuit of her interests concerning the promotion of women and the well being of the underprivileged and the aged.

As a twenty-year veteran of the parliamentary scene, Madam Speaker Fergusson seldom missed the meetings of the parliamentary associations. She also had the honour of being co-chairman of the Canadian Inter-Parliamentary Group delegation to the annual Canada-United States meeting in Washington and of leading the first Canadian Parliamentary Group to visit Hungary.

For her lifetime of service to her country, for the remarkable example she has set through her hard work and dedication and particularly for her exceptional accomplishment as Speaker, everyone here is happy to pay Senator Fergusson a tribute of admiration and gratefulness and to wish her many more years of intense activity, not only in the Senate and in her province of New Brunswick, but throughout Canada.

[Translation]

Dear guests, I should like to add a few words in French to recall that when she was appointed Speaker, Mrs. Fergusson was paid enthusiastic tributes by her francophone colleagues, among others Senators Flynn, Bélisle and Desruisseaux. Once again a well-deserved chorus of praise underlines the end of her mandate. Everyone has appreciated her outstanding participation in the many official and diplomatic functions, her vivaciousness and good sense of humour, her generosity and availability at all times, as well as her smiling hospitality.

I therefore take this opportunity to echo my colleagues who have spoken here by expressing to Senator Fergusson my fullest admiration, and by wishing her many more long years of magnificent achievements.

[English]

We are particularly honoured to have with us Mr. Hubert Rogers, the distinguished painter whose work you are witnessing today. Mr. Rogers, a native of Prince Edward Island, who now lives in Manotick, has a long and brilliant career behind him and he is far from having set aside his brushes. Among the portraits to which he has given extraordinary life are those of Governor General Alexander, Mary Churchill, wife of Sir Christopher Soames, A. Y. Jackson, and Brigadier General Paul Triquet, V.C.

We sincerely think that this portrait is adding a special dimension to his accomplishments.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition in the Senate): Honourable senators, ladies and gentlemen: Whenever I see a portrait, I'm reminded of the time I asked an artist how it was that all his portraits turned out so beautifully. "The secret" he said "is never to show the bad ones."

I'm also reminded of the lady visiting the local fine art museum, trying to soak up a bit of culture. She stopped in front of a beautiful oil painting of a ragged but happy vagabond. "Well" she exclaimed, "Too broke to buy a decent suit of clothes, but he can afford to have his picture painted."

I'm quite certain that Senator Fergusson, like most of us, could not personally afford to commission such a large oil painting of herself by such a renowned artist. I'm therefore happy, as I'm sure all of you are, that we could do this for her.

But just like the little boy who gives his mother candy at Christmas for obvious reasons, we are really giving ourselves a portrait of Senator Fergusson and for equally obvious reasons: we will be permitted for many years to come to look at it and remember how very striking and distinguished she looked in her robes of office.

Not being a connoisseur but only a lover of fine art, my sole criterion for judging a painting is whether or not I like it. If it pleases me, it's good. And this painting pleases me.

I was glad when it was unveiled to see that it wasn't abstract. I'm afraid I'll never really get used to abstracts. I'm a bit like the little boy who looked at a painting and said to his mother, "What's that?" "That's supposed to be a cowboy and his horse" she answered. "Well, if that's what it's supposed to be, why ain't it".

This painting pleases me because Hubert Rogers has translated onto canvas, for posterity to see and appreciate, the real Muriel McQueen Fergusson.

What you see is what she is—a warm, witty, affable and generous human being. But what has also been captured in this painting is the drive, the determination and the pride of this great New Brunswicker.

As Speaker, she was permitted to play an even greater role in the affairs of our country. She carried out this trust with the zeal for efficiency and excellence typical of those who are never satisfied with anything less than an outstanding effort. She brought inestimable credit to Canada, to the Senate and to herself, and she was one of the best public relations investments Canada and the Senate ever made. She has every reason to be as proud of herself as we are of her.

Senator Fergusson is also a credit to her sex. She was the first lady Speaker, and appropriately so. Her career is an enviable collage of significant achievements in the noble pursuit of equal rights for women.

She went to college when other girls thought high school was the limit for them. She even went on to invade what was then a sacred preserve of men—the legal profession. But what's more important is the way in which she made use of her talents and education. Her career became a beacon for other women. Her concern, her interest, her total involvement in the affairs of the community served as a sterling example for other women in New Brunswick. She gave them reason to be proud, reason to feel that they too had not only the right but the duty to participate in public affairs.

It's the Muriel Fergussons of this world—unassuming, intelligent, reflective and totally dedicated—who will win for their sex that position in society which they deserve to hold but have been unfairly denied for far too long. These are the women who will force the male chauvinist to rewrite his dictionary. Nevermore will woman be defined as a creature who is convinced it takes two to keep a secret.

On that subject, I once overheard a senator complain to Muriel that generally speaking women were generally speaking. Senator Fergusson replied, "Yes, we women talk too much. But, even at that, we don't say half of what we know".

You can believe all I say about Senator Fergusson because I have known the lady for over 30 years. We both served during the same period from 1942-45 as Enforcement Counsel for the Wartime Prices and Trade Board. And let me tell you, she was every bit as impressive then as she is now.

I joined Muriel in the Senate about 12 years ago, and she joined me in the Privy Council about 12 days ago. I take this opportunity to congratulate her publicly on that appointment. It is one of which she is particularly deserving.

Senator Fergusson's performance as Speaker was so impressive that it served to pave the way for a successor of the same gender, and a very able lady in her own right.

Senator Fergusson, if she gets lonely hanging there on the Senate wall, the only lady among so many male predecessors, can look forward to a day less than half a decade away when Senator Lapointe will take her place beside her and so lend moral support and companionship. Together, they can eavesdrop on tourists and smile when the little girl asks her mommy if these ladies were really bosses in the Senate like mommy is at home.

Senator Fergusson, this portrait of you will bring to the walls of the Senate all the charm and grace that your person has brought to the chamber. And those who derive pleasure from gazing upon your countenance will never know that the pleasure they derive from that is only a small fraction of what they might enjoy if, like us, they had the pleasure of knowing you personally and serving with you in the Senate.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, ladies and gentlemen, in concluding, I want to say to Muriel that all her colleagues in the Senate have the greatest esteem for her and they are very happy at the thought of being able to see her even more often from now on. Indeed, in addition to meeting her in person occasionally, they will be able to admire her picture.

[English]

Hon. Muriel McQueen Fergusson: Madam Speaker, Mr. Leader, Senator Flynn, colleagues and other friends: This occasion is a very memorable one for me. Not many people have the great honour of having their portrait painted to be hung on the walls of our beautiful Canadian Parliament Buildings.

Despite the kind things that have been said today, I really feel like the mate in Hood's story "UP THE RHINE" when during a terrible storm at sea a titled lady sent for him and asked if he could swim. "Like a duck, my lady" he replied. "That being the case, I will condescend to lay hold on your arm all night." But the mate replied, "That's too great an honour for the likes of me."

Even though having been Speaker of the Senate, which has now entitled me to have my portrait painted to be hung on these walls, "it may have been too great an honour for the likes of me." It was a wonderful experience which I enjoyed thoroughly.

I will always remember with gratitude the friendly encouragement and co-operation, during my term as Speaker, of all my colleagues and of the officers, and all the staff of the Senate, particularly the devoted and invaluable assistance of Mrs. Muri Smith, who was my secretary.

Surely it is not amiss on this occasion for me to refer to the experience of sitting for this portrait of which I hope you approve. That also was an enjoyable experience, although it did take a great deal of time and patience on the part of both the sitter and the artist. During sittings I learned much more about painting and art than I had ever known before. I am very happy that Mr. Hubert Rogers, a Maritimer like me, is able to be with us today accompanied by his daughter, Elizabeth.

I thank you all for doing me the honour of being here today, but especially I thank Madam Speaker.

THE SENATE

PERMISSION GRANTED TO TAKE PHOTOGRAPHS OF THE PRECINCTS AND SENATORS FOR DISTRIBUTION TO CANADIAN EMBASSIES

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I at this time make a brief comment about the request which was received a few weeks ago to photograph the Senate chamber and members of the Senate. Honourable senators will recall that on November 13, 1974, Madam Speaker referred to the Senate a request for permission to photograph the Senate chamber from both galleries for the purpose of a photo-story on the Senate which is now being produced for the Department of External Affairs for distribution to all Canadian embassies throughout the world. The following day I indicated to the house that I would like to have the matter stand pending consultation. I am now in a position to report to the Senate that there are certainly no objections to such photographs being taken.

May I suggest, if honourable senators agree, that such photographs be taken on Wednesday, February 12, between 2 p.m. and 2:30 p.m. when we shall expect our usual full attendance.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

SCIENCE POLICY

ATTENDANCE OF PRESIDENT OF CLUB OF ROME BEFORE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, with leave I should like to make a special announcement.

Senator Flynn: Leave is granted, of course.

Senator Lamontagne: Dr. Peccei, the President of the Club of Rome, will be in Ottawa this week, and he has generously agreed to appear before the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy on Thursday morning at 10 o'clock. Members of the committee will receive notice of this meeting this evening, but because of this special occasion, and because of the reputation of this man as a world leader, I should also like to extend to all honourable senators an invitation to attend the meeting.

Senator Asselin: I should like to ask a question on this announcement. We have received notice that this meeting will be held in camera. Why?

Senator Lamontagne: Because we want to leave Dr. Peccei as free as possible to make the remarks he wants to make. We would also like all senators attending to feel free to ask Dr. Peccei all the questions they would like to, which might be quite controversial.

Senator Asselin: Will there be any press release after the meeting?

Senator Lamontagne: No.

VISIT OF PRIME MINISTER OF UNITED KINGDOM QUESTION

Senator Yuzyk: Honourable senators, I understand that the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom today paid a visit to the Canadian Parliament. If that is the case, I should like to inquire of the Leader of the Government whether the right honourable gentleman called upon the Honourable the Speaker of the Senate?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I understand that the right honourable gentleman, the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, has been in Ottawa only a few hours. He has a very limited time here. He has come to meet with the Right Honourable the Prime Minister of Canada. Beyond that, I shall certainly undertake some inquiries. I understand that it is not one of the occasions when it is the intention of this visiting head of state to address any joint meeting of the two Houses of Parliament.

CRIMINAL CODE (COMMUTATION OF DEATH SENTENCE)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the order:

Second reading of the Bill S-21, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code (commutation of death sentence)".—(Honourable Senator Robichaud, P.C.).

Senator Robichaud: Honourable senators, with leave I would ask that this order stand until February 12. The reason for this request is that I have been invited, and have accepted the invitation, to attend a meeting of the Atlantic Provinces Policemen's Association to be held in Moncton on February 8. At that time I may get some pertinent information that could affect the outcome of this bill. I would therefore ask that this order stand until that day.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.
Order stands.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, December 4, 1974, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Senator Croll calling the attention of the Senate to the status of the "work ethic" in Canada today, and the need for the establishment of a Senate committee to examine and report thereon.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators, the motion before us contains two proposals. The first is that an inquiry be made into the status of the work ethic in Canada today, and the other is that this inquiry be carried out by a Senate committee with power to examine and report thereon.

● (2010)

This gives rise to three obvious questions: One, what do we mean by "work ethic?" Two, why should we examine it? And three, why by a Senate committee?

The term "work ethic" always reminds me of Tom Sawyer's definition, that "work consists of what a body is obliged to do, and play consists of what a body is not obliged to do." This definition embodies a great truth because we know from experience that what may be regarded as work by one person may very well be regarded as play or recreation by another. Some people are so fascinated by work that they can sit and look at it for hours. Others like it so much they can sleep alongside it all day long. On the other hand, there are those who like work because they enjoy being busy, and some carry it so far as to be regarded as work addicts. Such people are bored when they have nothing to do.

It does not follow, however, that any one of these attitudes to work is necessarily the correct one which should, therefore, be imposed upon everyone else. Our approaches and attitudes to work are determined by our underlying moral philosophy, out of which we evolve certain moral laws, principles and values, which in turn enable us to form certain judgments with respect not only to work but to workers as well. This underlying philosophy with its system of principles and values is described as our "work ethic."

It was not until I started researching this subject that I began to realize how much our concept of work has changed down through the years. The ancient Greeks in the days of Plato and Aristotle regarded work as a nuisance, something to be limited to what was absolutely essential so as to provide as much leisure time as possible. They prized their leisure time, not for indulgence in sensual pleasures and orgies but for contemplation—contemplation of the universe and the world around them; contemplation of man himself and his place in the scheme of things. To them contemplation was the one activity in which man could participate as well as the gods, and to that extent become god-like.

Horas non numero nisi serenas—the hours do not count unless they are serene. This motto on an old Roman sun dial shows that the ancient Romans had a similar concept. The great philosopher Seneca asked, "What is the good life?" and answered in one word, tranquillitas.

Our modern work ethic is a product of many influences. One of the most important of these is Holy Scripture—particularly certain passages of the Old Testament which have been interpreted as implying that work is a curse imposed on man by his Creator as a punishment for man's disobedience. For example, Genesis, chapter 3, verse 19, says:

In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground—

The New Testament writer seemed to subscribe to this interpretation when he said:

—if any would not work, neither should he eat.

It is interesting to note, however, that Jesus Himself did not stress this particular interpretation. Instead He hal- lowed and dignified work by engaging in it with Joseph in their carpenter shop. He taught that while work was necessary, it should be kept in perspective. If anything, He seemed inclined toward the concept of the ancient Greeks when he asked:

For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?

Also, in Matthew, chapter 6, verses 25 and 26:

Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on. Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment?

Behold the fowls of the air: for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are ye not much better than they?

St. Luke also describes in chapter 10 how Martha, the sister of Lazarus, complained to Jesus because her sister, Mary, was not doing her share of the household chores. He told Martha gently that she should not let herself get so upset and bothered about work, and that what Mary was interested in was of far greater importance.

Thomas Aquinas in his Summa Theologica thought that religious activity should take precedence over secular activity, and contemplation above all else. Sir Thomas More, the author of Utopia, in his treatise on the work society stated that work was an essential part of nature, but given a surplus situation in which people can maintain themselves without all of them having to work, then man was under no obligation to toil.

It is quite clear that man's concept of work has changed as his circumstances, and particularly his economic environment, have changed. In the Middle Ages the masses traded their freedom for security. They tilled the soil while the nobles who protected them engaged in other pursuits. The artisans and skilled people of those days were free to work or not to work as they wished. The wealthy employed them to build cathedrals, castles and other great architectural monuments which surpass anything we can produce today. Yet they had more leisure time than their modern counterparts.

In Canada our forefathers were compelled to work from dawn to dusk in order to survive, but as our economic environment developed from a rural economy to an industrial economy, our concept of work changed again. The words "labour" and "employment" became more frequently used than the word "work." The word "job" also acquired new significance.

Then along came Karl Marx who added a new dimension to the work ethic when he showed how a capitalistic economy makes man into a thing. The worker sells his labour and his time like any other commodity. Work, therefore, becomes a means of self-alienation, and all beings become materialized.

Thus we have come all the way from the ancient Greek and Roman philosophers, who regarded leisure for contemplation as the essence of the good life, to the Greek and Roman artisans who regarded their work and its products as a part of themselves, causing them to strive for perfection in even the minutest details because though the flaws could not be seen by human eyes, they believed they were nevertheless perceptible to the gods.

● (2020)

In the Middle Ages the same ideas were perpetuated through the crafts and guilds, for the worker had to make his masterpiece before being recognized and admitted as a master workman. His masterpiece then became the hallmark and guarantee of the quality of his work. How different from today when we have a confusion of conflicting concepts and ideas about the work ethic.

We have the Protestant work ethic which proclaims that work is good for the soul and necessary for the development of character, and essential also for the development and maintenance of human dignity. On that basis work then becomes a fundamental human right.

The word "dignity" comes from the Latin word dignus which means "worthy" or "having worth." The Christian work ethic holds that man has special worth in himself as a created being, and strangely enough both Marxists and communists subscribe to this proposition when it suits them, although by denying the existence of a Creator they deny the very basis of man's claim to human dignity.

Nevertheless, our present-day society though founded on Christian principles is just as inconsistent as the communist. We have developed a system of values which has resulted in a sort of caste system based on jobs. You may remember several years ago when the low paid railway non-operating employees secured a pay increase, the highly paid operating employees, including engineers, threatened to strike also not because they were underpaid but merely to restore the differential so that they could maintain their former ranking position in the hierarchy of jobs.

We also have the curious situation where unemployed people refuse jobs such as picking apples, harvesting crops, et cetera, because they consider it beneath their dignity to do that sort of work. It follows, therefore, that instead of lending dignity to his job, the worker now depends upon the job for his dignity. We have lost sight of the basic principle of work being really a contract between the individual and society whereby the worker contributes to the community in exchange for the benefits of being able to draw on community resources. In today's society the job is not only the means whereby the worker participates in society; it has become the axis along which the worker's whole life is organized. It serves not only to maintain the worker in his group but regulates his whole life activity. It determines the pattern of his social participation, the nature of his life experience, and at the same time it is a source of many of his satisfactions. Today a person's social position is affected by whether or not he holds a job, by the nature of the job he holds and the manner in which he performs it. In short, the job in our society exerts an influence which pervades the whole of the human life span.

So much then for the work ethic. Now for the second question—why should we examine it? The answer to this question can be deduced from what I have already said.

I have shown how our work ethic has become so complex and diffuse that we have lost sight of its basic principle as a contract between the individual and society whereby each contributes to the other. I have shown that we have become confused in relating our work ethic to other moral concepts such as dignity, and how this confusion manifests itself in the system of values which individuals or society as a whole use to determine the worth of services rendered. I have shown how our concepts of work have changed as our economic environment has moved from an economy of scarcity to an economy of abundance, and as our economic difficulties have changed from problems of production to problems of consumption.

We are now on the threshold of a new era which in many ways will be fundamentally different from anything we have known in the past. While it is impossible to discern the exact shape of things to come, we can nevertheless see the forces that are shaping them, and one thing we can be sure about is that the shape of the future will be vastly different from anything we have experienced in the past. We may be moving back again to an economy of scarcity. That seems to be the case with respect to energy and certain key raw materials. On the other hand, necessity is the mother of invention, and after a period of adjustment it is possible that technology will usher in a new era of abundance. Be that as it may, we can be certain that Canada will become more dependent on other nations and we shall have to share more of our wealth and more of our products, particularly food products, with those nations who do not have enough. The battle for a caring, sharing world is meant to be the next great chapter of history.

Speaking of sharing, we have the problem of the unequal distribution of wealth here in Canada—the growing disparity between the rich and the poor. In a recent speech the Minister of National Health and Welfare, as quoted by Senator Croll at page 283 of Hansard, stated that in 1972 the top 20 per cent of Canadians received 39 per cent of the wealth produced, while the bottom 20 per cent received less than 6 per cent. The corresponding figures for 1967 were 38.5 per cent and 6.8 per cent. The income gap between the richest Canadians and the poorest is widening. The devices we use to redistribute wealth are working in reverse. This cries out for investigation, and in itself is sufficient to justify an in-depth study by a Senate committee.

We must, therefore, shake off the idle dream that Canada can remain an island of isolated prosperity living selfishly and alone in a vast ocean of poverty, starvation and deprivation. We must awake to the reality that we have moral obligations to the rest of mankind, and that we shall have to meet fiercer competition under more difficult circumstances and overcome more difficult problems than we have ever experienced in the past. This means that in order to survive and be able to fulfill our moral obligations to the rest of the world, Canadians will have to adjust as never before.

We can be sure that the changes which we can see coming will require further changes in our work ethic and our concepts of work. We have seen where our present concepts have led us and it should be clear that Canadians cannot be expected to make the necessary adjustments and make them in the right way without having a clearer understanding of our work ethic and clearer concepts than we have now. The confusions and contradictions in our present concepts are the result of allowing ourselves to be overtaken by events. Surely it is the part of wisdom to prepare ourselves beforehand as much as possible so that we can learn from past mistakes and be ready to make the right response to each challenge as it arises.

That, in my opinion, is the main reason for an examination of our work ethic in Canada today, but it is by no means the only one. Society today is questioning the traditional work concepts and we are living in a time when work is changing its meaning in fundamental ways for large groups of people, particularly those who are no longer motivated by hunger or by material gain. Work has values other than purely financial in the lives of many people. Changing attitudes are shifting the emphasis from the economic to the social aspects of work; from quantity to quality and from the purpose of work to its meaningfulness to the individual and its usefulness to the community.

There are also questions as to how much work is being done solely for economic value and how much essential work is being left undone, particularly in the health and social fields, simply because the people needing those services lack sufficient income to pay for them.

Not only do we need to re-think our concepts of work and our underlying philosophy but we also need to re-examine our system of values and the criteria by which we evaluate the importance to society of the work being done and the services performed. For example, who provides the most valuable service for society: the primary producer or the processor? What can be more important than food and shelter, the very basic necessities of life? Why then should the farmer, or fisherman, the miner, the woodsman be paid less by society for their services than those who process and distribute the primary products they produce? Why should we pay such fabulous salaries to entertainers and hockey players whose services are the least essential of all?

Senator Croll: That's what Ballard thinks.

Senator Carter: How should we evaluate the work of garbage collectors, the fruit pickers, the street cleaners, the floor sweepers, the people who perform these so-called menial tasks? Should not the value of these services be assessed on their importance to the community and those who perform them paid accordingly?

By what sort of rationalization do we justify the attitude that these menial jobs are beneath the dignity of Canadians and should therefore be performed by immigrants from other countries? Are not the Mexicans, the Asians, Africans and West Indians entitled to the same dignity as Canadians? The time has come when we simply must revise our thinking and our attitudes on these matters or we shall never be able to make the right responses to the challenges of the future.

Then there is the question of the right to work. The strength of a nation lies in the character of its people. If work is good for the soul and essential for the development of character, then surely it should be a fundamental human right, yet the unions and employers enter into closed shop agreements whereby this basic right is denied to workers unless they conform to certain conditions laid down by unions, some of which may even be in conflict with the workers' conscience.

To a large extent our problems today are the result of too much emphasis on our so-called "rights" and too little emphasis on our duties. We no longer distinguish between our wants and our needs. The common man wants facilities that until recently have been uncommon. He also wants short hours of work and long holidays. But without automation it is impossible for the bulk of society to have more and more, while working less and less. Arithmetic rules it out. Convinced of their "rights" they seek in vain to defy arithmetic.

The demands of each sectional interest are, in most cases, understandable. Each lot can satisfy itself that it is worse off than others, if not worse off than before. Almost always each demanding group has, in some ways, a just cause. The trouble is that justice for one group can spell disaster for other groups, and with galloping inflation also for themselves.

The life and health of all nations, not only of Canada, depend on a shift of emphasis from rights to duties. Civics and ethics have always prescribed duties. So conscious of this is Chairman Mao that he has made it the guiding principle of the society he is trying to create.

The right to work brings up the question as to whether the private sector can provide jobs for every person who is able and willing to work. If not, what is the responsibility of the public sector and of society as a whole? Should a worker be penalized because his job is destroyed by technology which in the long run will be a benefit to society? Should a worker be penalized because his job has been destroyed by policies which governments have been forced to adopt in order to protect society as a whole?

Why should one-fifth of our Canadian population be trapped in poverty because, owing to disability or circumstances, they are unable to perform traditional jobs or because of the unemployment rate they are unable to find jobs? For that matter why should anyone be compelled to work for an inadequate income?

Also, to what extent should governments at any level become the employer of last resort? What kind of balance should or can be struck to reconcile the needs of society with the needs of the individual including the need for personal fulfillment and the need to do his own thing? How much emphasis should be placed on the service rendered to the community? To what extent should government encourage labour intensive enterprises, by way of capital grants and loans for group or community projects and for non-profit cooperative enterprises or limited profit enterprises? These are all questions that are related to our concept of work and our work ethic. It is important that we find the answers and find them soon.

Over against all this is the widespread public belief that our social security programs are destroying the work ethic of our people. I think we must face the fact that once getting something for nothing becomes a way of life for any person, his self-respect and his whole character begins to deteriorate. But does it need to be that way? Doesn't the real blame rest with us, the politicians, who with humanitarian instincts and with the best of intentions advocate welfare programs but do nothing to avoid the erosion of character which could result, and even neglect to point out the danger. Are we not our brothers' keepers in this respect also?

Then there is the contention that most workers prefer to live off welfare and unemployment benefits instead of working. This myth has been exploded a number of times, but the media, by propagating and sensationalizing misinformation, continue to revive it. They distort the picture by giving the impression that every person receiving unemployment benefits is paid at the top rate. Senator Asselin, in his excellent speech on December 4, 1974, made reference to this when he said, as recorded on page 340 of Hansard:

Under the Unemployment Insurance Act provisions, when people stop working after they have qualified they can receive between $100 and $115 a week.

He then goes on to ask, "How many can you find who will accept a job which will give them between $100 and $115 per week? Actually, only 28 per cent of the unemployed receive benefits of $100 per week and over. The average benefit is only $75 per week, which is well below the poverty line, and welfare benefits are lower still.

• (2040)

Nevertheless, as Senator Croll pointed out on page 284 of Hansard of November 20, there is the problem of over half a million Canadians being out of work while over 130,000 jobs go begging, and there is the problem of having to import indentured labour from Mexico, Spain and other countries to fill jobs that Canadians will not take.

There is also the disregard by teachers and public servants for contracts supposedly entered into in good faith. Surely these problems alone, since they go to the very roots of our economy and of our survival as a nation, are sufficiently important to justify an inquiry by a Senate committee.

In addition, there is also the need to take a good look at our official definition of work. The Oxford Universal Dictionary defines work as "action involving effort or exertion directed to a specific end, especially as a means of gaining one's livelihood." That definition is broad enough to include stealing, gambling and even prostitution.

The official definition as set forth by Statistics Canada on page 67 of the Labour Force of December 1972 defines a work as:

All persons who during the reference week

- (a) did any work for pay or profit;
- (b) did any work which contributed to the running of a farm or business operated by a related member of the household; or

(c) had a job, but were not at work, because of bad weather, illness, industrial dispute or variation or because they were taking time off for other reasons.

Practically the same definition is embodied in the Unemployment Insurance Act. It follows from these definitions that with the exception of services rendered by family members to family enterprises, work activities which bypass the market mechanism are regarded as free services and, like free goods, such services are deemed not to have a price. Not having a price they have no value, and since they have no value they cannot be regarded as work in the value-added sense.

Is this reasoning logical? Surely the absence of a price does not mean there is no value in the services rendered? The volunteer social welfare worker, the volunteer hospital worker, the citizens who transport handicapped people, the homemaker, the mother rearing children and the scores of men and women serving in churches, clubs, associations and numerous other organizations render services which would have to be purchased if volunteers did not supply them.

This market orientation of the work concept implies that any work activity to be recognized as legitimate must meet three conditions: (1) there must be a market price for the activity; (2) the productivity of the individual performing the activity must be such as to command the prevailing market price; and (3) the individual performing the activity must be able and willing to accept payment for it.

The implications and ramifications of these concepts are such that their validity is being challenged and certainly should be looked into. For example, the establishment of a price depends, among other things, on an actual or effective demand which in turn depends on purchasing power. The absence of actual demand does not mean that a need does not exist. There may very well be a potential demand; also, the absence of a market price does not mean that the activities related to filling the potential demand does not constitute work.

The market orientation concept dictates that to be employed the individual must produce a value or output which will at least cover the wage the employer is required to pay, either by law, by labour management contract or by the market. This concept imposes a severe penalty, because any individual who because of advanced age, minor handicap, lack of skill or other impediment, cannot produce a value of output equal to what the prospective employer is required to pay, is unable to obtain work and the higher the level of unemployment the weaker the competitive position of those whose productivity is at the lower end of the scale. It also penalizes those who do not wish to be bound by contractual arrangements which turn them into marketable resources.

A further undesirable aspect of the market orientation of the work concept is that it divides the adult population into employed, unemployed, and unemployable. Each of these conveys a good or bad connotation about the individuals involved, their roles in society and their contributions to the community.

The concepts inherent in our present official definition place the emphasis on production and ignore consumption completely, although in the future consumption may well become more important than production. It also raises questions about the operation of supply and demand in the labour market and to what extent supply and demand is or ought to be controlled.

Then there is the other side of the labour coin, which is leisure. Leisure is such a vast subject and of such tremendous importance that it could very well require a completely separate study.

Senator Asselin concluded his excellent speech on December 4 last by questioning whether there was a need for an inquiry into our work ethic and asked specifically what such a committee would do. I do hope that what I have said will convince him of the need for such an inquiry and that the lines of investigation which I have indicated will satisfy him that there will be plenty of important work for the committee to do.

As to why this inquiry should be carried out by a Senate committee, the answer is obvious. It can be done only by a Senate committee or by a royal commission, and of the two the Senate committee can certainly do it much better and cheaper. Furthermore, for the most part, Senate committee meetings are open to the public, and the printed proceedings of the committee are also available to the public. Thus the opportunities for making the public aware of the problems under consideration are far greater than is possible with a royal commission.

The work ethic lies at the heart of our social contract. In the final analysis, it is our ideas and concepts which will determine the kind of society we will have. The most healthy exercise we Canadians as a society can perform is to take a good look at ourselves, our ideas and concepts and how they relate to the problems we face today and those we can foresee in the future. By focusing attention on these matters and educating the public and generating thoughtful discussion, as was done with respect to poverty, a Senate committee can perform a very useful service and, in view of the changing times in which we live, a service that is very essential.

Honourable senators, an inquiry into our work ethic is an important job which needs to be done. It is a job which the Senate can do and, in my opinion, ought to do for Canada. I therefore support Senator Croll's suggestion and hope it will receive unanimous approval.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Scott has been substituted for that of Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich) on the list of members appointed to serve on the Standing Joint Committee on the Restaurant of Parliament.

EXCISE TAX ACT AND EXCISE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-40, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act.

Bill read first time.

Senator Perrault moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE (CONTROL OF WEAPONS AND FIREARMS)

BILL TO AMEND—QUESTION

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, I have a question dealing with Bill S-14, to amend the Criminal Code (control of weapons and firearms). A very large number of letters have reached me, as they have undoubtedly reached many members of the Senate, with respect to Bill S-14, which we will refer to as the gun bill. These letters need to be answered and I am at a loss to know what definitive reply I can give.

The history of the bill is as follows. In the first session of the Twenty-ninth Parliament a similar bill, known as Bill S-2, was given first reading on February 5, 1973. On March 2, 1973, it received second reading and was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. It was not reported to the Senate, and the session ended on February 26, 1974, almost a year later. In the second session of the Twenty-ninth Parliament, the legislation was introduced as Bill S-4 and was given first reading on March 26, 1974. On April 22, 1974, it received second reading and was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. It died in the committee on account of dissolution of Parliament. In the present session the legislation received first reading as Bill S-14 on October 29, 1974. On November 21, 1974, it received second reading and was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. It is now before that committee.

This was presented as an important and urgent bill. It is still important, in my opinion, but the government now has in mind legislation in the field of gun control, and, since this is an important and delicate bill, unless the leader has some other plan, my suggestion is to let the House of Commons take the responsibility for remedial action. If remedial action is going to be taken, and I believe it will, why not let it be by a joint committee—this matter is a natural for a joint committee—to avoid confrontation with the Commons?

This bill was considered urgent and important at one time; it is certainly important, but it cannot be quite as urgent as it was thought to be when presented a couple of years ago. My question is: What action will be taken in order that we can make some reasonable reply to the large numbers of letters coming in to us at the present time?

Senator Flynn: Are you addressing your question to the Leader of the Government or to the Senate?

Senator Croll: To the leader and to the sponsor.

Senator Flynn: This is a private bill. It is about time we knew to whom you were addressing the question.

Senator Croll: I am prepared to accept your answer.

Senator Flynn: If you get mine, I don't think you will be happy with it.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, members of this house have a right to advance those measures which they believe to be in the public interest. The sponsor of this bill, a public bill in the hands of a private member, has every right to proceed with it.

Senator Flynn: Sure.

Senator Perrault: And to advance its cause in this place irrespective of what may or may not happen in the other place. I am sure that the sponsor of this legislation has heard his colleague speak this afternoon and will give due consideration to his judgment and his remarks. Beyond that I am not prepared to suggest that anyone withdraw any measure in this place.

Senator Flynn: You did not take Senator Croll's remarks as a question but as a comment on the bill. Is that it?

Senator Croll: My point was that in view of the record of this bill some reply must be given to the hundreds of letters which are coming in to senators.

Senator Asselin: Why not put your question to the sponsor of the bill?

Senator Croll: He can answer it, if he likes, but he has no control over it. That is the point.

Senator Flynn: My understanding is that you are seeking advice as to the type of reply that you should give to these letters.

Senator Croll: And that others should give. I can give a reply.

Senator Walker: Are you in favour of the bill?

Senator Cameron: Honourable senators, I have been trying to get this bill before the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for some considerable time, but, as you know, adjournments and prorogations have made it necessary to postpone it from time to time. There is a request now on Senator Goldenberg's desk to convene a meeting of the committee in order to deal with it at the earliest possible moment. I believe the reason that the committee has not been able to get at it before is that there have been such lengthy hearings on the parole question.

I believe Senator Goldenberg has just come in and can answer as to how soon he can get at it. But I should like to urge that we get at it as quickly as possible, because letters are just pouring in asking what action is being taken.

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, the committee is meeting this afternoon and I will discuss this with the committee. But there are two bills, the cannabis bill and the gun control bill, and it will be up to the committee to decide how it wants to proceed.

Senator Cameron: May I ask the honourable senator that this be given high priority so that it can be dealt with as soon as possible. It has been dragging on for a long time.

Senator Flynn: You do not have to wait for that to answer letters that you receive.

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, as far as the bill's dragging on is concerned, as Senator Cameron said, two such previous bills received second reading. The first time was just before an adjournment, and the second time was just before dissolution; so we had to introduce it for the third time, and it only received second reading just before Christmas.

Senator Flynn: A Christmas gift.

VISIT OF PRIME MINISTER OF THE UNITED KINGDOM

QUESTION

Senator Yuzyk: Honourable senators, would the Leader of the Government have any further information regarding the possible visit of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom to the Parliament of Canada, and in particular to the Honourable the Speaker of the Senate?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, as you are aware from a previous communication, there is a probability that the Right Honourable Harold Wilson, Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, will be present on the Senate side of the Parliament buildings at approximately three o'clock this afternoon. My understanding is that he will enter through the Peace Tower entrance and then proceed to the chambers of Madam Speaker, where he will pay his respects and sign the visitors' book. The proposal, which I shall voice again for the convenience of the honourable senator, is that we adjourn at approximately ten minutes to three, to await the arrival of the Prime Minister. Afterwards, the sitting will resume at the call of the bell, should there be other business to be transacted.

THE SENATE

NEWSPAPER ARTICLES—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Senator Rowe: Honourable senators, I rise on a small matter of privilege which, nevertheless, I consider to be important from the standpoint of the record.

Recently, as I believe many honourable senators know, I wrote a couple of articles on the Senate which were published in a newspaper. Since I was anxious that all my colleagues would know what I had actually written I asked my office to make photostatic copies of the two articles and distribute them to all senators. I believe most senators got their copies, but in the event that any honourable senator is lacking both copies I would be pleased to supply them. I believe some senators got copies of only one article. That, I may say, is not my point of privilege. The point I actually wish to raise is as follows.

It has been brought to my attention by half a dozen of my colleagues that there is an error in one of the articles. It says that the Committee on Mass Media was headed by Senator Maurice Lamontagne. I have here a carbon copy of my actual script, and I would like to have the correct version entered in our official record. Here are the exact words as they appeared in my script:

Among these in recent years have been the Special Committee on Poverty headed by Senator David Croll, the Committee on Land Use headed by Senator Arthur Pearson, the Committee on Mass Media headed by Senator Keith Davey, and the Committee on Science Policy headed by Senator Maurice Lamontagne.

I apologize for this. It was obviously a typesetter's error. I suppose you could say it was a case of "man proposes but"—in this case, not God—"the typesetter disposes." I apologize to my colleagues for, from my standpoint, this completely inadvertent error and I would like to have this entered in the record.

CLERESTORY OF THE SENATE CHAMBER

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. John J. Connolly moved, pursuant to notice:

That a special committee of the Senate be appointed to consider and report upon the question of the installation of stained glass windows in the clerestory of the Senate chamber;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate; and

That the committee be composed of the Honourable Senators Beaubien, Cameron, Carter, Connolly (Ottawa West), Deschatelets, Fergusson, Forsey, Gélinas, Hicks, Lafond, Neiman, O'Leary, Quart, Sullivan and Yuzyk.

He said: Honourable senators, I shall not take much time to discuss this motion. At the outset I should like to apologize to the Senate for the fact that this has been on the Order Paper for a considerable length of time, although this is due to circumstances beyond my control. I might also add that the subject matter of this motion is neither a burning one nor a momentous issue to place before Parliament at the moment.

Honourable senators will remember that a few years ago a project was completed in the House of Commons whereby the windows of that chamber were filled with stained glass. The theme for that project centered around the floral emblems of each of the provinces and territories. I think I can safely say that it has been generally agreed that that project could be described as being appropriate, dignified and beautiful.

As many senators are aware, the authorities in charge of matters of this kind are now considering a similar project involving the 11 windows in the upper walls of this chamber, in other words in the clerestory. I spoke on this subject on April 4, 1974, and in the discussion which followed mention was made by various senators of the importance of this chamber. It was stated that if stained glass windows were to be installed here, they should embody a particular theme and should be appropriate to and in harmony with the other features of the chamber itself. The view was also expressed that senators themselves should be able to make a contribution to the development of the project rather than find themselves confronted by a proposal or even by a definite installation which they might not be able to change.

In this motion I have restricted the proposal to an inquiry with reference to the installation of stained glass in the windows, whereas in our earlier discussions I referred to changes that might some day be made in the Throne area. Other senators referred particularly to the pictures which are presently on our walls. It seems to me, however, that one project is sufficient for a group of senators to undertake at one time, particularly when it is an important problem, such as this. Should the motion be approved, I am sure the committee would prefer to sit at times when it would not interfere with the important work of our standing committees and other special committees. Also, if the motion is approved, I suggest that the committee should consider a number of aspects of this subject.

First of all, it should examine where the authority lies to make these fairly extensive changes within this chamber. Then it should discuss the theme of the windows, and on that point I am sure many ideas will be expressed by various committee members. For example, there could be a recommendation that significant milestones in parliamentary history, either generally or with respect to Canada, might be an appropriate theme for the windows. Another suggestion might have to do with the bicameral aspects of Parliament, or a geographic theme for Canada may be put forward.

In my opinion, the most appropriate type of theme would be historical, touching mainly the early history of this country. During the earlier discussion in which I participated, I thought that the work of the discoverers and explorers of this country might be a highly appropriate theme for the windows in this chamber. We should adopt a theme in which there is a closed universe of discourse. For example, if we embarked upon a theme dealing with Prime Ministers or Governors General of Canada, we would have an open end. This would probably result in many beautiful windows, but the time would come when we would run out of space for Prime Ministers.

Any committee, to do a responsible job of work, should consult with experts—and in this case it would be experts on stained glass. We are very fortunate in these buildings to have the services of Miss Eleanor Milne, who was really in charge of the work done in the House of Commons and who is in charge, as honourable senators all know, of the carving that is continuing in this building. I suppose the committee should form some idea, also, of the contractual side of the project. In that respect the committee would probably call upon officials of the Department of Public Works.

Since an historical theme would be of great importance, or certainly worthy of careful consideration, we should enlist the services of good Canadian historians. There may also be experts in other categories to whom we should pay some attention. We may have to consider the views of artists. Also, if a committee is appointed, I believe it should discuss an appropriate timing for the project, and consider whether or not this is the appropriate time to incur an expenditure of this kind. A recommendation from the committee would be valid, even if the project could not be proceeded with at once.

I had thought originally that this matter should not be referred to a special or select committee but rather to the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. However, on considering the points that I have mentioned this afternoon, I felt that this investigation is a little broader than the work conducted by the members of that committee. Their task is a more immediate one and concerns day-to-day housekeeping problems. They might not thank the Senate for foisting a problem like this upon them.

If the Senate should approve the motion, I would ask, without my making a formal amendment to the motion, that by unanimous consent the name of Senator Thompson be added to the list of senators proposed to serve on this committee.

Senator Flynn: No comment from the Leader of the Government?

Senator Croll: A comment from you.

Senator Flynn: This matter involves the government to a large extent, and I'm sure that the majority of senators would like to hear from Senator Perrault.

Senator Perrault: No response at this time.

Senator Flynn: Why don't you move the adjournment?

Senator Langlois: Why don't you do it yourself?

Senator Flynn: On behalf of Senator Perrault, I move the adjournment.

Senator Perrault: He can speak for himself.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that the name of Senator Thompson be added to the list of senators to serve on the proposed committee?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion, as modified?

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, before moving the adjournment of the Senate, I should like to remind you that, as indicated by the numerous notices we have received in the mail, the work of the Senate for this week is centred mainly in the committees. A heavy schedule of committee work is in store for us this week.

Following the visit this afternoon of the Right Honourable Harold Wilson, Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will sit in Room 356-S to deal with Bill S-19, to amend the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Criminal Code. It is an organizational meeting and will be held in camera.

I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, the Deputy Leader of the Government has referred to the work of committees. I wonder if the Leader of the Government will again give consideration to setting up some guidelines, or rules, in order that we shall not continue to have, as we have this week, a conflict arising because of the number of committees sitting.

At the moment it seems that the chairman of any committee who wishes to call a meeting can do so. This matter has been discussed before. There was, I thought, a consensus that any chairman wishing to call a meeting would consult with the Director of Committees in order that the matter might be regulated.

This matter is very important to us on this side of the house, because we are few in number. Many of us are on four or five committees—of necessity, and not because we want to be on them. I again suggest that we should have some rule or guideline laid down by the Leader of the Government to avoid a continual recurrence of this situation. We have had assurances in the past, but apparently nothing has been done—certainly nothing effective. I again ask that some action be taken.

● (1430)

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, shortly before the Senate adjourned in December I announced that, as a result of discussions between my leader and the Leader of the Opposition, it had been decided to form a steering committee, comprised of honourable senators from both sides of the house, to arrange the future work of Senate committees. It is my intention to call a meeting of that committee for some time next week, and it is my hope that that committee will do the kind of work that Senator Grosart has in mind.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, before the Senate adjourns I should like to rise on a point of privilege. It is in connection with the information the Senate is now getting. Yesterday we were told by Her Honour the Speaker that messages had been received from the House of Commons with Bills C-39 and C-29, both of which were then read the first time. We have not yet received copies of those bills. Today Madam Speaker told us that another message has been received with Bill C-40, and we have not got that bill.

In response to my inquiry I was told that the text of Bill C-39 will reach us tomorrow, and that Bill C-29 has not yet been printed. I think that is the story. I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether we could discuss our internal arrangements in an effort to rectify this situation and ensure that we have copies of all bills as soon as they come forward.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will initiate inquiries and do what I can to expedite the production of these bills. I realize this is a matter of importance to all honourable senators.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN SENATE MEMBERSHIP

Senator Macdonald, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1) (i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Quart be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Asselin on the list of senators serving on the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that house accordingly.

The Hon. the Speaker: The house has heard the motion, which cannot be proceeded with without unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1) (g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, February 4, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, before the question is put I should like to give, as usual, a brief outline of the program for the next week.

First, I shall deal with the work of committees. On Tuesday the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs will meet at 3.30 p.m. to continue its study of Canada's relations with the United States. The Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will meet at 8 p.m.

Also on Tuesday, at 2 p.m. the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will commence its examination of Bill S-19, to amend the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Criminal Code. The Minister of National Health and Welfare will appear at that meeting together with officials of the department. I am informed by Senator Goldenberg, the chairman, that it is his intention to hold meetings of the committee on Tuesdays, both morning and afternoon, until examination of the bill is completed.

On Wednesday morning the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will continue its study of competition in Canada and of the Combines Investigation Act. The Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will meet again on Thursday at 9.30 a.m. and at the same time the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance will proceed with its examination of the Manpower Division of the Department of Manpower and Immigration.

With respect to our work in the chamber, we will continue the debate on the second reading of Bill C-39, to amend the Customs Tariff (No. 2), and proceed to second reading of Bill C-29, respecting Canadian business corporations, and Bill C-40, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act. In addition, Senator Deschatelets will open the debate on the inquiry standing in his name.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, might I ask the Acting Leader of the Government if we could adopt the practice of having this information, which in fact is an agenda for the next week's business, mailed to senators at their home addresses? Sometimes when a senator is away for a day or a week, unless he sees our printed proceedings, which may give some indication, he has no information as to what business the Senate is going to deal with the following week. Mailing this information to senators as soon as it is available would facilitate the planning of our week, and it might also help to improve our attendance.

Senator Langlois: In voicing his suggestion the honourable senator omitted to say if he wanted such statements mailed to the home addresses of honourable senators, or to their mailing addresses here in Ottawa.

Some Hon. Senators: To their home addresses.

Senator Molson: I said "home addresses."

Senator Langlois: I see no objection to adopting that practice. Of course, it would be impossible to do it today, but we can start next week. We will see if this can be done.

Senator Prowse: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Acting Leader of the Government if consideration could be given to calling a meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Standing Rules and Orders to consider changing the present time of sitting on Wednesdays from 2 o'clock to 3 o'clock.

The time of sitting was changed from 3 o'clock to 2 o'clock with the idea of accommodating senators who had booked flights home on Thursdays. The earlier sitting allows them to attend to their work in the chamber and still catch their flights. As to Wednesday, however, many of us, on both sides of the house, would like to attend caucus. If a senator is a member of more than one committee he is precluded from attending caucus because many committee meetings are scheduled for Wednesday mornings. On the other hand, if the Senate were to sit at 3 o'clock on Wednesdays senators would be able to attend caucus, and it would be possible for committees to sit between 1 o'clock and 3 o'clock on those days to take care of the many routine references to committee.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, there is certainly no objection to considering the suggestion just made. Since the chairman of the committee concerned is in his seat, and heard the suggestion, I am sure he will be ready to discuss it with me at the next opportunity.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask the acting leader if there is a chairman of that committee?

Senator Langlois: There used to be one.

Senator Grosart: Yes, but I am asking if there is one now, and, as a supplementary, if there is any reason why that committee has not been reconstituted.

Senator Langlois: I do not think there is any doubt that there was such a person as a chairman, but it might be appropriate to ascertain whether he was re-elected for this session. Unless my memory is failing, he was, and I would be very pleased to discuss it with him.

Senator Grosart: But my question is: Has that committee been reconstituted in this session; and if not, why not?

Senator Langlois: From memory I cannot say, so I cannot be positive, but I am going to discuss the matter with the former chairman. With regard to whether the committee has been reconstituted, there has been no need so far this session to re-activate this committee, but it can be done at the next opportune moment.

Senator Grosart: Might I suggest to the acting leader that there is every reason for that committee to be reconstituted, because it is required under our rules to keep the rules under constant consideration.

Senator Walker: And may I add that never have we had a more able chairman. We are lucky to have his services. I think the committee should be reconstituted, and that he should be the chairman.

Senator Langlois: I agree with you entirely.

Senator Flynn: Would the former chairman identify himself?

Motion agreed to.

[Later:]

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, a short while ago, when Senator Grosart asked me whether or not the Standing Rules and Orders Committee had been constituted, my memory failed me and I could not reply in either the affirmative or negative. I have now been informed that the committee has been selected, but the organization meeting to elect a chairman has not yet taken place.

Senator Flynn: Is there any reason for that?

Senator Petten: Perhaps I might be allowed to answer that question. I have been remiss in my duties as Whip in not calling an organization meeting. I shall remedy this oversight immediately.

Senator Flynn: I would say that is the most reassuring explanation we could have.

CUSTOMS TARIFF, (NO. 2)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Senator Cook moved the second reading of Bill C-39, to amend the Customs Tariff, (No. 2).

He said: Honourable senators, this is not a complicated bill. It is, however, full of a great deal of detail. Furthermore, the background to the bill is also full of details which are not too easy to explain clearly and concisely. The bill and its background are therefore matters, I would respectfully suggest, to be considered and studied more fully by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, to which committee I shall move that the bill be sent if it is given second reading.

Having said that, I shall now endeavour, with the forbearance and patience of honourable senators, to give a brief explanation of this legislation. In short it is a relieving measure whereby duties on imports of an estimated value of $1 billion will be reduced by an estimated total of $65 million a year.

The history of the bill is this. In the budget of February 19, 1973, tariff reductions were proposed on a broad range of consumer products for an initial period of one year. The February 19, 1973 proposal was approved by the Senate and given royal assent in July, 1973. The legislation provided that these temporary tariff reductions would expire on February 19, 1974.

On January 10, 1974 the Minister of Finance tabled a Notice of Ways and Means Motion proposing that most of these temporary reductions be continued until June 30, 1974. The tariff reductions on sugar and related products, which were based on recommendations by the Tariff Board were, however, to be extended until June 30, 1976.

The session ended before the Notice of Ways and Means Motion could be dealt with and the tariff reductions were reintroduced in a new notice of March 1, 1974. This motion became Bill C-21 and received first reading in the other place on April 8, 1974. That bill, of course, lapsed when Parliament was dissolved last May.

On October 1, 1974 a new Notice of Ways and Means Motion was tabled by the minister; this new notice was the same as the March 1, 1974 notice. These proposals came before us recently as Bill C-27 and were passed by the Senate in November.

In the meantime other events had taken place. In his May 6 budget, the minister had proposed that the temporary tariff reductions, which were to expire on June 30, 1974, be extended to December 31 of last year. This proposal, being part of a budget on which the government was defeated, could not be maintained in effect. Therefore, on July 1, 1974, the rates of duty under all tariff items listed in schedule I of Bill C-27 reverted to the levels in effect before February 20, 1973.

In a statement issued on May 9, the Minister of Finance said that it was the government's intention, if re-elected, to ask Parliament to enact legislation implementing the proposals contained in the May 6 budget. He further indicated that the amendments to the Customs Tariff would not be applied retroactively; instead, the new rates would become effective on dates to be proposed at the time the measures were reintroduced in Parliament.

In his November 18 budget, the minister proposed the reintroduction of most of the temporary tariff reductions, these reductions to apply from November 19, 1974 to June 30, 1976. Economic conditions, of course, are somewhat different now from what they were in May. Because of this, because of the longer period involved and because of the coming into effect on July 1, 1974 of the Canadian system of tariff preferences for the goods of developing countries, a number of products which were covered by the May 6 proposal are not included in the present bill.

The preferential rates for developing countries, known as the General Preferential Tariff, are equal to the British Preferential Tariff rates or to the Most-Favoured-Nation Tariff rates reduced by one-third, whichever is the lower. Clause 2(2) of the bill provides that where the one-third reduction rule applies, it will continue to apply on the basis of the pre-budget rates of duty and not on the basis of the rates set out in schedule II of the bill.

Some of the products which are not in the bill are related to the current slowdown in construction, particularly in the housing sector in both Canada and the United States; among these are such goods as plywood, furniture, large household electric appliances, house trailers and mobile homes. Luggage, toys and batteries are excluded because of the reduced rates which were introduced for these products from developing countries as of July 1.

Live hogs, fresh lamb and mutton, fresh pork and other meat products were not included because of current difficulties in the market for meats. Raisins and currants were left out of the present proposal, and the British Preferential rate on meat extracts was reduced to free following representations from the Australian government for restoration of the margins of preference on these products. The margins of preference are the difference between the rates which apply under the Most-Favoured-Nation Tariff and those which apply on our imports from Australia. A number of Canadian exports to Australia receive preferential treatment in exchange for our maintaining margins of preference on Australian exports.

The list of products covered by this bill was carefully examined to ensure that these temporary reductions would not have any serious effects on production and employment in Canada. However, as a safeguard measure, the minister is again asking Parliament to provide the government with the necessary authority to restore by order in council the pre-budget rates of duty on any particular product where circumstances warrant such action.

The other tariff provisions included in the May 6 budget, which are of a miscellaneous nature, are covered by clause 1 and schedule I to the bill. I am sure all honourable senators will be pleased to note the increases in the so-called "tourist exemptions." The quarterly exemption from duty and tax available after a 48-hour absence is doubled from $25 to $50. The annual exemption is increased from $100 to $150 and the minimum period of absence is reduced from 12 days to 7 days. While many Canadians would undoubtedly like to see these duty- and tax-free exemptions raised even more, higher exemptions could well lead to the resumption on a large scale of combined pleasure and shopping trips to neighbouring cities across the border. These trips were quite popular years ago when our exemptions were at the $100 level after an absence of 48 hours. Imports under the exemptions are quite substantial. In 1973 over four million exemptions were claimed on imports valued at over $110 million.

Lastly, there is another proposal in the bill which will allow the government to provide for the duty-free entry of bona fide handicraft products from developing countries.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 4, at 8 p.m.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Senator Macdonald, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Sullivan be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Choquette on the list of Senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS TARIFF, (NO. 2)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, January 30, the debate on the motion of Senator Cook for the second reading of Bill C-39, to amend the Customs Tariff, (No. 2).

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, in introducing this bill the sponsor, Senator Cook, gave us a broad outline of the implications of the proposed amendments. He said the bill "is not complicated but is full of detail," which I think is a fair description. It consists of merely three clauses with a number of subclauses, and two schedules. However, I must say that some part of the clauses, as well as some part of the schedules, enact legislation and reflect government policy, and in some cases innovations in government policy, so I feel it is my duty to draw the attention of the Senate to these as I see them.

The bill, as usual, in reducing existing tariffs, covers a wide range of commodities from pretzels to typewriters, peanut butter to aircraft and aircraft engines, records to skis and golf clubs, bicycles to fruits and vegetables, and so on.

We are told that this will make an important contribution to the war against inflation. Personally, I am not quite sure how it is going to do that, although, as Senator Cook pointed out, it involves approximately $1 billion worth of imports and, as he has told us, the reduction in tariff charges will amount to about $65 million.

One thing that always concerns me about these customs tariff bills or customs bills is that we are never given an explanation of exactly how each of these items is going to achieve the purpose for which it is included in the bill.

I have mentioned a few of the commodities. Obviously, some of them are made or grown in Canada and some are not. But nowhere have I yet seen in this bill, or in preceding bills of its kind, an explanation by anyone as to the categories into which each of the many items—and there are hundreds of them here—fall. I would suggest that in future, or perhaps in the committee to which Senator Cook has said the bill will be referred, we might seek some further information. It is not just enough to list a whole host of items and then say, “these will do the job,” because they are so disparate in nature that surely the public and parliamentarians have a right to have a more specific understanding of the intention of the government in making each of these tariff reductions.

One would ask, assuming that the purpose is to contain inflation, will these tariff reductions be passed on to the public? Will they result in lower prices or at least contain rising prices? Again we have no indication of which ones will and which ones will not do that. There has to be a suspicion that the purpose of some of these tariff reductions is to place some pressure on existing prices. If that is so, then Parliament should be advised; but nowhere in the presentation of this bill has, to my knowledge, any such information been given to Parliament. Nevertheless, Parliament has always jealously guarded its right to legislate changes in the customs tariff. That is part of our heritage. The general rule, as I understand it, is that any formal change in tariff charges can only be made through a financial bill preceded by a budget and a Ways and Means Motion.

I will have something further to say about that in a moment, because there are some items in the bill before us that do not seem, in my judgment, to conform to that general rule.

We are also told that there is a longer time extension in this more or less temporary bill than was anticipated in the May budget, the fate of which is well known to all honourable members. We are told that one of the reasons for extending these reductions to June 30, 1976, is to implement the General Preferential Tariff that was introduced in July. It is my feeling, on reading the bill, that there is a very serious failure on the part of Canada to honour some of the commitments it made at that time. This bill, in effect, amends that bill without so saying.

● (2010)

In clause 3(3) the usual authority is given to the Governor in Council to revert to the earlier rates in particular circumstances. This has been in bills before. The earlier date is, I think, November 19, 1974. The Governor in Council is authorized in specific circumstances to revert to the rates at that date, but, except in what I consider to be certain aberrations in this bill, not otherwise.

To illustrate these general remarks I will comment, if I may, on only three items in the bill. If honourable senators wish to follow me, they are 69615-1, on page 4; 70310-1 on page 5; and 87500-1 on page 6.

The first item, which is in schedule I on page 4, 69615-1, is a tariff reduction covering motion picture films, sound or silent, separate sound film track, slides or slide films, positive or negative, and sound recordings for use therewith, and so on, which are of an educational, scientific or cultural character within the meaning of the Agreement for Facilitating the International Circulation of Visual and Auditory Materials of an Educational, Scientific and Cultural Character adopted at Beirut, Lebanon, in 1948.

This was a UNESCO convention, the purpose of which was, of course, to facilitate and liberalize—my friends opposite will like that term—the distribution of educational, scientific and cultural materials in this era. We signed that convention, and we are now told that the policy of Canada will be, in respect to these items, that only under such regulations as the minister may prescribe they will come in free. We signed a convention saying that they will come in free, and now we renege on that and say, “If the minister feels like it, or if the minister agrees that they should come in free, then we will let them come in free, regardless of the convention and regardless of any international undertaking we may have made.”

I should say that there is a reason for this. It has been found that because the convention requires only a statement by the host country, or an appropriate government agency, that if these do come under this UNESCO convention, they can come in free. We have had some problems with regard to material that certainly was not contemplated by the convention. We have had some obscene and scurrilous literature, and so on, coming in, and the government decided that something should be done about it. I do not disagree with that, but I have grave reservations as to whether the way to do it is that contained in this bill, namely, to say that, regardless of what is in the convention, we are now going to use our own discretion. I say that because the convention is very clear, that the whole authority lies with the host country to decide whether free import of materials into another country is to be permitted regardless of the convention.

The spokesmen for the government have made it very clear that under the convention as it stands the department has no choice but to accept the entry, if certified by the government or appropriate agency, and, again, the convention provides no discretion.

I have raised some doubts as to the propriety, in international relations, of our conduct in this regard. On the other hand, I have no sympathy whatsoever with our position in regard to any UNESCO convention. This may surprise some senators, but I think the time has come for us to take this kind of stance about UNESCO, although I do not think this is the right way to take it. Most of us have over the years regarded UNESCO as a vital and important arm of the United Nations Organization—one which, by and large, has done a very good job—but suddenly as of last November UNESCO has, in my view, completely destroyed its credibility and capability to carry out its task or to do any good whatever in this very important field. I am sure that all honourable senators are aware of what I am referring to. In this connection I should like to quote from the Montreal Star of January 7, referring to that November decision, where it says:

In the past few weeks the dissatisfaction with UNESCO's flagrantly political gambit has spread. A large body of scientific and artistic opinion has threatened to withdraw its services to the various UNESCO committees; Switzerland has reduced its annual support by 10 per cent, and other nations may follow; and in Washington, Congress has voted to suspend U.S.

financial aid. All this because the international agency, or more precisely the pro-Arab bloc within UNESCO, acted in clear violation of its charter.

Here I would add that it is not only the Arab bloc but also the Communist bloc.

The EEC countries, with one exception, voted to accept Israel as a member of the European group. Pope Paul has lent his voice to the restoration of UNESCO's real philosophy of educational, social and cultural assistance. No "political" manoeuvring can ever supplant that universally admired mandate.

This is the kind of organization to which we find ourselves committed by convention. I commend the government for the stand it has taken, if not for the way it has taken it. In these remarks I am referring, of course, to the decision of UNESCO to exclude the State of Israel from its European group, and to cut off financial aid to Israel in spite of the fact that the contribution of Israel to UNESCO was much greater than the mere $26,000 it was receiving.

I feel sure that all honourable senators will agree that the time has come for this situation in which UNESCO has become involved to be brought to the attention of the Senate and, it is to be hoped, to the public of Canada generally as it has been done so well by our media.

I turn now, if I may, to tariff item 70310-1 to be found in schedule I on page 5 of the bill. My comment on this will be brief, as Senator Cook explained it thoroughly in introducing the bill. This refers to the increase in the permissible tax-free importation that returning Canadians may make. The tax-free amount that may be claimed once per year has been raised from $100 to $150. The period spent abroad has been reduced from twelve to seven days. The quarterly concession has been raised from $25 to $50 for a forty-eight hour stay, and there has been a minor change in the $10 limit, which is merely casual. It is interesting to note that the sponsor in introducing this bill for the government said that this was nothing more than a recognition of the increase in the rate of inflation.

The next item is on page 6 and is numbered 87500-1. This refers to handicrafts coming particularly from developing countries. The situation here is that when we passed, somewhat less than a year ago, the General Preferential Tariff, we said that we were now permitting certain products of developing countries into Canada tax-free.

Included in these, of course, were handicrafts, which are important to many developing countries. They are very important factors in their total export to countries such as ours. The bill before us now gives the minister extraordinary powers. It gives him the power to allow entry of these products under such regulations as he may prescribe.

I am sure there are honourable senators here who recall that in 1961 there was a quite famous debate in this chamber on this very matter—the discretionary powers of the minister in the customs tariff field. Indeed, in the discussions which have taken place—and this may interest honourable senators—the leading Conservative spokesman, the financial critic of the Conservatives in the other place, actually quoted Senator Hayden on that occasion, favourably and with approbation. He said Senator Hayden had taken the position that he was always in favour of an appeal and was against any situation in which an appeal was denied where it might normally lie. What has happened, of course, is that we passed an act last July saying we will grant General Preferential Tariff conditions to these developing countries, and now we come along and say no, only to the items that the minister allows in. The excuse given—and I have to call it an excuse, because it is not a reason—is that it is very hard to define handicrafts. Someone may be sending in machine-made Eskimo artifacts, and therefore the minister must be given this discretion.

The definition of handicrafts is given and I suggest to honourable senators that it could not be more explicit. It speaks of the benefits of the General Preferential Tariff and continues "when certified by the government of the country of production". That is one of the conditions. They must be certified by the government of that country as genuine handicrafts, "or by any other authority in the country of production recognized by the minister as competent for that purpose." They must "be handicraft products with traditional or artistic characteristics that are typical of the geographical region where produced," and they must "have acquired their essential characteristic by the handiwork of individual craftsmen". Yet we are told over and over again by government spokesmen that we must watch these manufactured products.

The definition is so clear, and I wonder why the minister wants this particular authority. It is without precedent, although there have been suggestions that there are precedents. I have examined the precedents and, in my view, not one of them covers this situation. In the Customs Tariff and the Customs Act there are discretions given which have been accepted, and which are generally understandable. The minister has discretion in cases where imports are used for processing. They shall not be sold to the public, but used only as an ingredient in further processing in Canada. There is a precedent where the government, when it is negotiating concessional tariff agreements, may use its discretion to obtain a concession from another country in the matter of Canadian exports going to that country. There is an example of that in this bill with regard to some of our exports to Australia and imports from Australia.

Now, for the first time, so far as I can find, the minister is asked to go beyond that and to say that in this case he may decide what commodities may be imported from which country. I suggest that this is completely contrary to the broad general concept that it is Parliament which legislates in this sensitive area. I might call it a policy of creeping precedents, because we go on from one to another, and surely at some time in the future someone will say that Parliament agreed to giving the minister discretion far beyond anything ever contemplated in the act. Then they will say, "Because Parliament, the House of Commons and the Senate, agreed to it one day in February 1975, it is a precedent and we can go on from that." If we go on from that, in effect we have destroyed Parliament's control completely, in my view, of custom tariff items.

There is another aspect. This refers back to the General Preferential Tariff Agreement, where we said to developing countries, "We will let certain of your products in—not free but", we said, "at the lower of the British Preferential Tariff, the Most-Favoured-Nation Tariff, less one-third".

We were being very generous because we are one of those countries which are sensitive to the needs of developing nations and we get a very good press because of that, despite the fact that our history is not very good in this whole area of what outside of Canada is called universal preferential tariffs. We resisted them for many years and drew the fire and antagonism—and to some extent the enmity—of many countries. We finally relented a year ago under pressure and said, "From here in this is the rate: the lower of those two less one-third."

Now, under this bill, believe it or not, we say we have reduced tariffs in a number of items to a new rate effective November 19, 1974, but these new rates will not apply to the products we allow to enter under the act of last July. They must come under the previous rates, not the rates that we are establishing here generally for all commodities.

So, clearly we are reneging on what appeared to be a generous change of heart in respect to developing countries. It is very hard for me to understand why the Government of Canada would, for the small inconsequential amounts involved, put themselves in the position of reneging on a position we took belatedly, under international pressure. Why? I do not know.

Honourable senators, I am raising a few questions here in the hope that some of them will be raised when the minister or his officials come before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I am not a member of that committee and I usually find that I have another commitment at the time the committee sits. But it is one of our most distinguished committees. I would hope that some of these questions might be raised just so that we could have at least an explanation. I am not suggesting that there may not be explanations, but they have not been given so far. These questions have been raised without, in my view, adequate answers, and I would suggest that the Senate, particularly that committee, might do another of its very useful jobs by obtaining such information which, I am sure, many parliamentarians and members of the Canadian public would like to have.

There are also some omissions from the commodities which were included in the May budget and the legislation that would have been subsequent had the election not intervened. I find these a bit surprising, because they are mostly in the field of building supplies—plywood, and so forth. I am sure there is a reason, but it seems strange to me that a bill which is intended importantly—that is the word used—to reduce inflation should leave out the important component of building materials. It may be that this was done to protect the Canadian industry. I do not know. However, I would hope that there would be an explanation, and certainly I would hope that we would have some kind of explanation as to the reason for tying these General Preferential Tariffs to what are non-existing tariffs. This, to me, is the extraordinary thing about it. These tariffs do not exist. They have been reduced, and we say in this bill that as far as developing nations are concerned, their rates will be based on a Canadian tariff that has ceased to exist.

I trust these questions may be discussed, as I am sure they will, and I hope we will have adequate answers.

Senator Cook: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if Senator Cook speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Cook: Honourable senators, I do not think it is necessary for me to say anything further except to thank Senator Grosart for his usual helpful and penetrating remarks, and to again point out that we all agree with the principle of the bill, which is to reduce taxes. I am sure that in committee the questions which Senator Grosart has posed will be discussed and, hopefully, answered.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Senator Cook, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

CANADA BUSINESS CORPORATIONS BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the second reading of Bill C-29, respecting Canadian business corporations.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-29 provides a new basis of law applicable to the incorporation of business corporations under an act of the federal Parliament. There is no provision in this bill for non-profit corporations, such as you have in the existing Canada Corporations Act. The statement has been made, however, that there will be presented currently a new bill dealing with non-profit corporations, and I am told that a comprehensive report was published in June of last year on that very subject.

Bill C-29 applies to companies that are incorporated after it comes into force. Existing companies incorporated under the Canada Corporations Act, which is presently the law governing federal companies, will have five years in which to apply for a continuance of their incorporation. If they do so, a certificate of continuance will be issued by the director, and they will then become subject to the provisions of the statute which is now identified as Bill C-29.

I must say, first of all, that in my view this bill is an excellent one, and one which marks a notable advance in the position of federally incorporated business corporations. It is clear, it is practical, and it is comprehensive. That does not mean, of course, that I give it my unqualified blessing, because in some particulars I may find it necessary later to call the attention of the Senate to certain things in it which I think should be further considered, and which may require some change. However, I think the plan that was followed in the preparation of this bill was one to simplify the procedures, and to develop a modern corporate approach to this question of business corporations. If I may say so, I think it was intended, and, indeed, appears to be designed, to conform to the Ontario Business Corporations Act, which represents a modern approach in corporate procedures.

We may again—and perhaps reasonably soon—have to look at this bill which it is now proposed we enact into law, because I understand there is on the drawing boards in Ontario a new corporations act to deal with business corporations. Corporate operations, corporate approaches, have developed rapidly, and have done so along the lines of simplicity in approach, and simplicity to the extent that within the corporation, by virtue of what the statute says, you may find the necessary authority in the directors and shareholders to carry out their plans and designs in the best interests of carrying on the business of the corporation. This is a principle that is recognized in this bill, and I will later have something to say about the role of the majority as recognized in connection with the formalities that must be followed in order to effect fundamental changes in the constitution of the corporation.

Then there is also recognition given to the minority position. If the minority shareholders dissent in relation to some things, particularly any fundamental change having to do with classes of shares, and rights and privileges attaching thereto, the dissent is recorded. A minority shareholder having recorded his dissent then has what is called an appraisal right, and he is entitled to demand that the company pay him and permit him to withdraw his capital on the basis of the appraised value of those shares at the time this fundamental change was carried through by a majority vote.

I may as well go on to summarize very briefly what happens if a fundamental change is proposed, and a majority vote carries through that fundamental change. There are only some instances in which the appraisal right is an effective right. In other cases, where there can be brought forward evidence of fraud or impropriety, or something not in the best interests of the company or the shareholders, or somebody in the majority trying to get some special advantage for himself, there is what is called an oppression remedy. An oppression remedy means that the shareholder who feels aggrieved may go to the courts and have the courts intervene. He can have a full hearing, and the courts have authority to decide whether there is foundation to his complaint, or whether there is not. If there is not, the court has power to make certain orders, which are to be found in the bill.

Coming back to the incorporation of a company under Bill C-29, I should tell you first that this bill has not been rushed into. It has been, I suppose you might say, on drawing boards in some form or other for perhaps three, four or five years. There was a task force, and in 1971 there were published two volumes entitled Proposals for a New Business Corporations Law for Canada. Following that a bill was introduced in the last session, Bill C-213, which died on the Order Paper. Following that, submissions were made by people who were still concerned about some provisions in Bill C-213. They recorded their objections, a number of which—some of them to very important provisions in the bill—were given effect to and changes were made. Thus there are changes as between Bill C-213 and the present bill, Bill C-29.

The then minister had undertaken that he would publish a detailed background paper, by which he would correlate—I call it a concordat; you can give it any name you like—the Canada Business Corporations bill, so that if you want to get in substance what the law is, and also the substance of the proposals, it is developed in this background paper in considerable detail, and the changes are emphasized. There one will find also the correlation I have referred to, the various clauses and what they relate to under Bill C-213, and also the correlation of that to the corresponding clauses in this bill, Bill C-29. Therefore, one has a pretty complete background for an approach, study and examination of Bill C-29.

I should also tell you that I think the Senate should be—and I know it is—pretty well informed on the provisions of the present law, the Canada Corporations Act, because that act was passed in 1970. On it we had a great number of hearings in the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, with the minister present at all times, and with representatives of the Department of Justice present. We finally made a report, which recommended 26 changes, many of them substantial, to the Canada Corporations bill, as it then was. Before we made our report, all those changes were agreed to by the minister at that time. Therefore, to a considerable extent we have a responsibility for what I will call the improvements in the Canada Corporations Act of 1970. We have now in 1975 a bill that proposes to simplify and modernize the corporate approach, parallelling—these are my words—to the extent feasible the more up to date and modern provisions of the Ontario Business Corporations Act.

Having said that, I must tell you the principles. If you are fearful that this volume is going to be pawed over by me tonight you can dismiss those fears right away. I have done all my pawing over this bill, and I am telling you what I think is important in it. In any event, I do not think it is any part of the work of the sponsor on second reading of a bill to deal with it in detail, clause by clause. I think we should try to extract principles, and if there are new things in the bill we should call attention to them. If there are some things in the bill that, even as the sponsor, I think require some change or correction, then I regard it as part of my duty to call attention to those things. In any event, I propose to call attention to them.

The important changes are these. Under Bill C-29 we shall get into the era of registration of incorporations, and completely away from the idea of letters patent corporations. If I might summarize the important changes, I would say they are these. Incorporation under Bill C-29 is a matter of right. In other words, you file your material, and the director can do nothing but grant it and register it if you have not violated any of the prohibitions in the statute. Heretofore, of course, the letters patent were the basis for incorporation, and that made the grant of the incorporation a privilege, pursuant to some government prerogative. That will disappear under this bill. Thus, administration is generally in accordance with the expressed rules or standards, and not at discretion. You will recall I gave an illustration of that in connection with “appraisal right” and “oppression remedy,” where the will of the majority is recognized under the statute. But then care is taken under the bill to deal with minority rights, recognizing that they also have a position.

The formalities of incorporation are rather simple. One or more individuals may incorporate by signing articles of incorporation, and forwarding the same to the director. Then they must attach to that certain documents that are specified. There is no objects clause. The corporation incorporated under Bill C-29 has all the rights, powers and privileges of a natural person. Accordingly, the ultra vires doctrine is of no effect, and such corporation may pursue any lawful object unless its business activities are restricted by its articles of incorporation.

This is significant, and on page 8 of the bill the form of the application for incorporation sets out some of the details to be included. You will notice that there is no place for objects as such. You do have to give your name, of course, so as to be identified; you do have to indicate a place within Canada where your registered office is; you do have to indicate the classes of shares and the rights and privileges, et cetera, that attach to those; and, if the transfer of shares is to be restricted, you have to indicate that. With regard to the number of directors you have to indicate a minimum which is required—that is, if it is a company which may in any way be involved in the distribution of shares to the public, then you cannot have a number of directors less than three, but the maximum can be whatever you provide in your application for incorporation.

In that connection, I should say, too, that all the shares, regardless of class, are non-assessable and must be without par value. This brings to mind a point I wanted to make, that even in preferred shares and the various classes with different rights and responsibilities, where there is provision for redemption, the redemption can be stipulated as a fixed amount, because, obviously, your shares have no par value.

On the question of dividends, there are problems in connection with stating how the dividends may be declared. Under this act the simple way would be to fix the dividends in a dollar amount, because of the fact that you have no par value shares. Or, in your incorporation, you stipulate that the rate of dividend shall be calculated on the issue price of the shares and then you can get to a percentage.

I should point out, too, that there is a provision in this bill that, in respect of the consideration that is received for the shares which are issued, all that consideration must be carried under a heading of "stated capital." You do not have those characteristics of paid-in capital, capital surplus or the description which applies when you may issue some of your shares at a premium. So this is the reason for having to follow the manner which I have described in dealing with redemption.

If a company is going to distribute any part of its shares to the public, it must have a minimum of three directors, two of whom cannot be employees or officers of an affiliate or subsidiary company. Moreover, the majority of the directors must be resident Canadians. In addition, a private company may be incorporated with one shareholder. That is a provision which presently exists in the Ontario Business Corporations Act.

Much of this is detailed, but it is basic, and that is why I have gone into it in this fashion.

The directors, of course, will not be able to resist claims that are made against the corporation by innocent third parties. They will not be able to cite provisions in the constitution against that, because there is no such thing. Everybody is responsible for what he does, and there is no such thing as an ultra vires act. You cannot say, "Well, whoever was the representative of the company did this, that or the other thing. It was an ultra vires act and he had no authority to do it."

There are provisions with respect to accounting records, and so on, and there is a provision that the company may buy its own shares. That is in the Ontario Business Corporations Act now. A limitation is that they can use only surplus for that purpose and can go only to the extent of surplus, and must be in a solvent condition at the time they do it.

When a corporation, even if it is a corporation incorporated under the Canada Corporations Act, applies for a continuance, which it must do within five years under Bill C-29 when it becomes law, if its shares, or any of its shares, are par value shares, they shall, after a certificate of continuance has been granted, be deemed to be non-par value shares.

There are provisions under which the shareholders may impose constraints on the classes of shares and on the holding of various classes of shares. This must be done in accordance with a special resolution. A special resolution such as you have in the Ontario Business Corporations Act means that two-thirds of the voting shareholders must vote for it and then it must be in accordance with regulations, and provision is made for the Governor in Council to enact certain regulations.

I have taken a little time on that because it does mark quite a substantial difference in procedure and I thought I should call your attention to it. I have before me the various sections in support of the statements which I have made to you. Rather than destroy the continuity of my explanation I chose not to refer to those sections, but I have them and I can do so if the need arises.

There are certain new aspects to this bill. For example, provision is made for receivers and managers. There has been no such provision before. The provisions are not very detailed. There are some statutory standards and a wide discretion in the courts as to qualifications, rights, powers and duties, and the position of the directors and the liquidator and the trustee in bankruptcy. It does establish that only one legal system applies, regardless of the number of jurisdictions in which the company is operating.

The shareholders have a residual power to amend bylaws and to submit general proposals. These general proposals, if they are submitted by shareholders, must, if the form in which they are presented is correct, and if they are presented within the correct time limits, be presented to all the shareholders, and the proposals may be discussed by the shareholders who have put them forward. If a vote is taken, for instance, on repealing or amending bylaws, or making another bylaw, and that is started in this form by a proposal that is put forward, then in this way you have a residual power in the shareholders to make, to amend, and to repeal bylaws.

One of the difficulties that I see is in section 140 of the bill. What that section contemplates is something new, namely, that you can have a unanimous agreement to which all the shareholders are a party, or you can have a unanimous agreement to which all the shareholders are a party, together with an outside party, who is not a shareholder but who may be a trustee. I am thinking, for instance, of voting trust agreements, and things of that kind. The situation, however, is this, that under section 140, if the unanimous agreement becomes an effective agreement, then the powers and duties of the directors are at an end, except to the extent that the unanimous agreement may save some of those powers and duties.

This presents something of a complication, because the function of directors is to manage the business and affairs of the corporation; but now, if you have a unanimous agreement of the character I have been describing, where the shareholders succeed to the authority to manage the business and affairs of the corporation, where do the directors then sit? The only provision in section 140 is that to the extent that the functions of a director are restricted, then they are relieved of those powers, rights and duties.

It seems to me, however, that there is something there that they have not spelled out. For instance, what happens with regard to the liabilities of directors? Directors are liable for wages in certain circumstances, and there are other directors' liabilities in this bill.

The bill does not say, however, that this relieving of directors of their functions extends so far as to relieve them of their liabilities. I think this is something we should take a good look at in committee because, while the directors may be sitting there by reason of the terms and conditions of the unanimous agreement, they may not have any authority which they can exercise. They sit there, they have a title, they have been elected as directors, they have liabilities under the bill, but how do they deal with those? How do you deal with the liability for wages in those circumstances? You could, of course, I would expect, make a transfer of that liability in the unanimous shareholders' agreement, but this is something I think we should have a look at.

One thing that bothers me is that where you have a voting trust agreement, and you have a third person who is not a shareholder but who becomes a trustee under that voting trust agreement, which is part of this unanimous agreement to which all the shareholders are signatories, you then have a situation where this third party could possibly be given the power of a director, because under this bill a director does not have to be a shareholder. I think, therefore, that there are things at this point in the bill, and on this particular subject, for which we should have some explanations.

There are some things that I am not going to talk about, and perhaps I should give you a list of them. They are technical provisions, such as securities registration and transfers; trust indentures; receivers; liquidators; investigations, insider trading; proxies; and take-over bids. I do not propose to talk about these because they are largely continued in substance from the present act, and therefore they are more properly examined in committee.

On the question of dividends there is no specific provision in the bill, which you find in earlier legislation, about the power of the directors to declare dividends. There is a provision which says that a corporation may pay a dividend in money or property, or by issuing fully paid shares. Then there are the exceptions, which say that you cannot do that if the effect would be to make the company insolvent, or impair its capital. I think we have to presume—and perhaps we should ask some questions on this—that the authority of the directors, when it has not been weakened, restricted or taken away from them, to manage the business and affairs of the corporation is such that there would be inherent in it the power to declare a dividend. You will not, however, find it in the bill in specific terms.

I should tell you, too, that the investigation sections have been changed, and my reaction is to say, "Well, thank God for that." Under the Canada Corporations Act, the investigation sections gave the right to make a complaint in connection with mishandling of the business of the company, et cetera, and to go through the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. This bill authorizes a court to deal with these matters, instead of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. This provision is in line with the principle that runs through the bill, that the law is largely self-enforcing through the ordinary judicial process instead of through a government tribunal.

I now come to the question of amalgamation, and I hope you will bear with me for a moment while I explain it. I do not want to be too long or to weary you on this, but, as you know, under the present act, and under this bill, where several federally incorporated companies decide to get together and enter into an amalgamation agreement, if certain procedures are followed and certain votes are taken, the net result, after you furnish all that material and the court approves it, is that a certificate may be issued which is really a sort of letters patent for an amalgamated company; but the wording of the statute is that the amalgamating companies are continued in the amalgamated company.

There is a famous case that went through to the Supreme Court of Canada, which handed down its judgment in 1974, I believe—the Black & Decker case. What happened in that case was that a number of Ontario companies got together and entered into an amalgamation agreement, one of the companies being Black & Decker. The amalgamation having been completed, a certificate of amalgamation was issued, and about a year later the Department of Justice preferred charges under certain provisions of the Combines Investigation Act having to do with resale price maintenance. The defence was made that the amalgamating corporations had ceased to exist, and the courts in Ontario, right through to the Court of Appeal, held that the proceedings could not go ahead because those amalgamating corporations had gone into the amalgamated corporation and had ceased to exist. In the amalgamation the liabilities and the assets were carried forward into the amalgamated corporation. So the Supreme Court of Canada came to another conclusion. It came to the conclusion that notwithstanding the fact that all the assets and liabilities of the amalgamating corporations were taken over by the amalgamated corporation, nevertheless they did not cease to exist because the language in the statute is that they shall be continued in the amalgamating corporations. So by whatever metaphysical process was necessary they came to the conclusion in their judgment, which is law, that these amalgamating corporations are still an entity. They have no assets and they have no framework of activity, but they still continue within the amalgamated corporation. It might be difficult, and I do not know, short of some metaphysical process, what we might use in order to discern it but they continue there. Clause 180 of this bill attempts to give effect to that judgment.

I think the form of the bill as it went through the House of Commons and the appropriate Commons committee was within the scope of the general law and was in conformity with the decision in the Black & Decker case. But in committee, as you will see on page 136, the words "or its directors or officers" were added to subclauses (e) and (f) of clause 180.

Subclause (c) says:

(c) the amalgamated corporation continues to be liable for the obligations of each amalgamating corporation;

That is correct. But then in (d) they say:

(d) an existing cause of action, claim or liability to prosecution is unaffected;

The Black & Decker case gave a broad interpretation to the word "liability," and here they have affirmed this by using the word. So, an existing cause of action or a liability or a claim continues and is unaffected. This means that if there is a criminal liability on the part of one or more of the amalgamating corporations, that liability can be asserted against the amalgamated corporation. Then subclause (e) says:

(e) a civil, criminal or administrative action or proceeding pending by or against an amalgamating corporation or its directors or officers may be continued to be prosecuted by or against the amalgamated corporation or its directors or officers;

As you will see, they have included the words I referred to earlier, "its directors or officers."

Now, where the directors of the amalgamated corporation may be different from the directors of the amalgamating corporations, how in the world can you properly say that that is acceptable so far as the law is concerned? It means that no court of law would recognize that proceeding. This subclause is saying that where the director of an amalgamating corporation might be guilty of some offence under the Combines Investigation Act, and then there is an amalgamation, that proceeding can be continued against not only the director of the amalgamating corporation who is the one who has done that thing that is illegal, but also against the directors and officers of the amalgamated corporations who may not be the same persons. That just does not make sense.

When I queried this, honourable senators, the only answer I got was that since this was so obviously something that just could not possibly be given effect to, why were we bothered about it. My answer was this. If you add these words unnecessarily—and I say they are unnecessary because if you have a right to prosecute a director of an amalgamating corporation and he is not the director of the amalgamated corporation, there is no way in which you can carry through that right to prosecute against third persons who are directors of the amalgamated corporation. The response I got was that any intelligent person would appreciate that that is not possible. In turn, my answer is that if that is the case then we as intelligent people should make this read intelligently.

Honourable senators, I have just about come to the end of this essay or speech or exposition, or whatever you regard it as being, of the principal features of this bill. I have attempted to describe the things I think are new. I have explained my criticisms in relation to some of the clauses, and I have explained the clarification which I think is needed in some areas. I have by no means exhausted the potential in this bill, but this could be better done in committee. In due course, if second reading is given, I intend to ask that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Senator Deschatelets: May I ask Senator Hayden a question? You indicated that the bill introduces many changes, one of these being that a director of a corporation will not necessarily have to be a shareholder of the corporation.

Senator Hayden: That is right.

Senator Deschatelets: What is the reason for this change?

Senator Hayden: The very simple reason I would give is that the Ontario Business Corporations Act contains such a provision. Therefore, if they are interested in getting incorporated federally, and everybody subscribes to the simplicity of the Ontario Business Corporations Act, then you should have contained in this bill similar provisions. Further, there is an advantage in being able to have a director who is not a shareholder. You may be able to get responsible people more easily. A corporation may have a director without having to go through the process of finding or buying a share for him in order to qualify him. I think the qualification of a director and his ability to direct and be a good director is more important than the problem of his just having one share as against having no shares.

● (2120)

Senator Flynn: Only nominal, also.

Senator Hicks: May I ask a question of Senator Hayden, also having to do with directors? Am I to understand that the provisions of this bill will eventually be made to apply to all presently existing federally incorporated companies?

Senator Hayden: No, you have not phrased it exactly correctly. Five years from the date this bill becomes law the presently existing federally incorporated companies must apply for a certificate of continuance or they will be dissolved. So, if they apply for the certificate of continuance they will be subject to the provisions thereafter of this bill when it is passed into law.

Senator Hicks: Yes, that is as I understood it. I am sorry if I did not phrase my question correctly. To follow up on that, this will require all Canadian corporations in the future to have a majority of directors who are resident Canadians?

Senator Hayden: That is right.

Senator Hicks: And "resident Canadians" means that they must be Canadian citizens, not merely persons of another nationality residing in Canada?

Senator Hayden: That is right. "Resident director" is defined in the bill.

Senator Flynn: We will find out.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, it will be nice to have Senator Hicks attend the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce when we are considering those details.

May I say to Senator Hayden that he has used the words tonight that the bill is clear, practical and comprehensible. So is Senator Hayden; that was a remarkable presentation. I would also add these words, that he is also lucid and always convincing. Senator O'Leary will be glad to know I am not going to agree with everything he said.

You know, this is a tremendous all-encompassing bill and a great leap forward from the jumbled mix-up of convoluted and antiquated legislation that we have been labouring under for many years. That is why I gave up corporation law. I was trained as a corporation lawyer in the Tilley firm and I was damn glad to get away from it.

Senator Hayden: This may win you back.

Senator Walker: No; too little and too late. This bill is interesting reading, containing 266 clauses. Like Senator Hayden, I do not intend to go into the details. Suffice it to say in general that I think we on this side of the house approve the main principles of the bill. Nor need I blush, but perhaps the other side can blush a little. This is really the product of the Ontario Corporations Act—and I see my friend Senator Hayden nodding.

Senator Hayden: That is my opinion.

Senator Walker: That is your opinion and I think we all have to join with you. It is a huge bill, based on the Ontario Corporations Act of 1970, a product of the government at that time under Premier Robarts, who was a businessman himself. It is the most modern bill of its kind and the Ontario legislation is still a pattern, not only for this Parliament but for many provincial legislatures throughout Canada. I am glad to hear my friend so generously say that the Davis government is now considering further up-to-date amendments, because the growth of corporation law is fantastic and, as my friend said, the growth of it is mainly determined by one main principle, simplicity.

I used to spend all my time up there endeavouring to get concessions out of the officials of the Companies Branch. In the old days we had to do that and we also had to come down to Ottawa and wait months and months to get an answer.

Before proceeding further, may I assume, in order that I need not bore you, that after second reading the bill will be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce?

Senator Hayden: If the Senate so decrees.

Senator Walker: Perhaps the antediluvian, antiquated Canada Corporations Act which this bill is replacing is partly responsible for the fact—this is a remarkable thing—that out of 270,000 corporations in Canada, only 23,000 of them have been incorporated in Ottawa. That really speaks for itself and for the outdated legislation under which we have been labouring since it was passed in 1934 and amended from time to time, but never completely. It is a remarkable thing to consider that only 8 per cent of the corporations in Canada were incorporated in Ottawa. As a matter of fact, in the last two years Ontario has incorporated more companies than the total of federal corporations in Canada.

Senator Hayden: The answer is more flexibility.

Senator Walker: More flexibility; that is a very good answer. You will recall, as I do also, it was a complicated bill, Bill C-213, which was the would-be Corporations Act until Senator Hayden and a few others put their knife into it and it fortunately died on the Order Paper in 1973. This bill, of course, consists of very many up-to-date amendments of that proposed bill. Most of the amendments, of course, advert to the Ontario Corporations Act. As I said earlier, it is not only a delight to read this bill, but there have been eliminated from it many of those old English formalities. I do not know whether the French were the same as the English, but I refer to the convoluted jargon which featured so much of our legislation and remains in part even up to the present time.

There are now, as my friend has so eloquently said, clear rules and clear standards for administrative discretion. It even provides remedies which make the law self-enforcing and does away with much of the need for what has been so well described as "administrative paternalism." Where details are lacking, it proposes the setting up of regulations, for instance, governing the contents of statutory forms and financial statements and requires publication of such proposed regulations at least 60 days before they become effective.

As a matter of fact, the essence of the bill appears to be that it is a brand new law applying only to business corporations, setting out the new rules in a compact, logical manner and making a real effort for the sake of uniformity with the provincial acts. It is a great effort to cooperate with the provincial acts. In the old days Ottawa was so supercilious about such mere things as provincial corporations. They have also cooperated on such issues as proxies, Part XII; insider trading, Part X; take-over bids, Part XVI, and financial disclosure, Part XIII, with respect to all of which it is very important that there should be uniformity.

Now I shall deal with certain parts of the bill, not the details of the clauses, very briefly. Part I applies to all federal business corporations other than financial intermediaries. By that, of course, they mean the banks—Senator Molson's bank, the oldest bank in Canada. The banks have their own act, the insurance companies have their own act, and the trust companies have their own act.

Senator Hayden: And the loan companies.

Senator Walker: Yes, and also the loan companies, and it is perfectly proper that they should. Aside from that, all federal business corporations will be within the purview of the bill we are considering tonight.

The Canadian Bar Association—of which most lawyers are members if they have paid their fees; the payment of fees shows that you have not been disbarred—is a highly respected organization. It too is on record as approving the bill in principle, and has had most of its objections to the bill met by the department. The Department of Justice has changed its attitude. It has greatly improved since I was the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Justice. It has improved tremendously since that time.

Senator Flynn: It started from there.

Senator Walker: I was moved from there in about a year. Let us have the true story. I was then made a minister, but not of Justice.

Here is one of the things the Canadian Bar Association objects to. My honourable friend will probably agree with this. I refer to section 4, a very odd section, which provides:

The purposes of this Act are to revise and reform the law applicable to business corporations incorporated—

Listen to this.

—for objects other than provincial—

What are we doing? Are we downgrading ourselves in Ottawa because provincial corporations seem to be the most popular thing? This is going the wrong way, and the Canadian Bar Association objects to section 4 because in their view it detracts from and downgrades the federal claim to be entitled to legislate widely—just as wide as they want to in this field.

The words which circumscribe or limit the field would appear to be “for objects other than provincial.” I would ask my honourable friend that when the bill is before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce this very important point be cleared up. The wording is short but is of great import.

Senator Hayden: If my friend wants me to comment on it now, I will do so.

Senator Walker: I would be delighted.

Senator Hayden: I do not think it is well drafted. The bill does not provide for objects in the corporation; it has all the rights and powers of a natural person. In that context how does one incorporate “for objects other than provincial”?

Senator Flynn: I refer you to the British North America Act, which says that you can incorporate a company for federal purposes. It is in the B.N.A. Act.

Senator Walker: That is a solution. I have watched the chairman of the committee draft legislation as we sat there. This is going to be an easy one. He could just delete that clause, and we would not have any more trouble. It means a lot to the Canadian Bar Association. They worry about these things, and we should please them in this regard.

Another important point is that automatically the bill applies to all new corporations. From now on every new corporation has to come within the purview of this act. It will be simplicity itself.

Concerning the corporations, 23,000 of which are already in operation and in force, there is introduced a plan. It is a good plan, requiring that a federal corporation take positive steps so that within a period of five years such steps are taken to bring it completely within the purview of this act. My honourable friend mentioned that. It is a very good thing.

In that connection, I would like to make a further comment. If any corporation does not take such steps, it will be considered dissolved at the end of a five-year period. Ontario has similar legislation for other things. It is an awful feeling sometimes, if a person is not on his toes, to find that Ontario does not bother if you do not do such and such a thing. Your charter is dissolved automatically after a certain period has elapsed. That feature is introduced here, and is a good thing. Clearly the objective of Part I is to bring about a comprehensive business corporation law, as Senator Hayden so eloquently said.

Part II sets out guidelines for governing the operation. For the first time in history a federal incorporation becomes a matter of right rather than a privilege under the old letters patent system.

Secondly, it substitutes clearly expressed rules and standards, and no longer must one rely on administrative discretion; no longer must the Ottawa authorities be constantly consulted and appealed to. They became the great Pooh-Bahs. We had to go down and get their opinion, their sanction, and finally, after a few months, get a letter confirming what they told us in the conversation.

Thirdly, that old tommy-rot formality for interim incorporation with provisional directors, most of them law students or clerks, is being done away with. I, as a law student, was a provisional director of dozens of them during the boom years before the crash of 1929. Probably Senator Hayden's firm had more.

It was a great thing. We used to get a $10 fee for each student to sit on those things. We would then pass over our mighty responsibility as provisional directors to the real directors. All the great men would be in the room. One day I walked into the room feeling very important and joined the rest of them, when Mr. A. E. Ames said, “Here comes the hockey team.” That is no depreciation of hockey players. All that tommy-rot is at an end.

I will leave out a great many points, because my honourable friend has simply and eloquently expressed them, but, getting back to the bill, corporate names are being granted pursuant to certain prescribed standards, with regulations still to be promulgated. It will be remembered what a hit and run game it used to be. At one time it was thought that I had some diplomacy with the person in charge at Queens Park. I would have to go out and soft soap her for several minutes before mentioning the name I was seeking. If she was not good natured she would turn it down automatically. All that foolishness is over. There are now rules by which if you are entitled to a certain name you will get it. It is clearly a good system which is now incorporated in the new bill.

Plaguing the corporate lawyer, as Senator Hayden said, has been the ultra vires doctrine, and for many years Canadians have sought a uniform corporation law. Now they will have it if this bill is passed.

Again, the federal government has sought help from the Ontario Business Corporations Act, as a result of which the bill abandons entirely, as my honourable friend has said, that crotchety letters patent procedure and adopts a simple registration system where it is assumed that incorporation can be obtained as of right. There was nothing like that in the old days. A lot of what I would like to describe as the old "hufty-dufty" of unreasonable technicalities has at last been removed.

This bill returns corporations to what they lost in the nineteenth century. I do not intend to go into the history of that, but, as my honourable friend well knows, this bill clearly states that a corporation has the capacity as well as the power, rights and privileges of a natural person. This is something which we did not know about before, except in the Ontario Corporations Act.

Honourable senators, you will have to excuse me for mentioning the Ontario act from time to time. This apparently new concept is, in fact, an old concept which was used in England in the nineteenth century under the original common-law doctrine. So that now, for example, under Part III, the right of a third party contracting in good faith with a corporation cannot be ignored, and that third party has the right to assume that the corporation has the capacity to enter into a contract with him and not learn later, as we used to learn on behalf of our clients, that an expressed restriction in the bylaws nullified the agreement which was entered into in such good faith.

I am glad to see Senator Godfrey making a note of that. Senator Godfrey is one of the good corporate lawyers in this house.

Part V concerns corporate finance and deals with many difficult problems relating to redemption of shares, dividends, and the very capital structure itself. It even goes so far as to permit, in certain circumstances, the acquisition by a corporation of its own shares. That will be interesting, and is interesting.

Another important step under this proposed legislation is the increase in the residual power of the shareholder to control indirectly the management of the entire corporation. I have had a lot of trouble with that; I have seen so many screwball shareholders at annual meetings. I have been sent to annual meetings on occasion to quietly sit in the background as a shareholder to try to squelch them. Those individuals will now have more opportunities than ever. Under the proposed legislation, a shareholder may now initiate bylaws, remove directors by ordinary resolution and vote on fundamental changes. So, here we have for the first time democracy in corporations.

Part IX of the bill is of interest to us nationalists—and almost everyone here is nationalistic in his or her outlook at this time. Part IX requires that the majority of directors of a corporation be resident Canadians—not just Canadians, but resident Canadians. In this connection, one question which I think should be raised in committee is why they should be given five years to comply. If it is an old corporation, it will have five years to set its house in order—five years to get a majority of the directors who are Canadian residents. Why should such corporations not comply in one year? Under the Ontario Corporations Act they have one year in which to comply, and I believe most of the corporations have complied. That is one area in which the bill could perhaps be amended.

Another matter for our committee to consider is that this bill does not adopt that part of the Ontario Corporations Act which requires that for foreign-controlled corporations a majority—I cannot hear myself talk. Thank you, Senator Bourget.

Senator Bourget: I was listening; I was not talking.

Senator Walker: I remember once in court saying, "My Lord, my learned friend is disturbing the train of my thought," at which point my honourable friend got up and said, "If that is the train of your thought, it should be disturbed."

To repeat, this bill does not adopt that part of the Ontario act which requires that for foreign-controlled corporations a majority of outside Canadian directors be elected. By "outside directors" is meant directors who are not employees of the foreign-controlled corporation. Why should we not have that section in the federal act? I understand there were a lot of representations about it from Washington to Ottawa and it was dropped. In any event, the existing Canadian corporation should have at least one year, but not more than two, to achieve a majority of Canadian directors. This, of course, would require an amendment to the bill as it is presently drafted, and I am sure that could be done in committee.

Part XI of the bill is significant in that it increases the power of the shareholders to participate directly in the internal affairs of a company and to control, if necessary, the business of the corporation.

Part XIII strengthens the role of the auditor. I often wondered what good those auditors' reports were, what authority they had. Part XIII strengthens this considerably. It again follows the Ontario act by requiring that an audit committee be picked to ensure that the auditors be responsive to the directors. I am sure many of you who are corporate lawyers will remember getting auditors' reports—and I shall not give the names of some of the well known auditors—but what did you know about them? Under the proposed legislation there will be an audit committee which can make the proper application of pressure for explanations of some of the things in auditors' reports.

I now turn to page 179 of the bill, Part XVIII, clause 222, with which I wish to deal briefly. Clause 222 states:

(1) A shareholder or the Director—

Of course, "Director" is the name of the head man in Ottawa, is it not, Senator Hayden? It says, "A shareholder or the Director . . .", and "Director" is capitalized.

Senator Hayden: It would be the director in the company's branch.

Senator Walker: Yes, exactly. It continues:

—may apply, ex parte—

Imagine, a shareholder!

—or upon such notice as the court may require, to a court having jurisdiction in the place where the corporation has its registered office for an order directing an investigation to be made of the corporation and any of its affiliated corporations.

That is something new, and in that connection the Canadian Bar Association would like to have an opportunity to appear before the committee. Very briefly, the point of view of the Canadian Bar Association is that this clause would permit a disgruntled shareholder or the director under the act to apply, ex parte—that is, without notifying the company, without notifying anyone. He could simply go before the court having jurisdiction for an order directing an investigation of the corporation and any of its affiliated corporations. The court may direct that notice be given to the corporation, but is not required to do so. However, if the application is being made by a shareholder, the director has to be given reasonable notice, but not the corporation.

In the result, the court, upon such an application, may have before it only one side of the story. If the order is made, the corporation is subjected to an investigation which is going to be costly to it, and there is to be no security for costs from the applicant.

The reason given by the department for the application being allowed to be made ex parte, the reason which is obvious, is that the corporation might destroy its files unless an ex parte application is made. While this might conceivably and rarely happen, it does not warrant an order being made for a complete investigation without notification to anyone. Instead, it would only justify an order to seize files. If an ex parte order is to be authorized, it should be limited to a seizure of files. It is sometimes necessary to have an ex parte order to seize files before they are destroyed.

Any investigation is bound to be an adversary proceeding—this is a good company with an ex parte application being made by a screwball shareholder—and publicity follows, which may be damaging to a corporation and its other shareholders to a degree far outweighing the damage which the disgruntled shareholder claims he has suffered. The cost to a corporation of even monitoring such an investigation could be enormous, even though it might be entirely cleared in the result. This is very serious. The order may be changed by the court under clause 223, and the order of the court is subject to appeal under clause 242, but once the order is made the damage to the company may be done. It is just like those allegations we see in the newspapers from day to day—whether they are right or wrong, they do an awful lot of damage.

Senator Hayden: I take it my friend knows there is provision in the bill that where there is an application by any interested party the hearing be in camera.

Senator Walker: Yes, without notice to anybody originally too. In my experience not everyone, certainly not the public, understands that ex parte means that the corporation to be investigated is not given an opportunity to be heard before the order is made. I trust that this will be considered.

In conclusion, I must compliment the government on its open admission that it has followed the 1970 Ontario Business Corporations Act, and it has even gone beyond that act in certain refinements. That is an achievement. In the old days we never had such a thing. I cannot remember ever giving any credit to any body for anything when I was a minister. You had to keep your guard up; it would have been a mistake to let it down and become casual. We now have a bill which is readily understandable, readily readable, readily workable and in which the confusion, formalism and obscure language of the present act have been swept away in one fell swoop. This is progress, and I am sure that even the corporation lawyers will approve of it, even though some of them may lose a lot of business because of it. Much of their time in the future will be freed to enable them to deal with progressive measures for their corporations, rather than trying to unravel and abide by the intricacies of the old act, which has become, one might almost say, archaic.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, might I ask the sponsor one question? On page 4 it says:

“prescribed” means prescribed by the regulations.

Where is the provision for regulations? Who is going to issue regulations, for what purpose, in what way, and how do they appear? It refers to “the regulations,” so we assume that the bill is going to be supplemented by a considerable volume of regulations.

Senator Hayden: The only word I cannot agree with is the word “considerable.” Certainly I would expect that the bill, having regard to its terms, will have regulations in relation to certain parts of it, but they will not be regulations that destroy the rights and powers of shareholders. They may be procedural, and they may have to do with the manner in which you get to court on the investigative process, things of that kind.

Senator Molson: Are they provided for in the bill?

Senator Hayden: They are in various places.

Senator Molson: Thank you.

Senator Godfrey: Could I ask the sponsor of the bill a question? You pointed out that under clause 100 there is a requirement that the majority of the directors must be Canadian residents, yet under clause 40 by unanimous shareholder agreement you can take away all the powers of the directors.

Senator Hayden: That is right.

Senator Godfrey: That seems to be sort of window-dressing. Is there any explanation, or is there any safeguard that would prevent having a foreign controlled company? You might have Canadian directors, but it is meaningless if they have no power.

Senator Hayden: This is exactly the point I was making. As I said, I think there should be some thinking about this and clarification in committee on this very point.

Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators I should inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Hayden speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, I do not propose to deal further with the provisions of the bill. Senator Walker has made a good contribution. He has obviously examined the bill very carefully. He has raised some points which I think are worth while, but I do not think this is the place to settle them. I would therefore hope that Senator Walker will be present when the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, of which he is a member, meets, and that he will see to it that these points that he has made are put forward. That will save me the trouble of underlining what he has said and raising the points myself.

Senator Walker: But you will work out the answers in advance, will you not?

Senator Flynn: Some of them.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

CUSTOMS TARIFF, (NO. 2)

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-39, to amend the Customs Tariff, (No. 2) and has directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Cook moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, a matter has arisen requiring a meeting of the Internal Economy subcommittee on classifications of salaries. I propose to hold a meeting of that subcommittee in my office at 5.30 this afternoon. The members of the subcommittee are Senators Langlois, Buckwold, Grosart, Bélisle and Laird, as well as myself.

EXCISE TAX ACT AND EXCISE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Alan A. Macnaughton moved the second reading of Bill C-40, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this is an important bill for several reasons, not the least of which is the fact that it covers almost $1 billion in sales tax reductions. It is a technical bill, and in order to help in its presentation this afternoon I have grouped different matters under different headings.

This bill provides for a number of significant amendments to the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act, and the first question I asked myself was, "Why the two acts in one?" On inquiry from the officials I found that the Excise Act imposes taxes only on tobacco, beer and spirits, whereas the Excise Tax Act is the general federal sales tax of 12 per cent, plus a series of what we call special excise taxes such as those on heavy cars, wines and other items.

The proposed changes would implement important dimensions of the government's policies to deal with the two major problems confronting most western economies at the present time, namely, inflation and slower growth.

This bill provides for sales tax reductions amounting to an estimated $940 million in a full year. These reductions will provide an important stimulus to the housing and general construction industries as well as to the transportation sector of the economy. The effects of these measures, combined with other policies proposed in the budget, will directly benefit consumers through their impact in moderating prices and encouraging the creation of new jobs.

In addition this bill provides for important new taxes on high energy-consuming vehicles as well as for moderate increases in the levies on liquor, wine and tobacco products. Many questions will probably be asked about these measures during the committee stage of the bill. At this time, however, I should like to restrict my comments to the general substance of the bill.

The amendments related to adult clothing and footwear proposed in this bill will formalize the sales tax reductions for these goods provided under the Financial Administration Act of July 16, 1974. These are important measures, affecting over $5 billion in annual retail sales of clothing and footwear, and they will save the consumer over $300 million in taxes over a full year. In the May 6 budget it was emphasized that adult clothing and footwear accounted for a significant proportion of the budgets of most families and that the proposed action would significantly reduce the prices of these products. The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has been monitoring prices in this area since action was taken to remove the tax on July 16, 1974. The final report of the price monitoring exercise should be tabled this year. However, preliminary indications suggest that the reductions are being passed on and have had a significant impact on moderating price increases in this important sector of the economy.

Turning to the measures in this bill which affect housing, the exemption of construction equipment and municipal water distribution equipment and the reduction of federal sales tax to 5 per cent on a wide range of construction materials and equipment for building should provide a significant stimulus to the house building and general construction industries. In this regard questions have been raised concerning the specific impact that the government's housing policies will have on the price of a home. The government proposed a number of policies in the budget which are directly related to the housing industry. These measures include a $500 grant for persons purchasing moderately priced homes, the Registered Home Ownership Savings Plan, new provisions concerning capital cost allowances, the proposal to disallow the deduction of carrying costs on land awaiting development, as well as the sales tax reduction all over one-half billion dollars provided for in this bill. While it is not possible to provide specific details concerning the dollar impact that these measures will have on the price of a home, it is hoped that these reductions will stimulate new investment and that competitive market forces will assure that home buyers will benefit through a significant moderation in house prices. The reduction of the tax on construction materials alone should constitute a tax saving of an estimated $650 on a house currently selling in the $40,000 range.

The Secretary of State for Urban Affairs will be monitoring the impact of these measures on the housing industry and will be reporting to Parliament in due course.

Turning to the proposals to remove federal sales tax from a comprehensive list of transportation equipment, the budget speech pointed out that cost pressures in the transportation industries were significantly undermining the vitality of that industry and that these cost pressures were being translated into price increases affecting virtually every other sector of the economy. The transportation measures proposed in this bill will affect approximately $1 billion in annual sales and will result in a reduction of an estimated $100 million in federal revenues over a full year. It is hoped that the reductions will be reflected in increased investment in this industry as well as in a moderation of transportation costs.

Honourable senators will be aware of the minister's intention, announced on December 2, 1974, to request the government to provide relief for tax-paid inventories of trucks and related transportation equipment. This action was necessary because of a combination of critical factors affecting the trucking industry and related transportation industries. Dealers were unable to sell tax-paid inventories because the sales tax already paid on larger trucks and other equipment often amounted to several thousands of dollars per unit. In addition, customers were refusing to accept shipment of many highly specialized, custom-built items which had been ordered but not delivered as of budget day. Many customers were prepared to wait for tax-free goods to become available or to transfer orders to dealers who already had tax-free inventories on hand.

It must be emphasized that the proposed action constitutes a marked departure from traditional practice. However, the combination and intensity of adverse circumstances affecting the transportation industries made immediate action necessary in order to avoid extreme hardship and a serious disruption of production and employment.

[Senator Macnaughton.]

The bill also contains important amendments related to the air transportation tax. The bill proposes that the Governor in Council be given authority to impose a ceiling on the 5 per cent ad valorem tax. It is proposed that this ceiling will initially be set at $5. This will benefit all persons who travel long distances by air. In particular, this ceiling will assist persons living in the North and in other remote parts of Canada. The Minister of Transport may have more to say about these changes during the committee stage of the bill.

The bill also contains measures to deter wasteful energy consumption by imposing special excise taxes on high energy-consuming vehicles. These measures, first referred to in the May 6 budget, have been modified to increase the effectiveness of the tax by providing for significant rate increases. For cars weighing more than 4,500 pounds and station wagons weighing over 5,100 pounds, the rate will be $20 for the first 100 pounds over the limit, $25 on the next 100 pounds and $30 for each subsequent 100 pounds. For motorcycles with big engines, the rate will be 5 per cent. The rate for privately owned aircraft, boat motors larger than 20 horsepower, and boats designed to be propelled by these motors, will be 10 per cent. These new taxes will increase federal revenues by an estimated $30 million in a full year.

As mentioned earlier, the bill also contains proposals to moderately increase federal levies on liquor, wine and tobacco products. These measures were first proposed in the May 6 budget. At the time the budget was defeated, it was the government's intention to re-introduce these measures if the government were returned. These amendments will generate an additional $130 million in federal revenues in a full year.

The bill also contains important new sales tax exemptions for a number of articles purchased by handicapped persons. In addition, the provisions in the Excise Tax Act which permit certified institutions to purchase all goods exempt from federal sales tax have been broadened to include purchases made by day-care centres, physiotherapy units and other institutions.

In general the budget emphasized that through the taxation system and in other ways the government was encouraging the private sector to maintain a healthy level of activity in the present, and to build new capacity to increase the supply of goods and services for the future. The measures proposed in the bill, in particular those related to the housing industry and the transportation industry, constitute important steps in this direction.

It might be of real interest to honourable senators if I try to summarize the provisions of the bill very briefly in terms of dollars and cents and percentages. The reductions in federal sales taxes amount to almost $1 billion. I propose to give the house some examples or highlights of those items which are set forth in the bill. I deal now with the tax reductions.

First, there is a reduction in federal sales tax on construction materials, from 12 per cent and 11 per cent to 5 per cent.

Second, the federal sales tax is completely removed for a comprehensive list of transportation equipment. Examples of this would be railway rolling stock, large trucks and commercial aircraft. The reduction to the government in federal revenues is $100 million.

Third, the federal sales tax is removed from all clothing and footwear. The revenue reduction to the federal government in one year is $300 million.

Fourth, there are a number of important tax exemptions for municipalities. Examples are the purchase of materials and equipment for water distribution systems and all parts and equipment for mass transportation. The loss is $25 million.

Senator Flynn: What do you mean by "loss?"

Senator Macnaughton: Loss of revenue.

Senator Flynn: You mean reduction, not loss.

Senator Macnaughton: "Reduction" is a much better word. Thank you.

Fifth, sales tax on construction equipment is removed.

Senator Asselin: About time.

Senator Macnaughton: The reduction in revenue is $40 million.

Sixth, there is a broadening of the definition of certified institutions such as day-care centres. The revenue reduction is $20 million.

Seventh, relief for a number of devices purchased by handicapped persons. Examples of this are communicating devices to assist people in the use of telephones, selection control to assist them in the use of machines, invalid chairs, and heart monitoring devices. The figure for revenue reduction in this case is a little less than $5 million.

That concludes my remarks on second reading. In due course, if honourable senators so decide, I shall move that the bill be referred to committee.

Senator Flynn: I shall move the adjournment of the debate so that I can digest all these figures.

Senator O'Leary: Honourable senators, being less kindly than my leader, I should like to ask the honourable senator who has just spoken when he became a public relations officer for Mr. John Turner?

Senator Macnaughton: I am happy to answer the honourable senator. John Turner has been a close friend of mine for many, many years, and I wish him all good luck in the future. I assure honourable senators, who know this better than I, that John Turner needs no public relations man.

Senator O'Leary: You did pretty well.

Senator Flynn: If it was at all useful.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

QUEBEC PROVINCIAL POLICE

FINANCIAL COMPENSATION FOR MAINTENANCE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the claim made by the Minister of Justice of the Province of Quebec for financial compensation from the federal government with respect to the Quebec Provincial Police Force and to the ever-increasing costs of maintaining the various police forces in Canada.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, last year I put on the order paper a notice of my intention to comment on the financial claims of the Government of Quebec to the Canadian government about a financial agreement providing the use of the RCMP in the provinces. I was prevented from doing so by the dissolution of Parliament. But, for many reasons, which I am going to explain, I wanted to come back to that matter during the current session.

This question is difficult, complex, but most interesting, as it results from a federal-provincial agreement. I believe that an Upper House has been established in our parliamentary system so that the representatives of a province in that House might have the opportunity to report the claims of their own province when they feel the cause fair and just.

Keeping this in mind, I want to make a few comments to find a solution which might do justice to my province.

I have examined the very elaborate document as well as the detailed statistics about the operational costs, not only of the Quebec Police Force but also of the Ontario Provincial Police and of the various police activities of the RCMP within the provinces. Those documents have been handed over to the Government of Canada by the Quebec Minister of Justice. I must say that the financial consequences for my province leave me a little puzzled. However, I must admit that I did not realize the full implication of this problem before the Quebec Minister of Justice spoke publicly of it. Of course, I knew that the RCMP had police responsibilities in many provinces and municipalities, but I did not know that those agreements with the other provinces had such important financial consequences for the taxpayers of Quebec.

I would like to examine briefly with you all the facets of this situation. Then, I hope we shall be able to come to some conclusions.

Under section 20 of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, chapter R-9, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, the Solicitor General may enter into an agreement with the government of any province, or municipality, for the use of the RCMP in such province or municipality. For that matter, the first agreements date back to 1905.

In 1964, at a conference with eight of the provinces, with the exception of Ontario and Quebec, new contracts were reached for a period of ten years, from 1966 to 1976. The current dispute stems from that last agreement, which will come up for renewal in 1976.

Under that agreement covering the period from 1966 to 1976 it was agreed between the federal government and the eight provinces, with the exception of Quebec and Ontario, that the federal contribution would total 60 per cent of the annual cost of police services in the province involved, and that each year the federal contribution would be reduced by 1 per cent each year and, on the other hand, the contribution of the contracting provinces would increase by 1 per cent each year, to reach 50 per cent of the costs in 1976. In all provinces other than Quebec and Ontario, as well as in 171 contracting municipalities, the RCMP enforces the Criminal Code, federal legislation, as well as provincial legislation and municipal by-laws, if applicable.

As a result, there is now in Canada a system of different police forces depending on the provinces and municipalities, and the question now is this: what are the financial implications resulting from such a system?

It must be admitted that Quebec and Ontario having not entered into agreements, both maintaining their own provincial police force, must support alone 100 per cent of the cost of their police operations while in the eight other provinces the federal government assumed 60 per cent of the cost in 1966, with a 50-50 split being reached at the expiration of the contract in 1976.

Moreover, Quebec and Ontario taxpayers are forced to pay, through federal income tax, part of the police costs for eight provinces.

Honourable senators, this is a very brief summary of the situation which degenerated into a controversial issue when, on November 11, 1973, just before the federal-provincial conference on the Canadian corrections system, the Quebec Minister of Justice, the Honourable Jérôme Choquette, submitted a request to the Solicitor General of Canada for a retroactive compensation and a notice of financial compensation to be determined for the subsequent years until 1976.

It must be noted here that Quebec's initial claim covered the period from 1966 to 1973-74, and the brief submitted to the Canadian government states that for that seven year period it would have cost the Canadian government approximately $362 million to maintain RCMP members in the Province of Quebec which would have acted in federal, provincial and local areas of jurisdiction.

For the year 1973-74, the federal government would have paid 52 per cent of the total cost, which is about $68 million.

I must also say that on October 24, 1974, in a letter to the Solicitor General of Canada, the Honourable Warren Allmand, the Quebec Minister of Justice, abandoned the $362 million retroactive claim, when he stated in paragraph 7, page 5, of his letter, and I quote:

● (1430)

Finally, please take note that I shall not insist on a settlement of our past claim in spite of its validity... if this aspect of our claim is only a pretext for doing nothing until 1976.

However, what must be remembered from all this is that the retroactive claims of $362 million have been abandoned.

Honourable senators should note that on June 13, 1974, the Solicitor General of Ontario—and I shall ask you to take note of it as it is an important aspect of the problem—announced that his government was going to join forces with Quebec, claiming a federal financial compensation for the police costs in Ontario and that, for 1974-1975, the claim of Ontario amounts to $84 million approximately.

[English]

Senator Rowe: Honourable senators, I wonder if I may interrupt for a moment to advise that the simultaneous interpretation system has not been working for the last couple of minutes.

Senator Deschatelets: I can do my best to proceed in English, if you like.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Deschatelets: Honourable senators, what conclusion can we draw from this controversy that involves not only huge sums of money but also—and I think it is one of the major problems—some basic principles which have governed in the past the various agreements between the Canadian government and the provinces?

I wish to be as unbiased as possible. I do not believe that we can deny the basic fact that the administration of justice and police forces at provincial and municipal levels are a provincial jurisdiction under our Constitution. Then, if a province is entitled to rent this jurisdiction to the federal government if it finds it advantageous, any other province has also the right to reject such a contract and to fully apply its jurisdiction. I think that we unanimously agree on those principles. But, consequently, why should the province which refuses to rent a recognized provincial right not have the right to ask the federal government for a financial compensation to be determined in proportion to costs?

If I cannot admit the validity of the retroactive claim of the Quebec government for the 1966-76 period, Quebec not being a party to the contract, I do not believe that such a claim could be used as basis in a serious dispute before the courts. I also believe that Quebec was right in giving notice that it wanted to take part in the negotiations when the contract expires in 1976. I refer to the correspondence between the Solicitor General of Canada and Quebec's Minister of Justice because I believe it is still possible to discuss this problem and settle it equitably.

In the last paragraph of his statement, on page 40, Mr. Choquette writes the following, and I think his attitude is a reasonable one. I quote:

In 1976, when those contracts expire, the government of Quebec submits that it should take part in the talks which will be held by the federal government and other provinces in order to reassess the whole problem of financial participation by the federal government in the settling of problems relating to the safety and protection of Canadian citizens. It will then be possible to consider alternate schemes of financial compensation.

As I said, that is a reasonable proposal. I do not think it is the kind of proposal which can be dismissed easily.

Senator Asselin: It has been.

Senator Deschatelets: If it were agreed that Quebec might take part in those talks I believe a modus vivendi might be reached. Unfortunately, it is not so and it would be far too simple; we would not be faced with a complex problem, for if I refer to page 4 of Mr. Allmand's letter to Mr. Choquette dated September 9, 1974, Mr. Allmand wrote the following:

Also we can hardly understand that the government of Quebec might take part in the preliminary talks and negotiations for the renewal of contracts between the RCMP and other provinces for the period beginning April 1st, 1976. A contract between two parties only involves those two parties, and we can see no reason why Quebec should take part in those negotiations.

Of course the exact wording of those contracts will again be available to you as well as to the government of Ontario. We shall be glad to discuss with yourself or the Ontario representatives the terms of the proposed contracts, in case your province or Ontario should decide to request the services of the RCMP.

In other words, Mr. Allmand—I hope I understand him well—states that the services of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police which are available to eight provinces also are available to Quebec and Ontario if both provinces want to avail themselves of those services, but that future requests for RCMP help by Quebec and Ontario would be a sine qua non to their part in those discussions leading to the renewal of contracts in 1976.

We seem to have no opportunity to open talks on the compensation. Moreover, there is, especially in Mr. Allmand's letter, apparently no acknowledgement of the fact that if Quebec, for reasons of its own, refuses to rent a jurisdiction which is its own, there might be compensation which the Canadian government would be ready to discuss.

● (1440)

Honourable senators, when we look for a solution, I believe that there is no way which should be left unexplored. It happened in the past—it is not the first time we face this type of problem—it happened in the past that provinces, refusing to abandon some rights within their jurisdiction, were granted financial compensation. I wonder if we have not a similar case with universities.

Senator Lamontagne: May I put a question to the honourable senator?

Senator Deschatelets: Yes, Senator Lamontagne.

Senator Lamontagne: The honourable senator could certainly give us a much more striking example than the one he has just mentioned. He could refer to what has been called the "opting out" formula, which is much more general and should certainly apply to this case.

Senator Deschatelets: Of course, I raise the issue with the hope that, through precedents created in similar cases of agreements with provinces, it could be possible to obtain a financial share from federalism, as we have known if for so many years. The fact remains that, in some cases, a province may choose not to exercise its jurisdiction, if it is in its interest to do so. But I think that a principle always governed those agreements; the provinces which did not have the same reasons, were given financial compensation corresponding to their share of the costs. For a number of years, we in Quebec have lost considerable amounts of money because the government of the time—that was their right—felt it not advantageous to accept the same agreements as the other provinces.

Senator Asselin: Some of these problems were dealt with by the Conservative government of Premier Sauvé.

Senator Deschatelets: Yes, I thank Senator Asselin for reminding me of it. But I would like to be, and I will try to remain, as unbiased as possible, without partisanship. Senator Flynn understands quite well what I mean.

Senator Lamontagne: Arrangements for the opting out formula were made in 1965.

Senator Asselin: Because we had an example in 1960.

Senator Deschatelets: Now, honourable senators, I mentioned I wished to get away from any partisan allusions, in order to prevent this kind of exchange.

One paragraph in Mr. Allmand's letter seems to close the door, but in my opinion the last paragraph holds out a hand to Mr. Choquette. I quote:

There are at any rate areas of application of criminal law we could profitably examine together.

I emphasize the words "examine together". I am not blaming anybody, but I think the discussion had a bad start, to say the least. Any suggestion of a common examination of certain implications, concerning contracts, would be welcome. I believe Mr. Choquette, Quebec's Justice Minister, could take advantage of the last paragraph of Mr. Allmand's letter, inviting him to examine together certain implications of the RCMP's role. I suggest once more no avenue should be neglected, and it is possible that discussions, a mature dialogue across the table, might lead to the exploration of a possible solution.

Senator Flynn: Both are indeed quite flexible.

Senator Deschatelets: The exploration of a possible solution all Quebec taxpayers are hoping for.

Honourable senators, in the light of the facts I have just mentioned—and this strongly impressed Quebec taxpayers who were not aware of the implications—taxpayers in Quebec now pay 100 per cent of the cost of provincial police forces. They also pay, indirectly, part of the cost for eight provinces. I submit that Ontario and Quebec, which have expressed the desire to take part in the next negotiations, should be invited to attend the discussions and negotiations which will take place before the renewal of the agreements between the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the other provinces for the period following April 1, 1976. I do not want to go much further, although there is a lot of things that could be said, but there is only one case that I want to mention.

As everyone else, we see the exaggerated, exorbitant escalation of police costs—be it the Quebec Provincial Police, the Ontario Provincial Police or even the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Senator Asselin: Would it not depend on the social situation?

Senator Deschatelets: That is quite possible. I examined the statistics provided, and from year to year there is an increase that seems exorbitant.

Now, I talk about this because I had to pay a parking ticket about a year ago.

Senator Flynn: Oh, no!

Senator Deschatelets: As any good citizen, I went down to a police station in Verdun.

Senator Flynn: A good citizen abides by the law.

Senator Deschatelets: When he does not, he must pay for it—with a smile—as I did.

Now, when you get to a police station, as I had the opportunity to do, you see in the office about twelve policemen. There were two or three answering telephone calls, others were looking into records, and so on. And I wondered what those police officers who went through intensive training in the fight against crime were doing in that office handling purely clerical work. It is my impression that the spiralling increase in police administrative costs could be at least stopped, if not reduced, if as is done elsewhere in other administrative areas they were given support staff to look after the office routine work, which would have the advantage of cutting down considerably the exorbitant costs we now face. I say this in the hope that those who enforce the law can find a way to put an end to the increase in these exorbitant costs.

I hesitated before dealing with that question once again. I think that as a representative of a province I must occasionally support at least the basic data of a problem that seems right to me. I sure hope that with positive dialogue between both ministers involved, if not at a higher level, there would be a possibility of finding a fair solution for the province of Quebec for 1976.

On motion of Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

THE SENATE

SIMULTANEOUS INTERPRETATION SYSTEM—QUESTION

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, before we adjourn, I think it should be pointed out to the honourable senator who has just spoken that the interpretation system was off and on during most of his speech, which is hardly fair to him. Surely it is the responsibility of someone in this house to see that the system is put into order so that it will work. Wherever you turn to mention this, you are told that someone else should be looking after it. The system in the House of Commons works, and the system here should work. I would ask that the necessary steps be taken to make it work.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, this point was raised during the absence of Senator Croll, and I understand that it was brought to the attention of the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod. However, I think the point has been very well taken for the second time.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, February 6, 1975

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

EMPLOYER-EMPLOYEE RELATIONS IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Dinsdale has been substituted for that of Mr. Towers on the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service.

SENATE (INTERSESSIONAL AUTHORITY) BILL

FIRST READING

Senator Flynn presented Bill S-22, to provide for the internal economy and administration of the Senate between sessions of Parliament and between Parliaments.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. The Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Flynn moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday, February 18.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING COMMITTEES

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS—COMMITTEE
AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Wednesday next, February 12, 1975, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Senator Flynn: Explain.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, the reason for this motion and for a motion which I intend to present relating to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is that these two committees have very important meetings scheduled for Wednesday and notices have to be sent out in order to have the witnesses in attendance. It is rather unlikely that the permission sought in these motions will be necessary because we intend to arrange the work of the Senate for Wednesday afternoon in such a way that the house will adjourn around 2.30 to enable these two important committees to get on with their important work. In the case of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, Wednesday appears to be the only day on which they can have certain witnesses from the RCMP in attendance.

So far as the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is concerned, this committee is very anxious to complete its work on the Combines Investigation legislation. Furthermore, we expect that the tax bill will come to us from the other place next week, in which case it will be desirable to deal with it next week if at all possible. For these reasons I commend these two motions to the house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators have heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE—COMMITTEE
AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Wednesday next, February 12, 1975, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators have heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, February 11, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before the question is put, I should like to give, as usual, a brief outline of the program for the next week. Most of the work of the Senate next week will be in committees.

On Tuesday the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will continue with its study and hear witnesses on Bill S-19, to amend the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Criminal Code. The committee will sit at 10 a.m. and again at 2 p.m. Also on Tuesday, the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will meet at 11 a.m.

On Wednesday the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will meet at 9.30 a.m. to continue its study of the Combines legislation. Should Bill C-40, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act, have been referred, the committee will consider it on Wednesday morning before proceeding with the Combines legislation. On Wednesday afternoon this committee will continue with its study of the income tax legislation.

On Thursday at 9.30 a.m., the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will commence its examination of Bill C-29, respecting Canadian business corporations. The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on Thursday morning—the time has not yet been fixed but notice will be given in due course—will continue its examination of the Manpower Division of the Department of Manpower and Immigration. The Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will meet at 11 a.m.

The Senate, hopefully, will conclude the second reading debate on Bill C-40, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act, and refer the bill to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee.

Senator Flynn: If it passes.

Senator Langlois: I said hopefully. We shall continue with the debate on Senator Deschatelet's inquiry on financial compensation from the federal government with respect to the Quebec Provincial Police Force, and with Senator Croll's inquiry on the anatomy of a special Senate committee report.

Bill C-49, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, is still before the House of Commons, and hopefully it should reach us some time next week.

Senator Flynn: The Deputy Leader of the Government is full of hope.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, may I make one minor correction to keep the record straight? On February 13, the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will meet at 3.30 p.m. rather than 11 a.m. as announced by the Deputy Leader of the Government.

Senator Flynn: Does the committee have leave to sit while the Senate is sitting?

Senator Buckwold: Yes, it does.

Senator Flynn: On Thursday?

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, for your information, the Committee on National Finance will sit at 9.30 a.m. on Thursday to hear the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, it being the first of our hearings on the Manpower Division.

Senator Hicks: At 9.30 a.m. on which day?

Senator Everett: Thursday.

Senator Grosart: I am not clear as to the permission we gave to the two committees to sit while the Senate is sitting next week. My understanding is that permission was given for the Standing Senate Committees on Legal and Constitutional Affairs and on Banking, Trade and Commerce to sit. Has the other committee, the chairman of which has just announced that it will sit at 3.30 p.m. on February 13, received permission to sit while the Senate is sitting?

Senator Langlois: Yes, it has.

Senator Flynn: Was general authorization given?

Senator Buckwold: Yes, general authorization was given.

Senator Langlois: It is a joint committee.

Motion agreed to.

[Later:]

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, as a result of the timely suggestion made last week by the Honourable Senator Molson, I wish to inform the Senate that the statement I made this afternoon on the work program for next week will be mailed at the earliest moment today, in both English and French, to the home addresses of honourable senators.

AIR CANADA

SERVICE BETWEEN ST. JOHN'S AND OTTAWA—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Senator Rowe: Honourable senators, I rise on a matter of privilege affecting the province of Newfoundland. The matter I wish to discuss concerns the quality of Air Canada's service between St. John's and Ottawa, both going and coming.

I preface my remarks by saying that generally speaking I have heard few complaints—I am sure my Newfoundland colleagues will corroborate this—about the quality of the service provided by Air Canada on the St. John's-Halifax, St. John's-Montreal, and St. John's-Toronto runs. But the St. John's-Ottawa service leaves much to be desired.

We should remind ourselves that we are talking about two capitals. There is a distinction between the relationship of a capital of a province and the capital of the nation and that which exists between a city in one province and a city in another province. I do not need to elaborate on that. I am sure it is obvious. Traffic between St. John's and Ottawa, going and coming, has increased considerably in recent years. In an average month between 1,000 and 1,200 passengers travel to and fro between St. John's and Ottawa. A considerable amount of this traffic is made up of members of Parliament and senior public servants.

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. As Senator Rowe knows, I have high esteem for him and personal friendship. However, I wonder if this is a matter of privilege. I think we are fairly free in our rules in this place and usually I appreciate that freedom. But it seems to me that we have means of dealing with this type of thing which are not available in other legislative bodies, such as the privilege of any honourable senator to institute an inquiry. It seems to me that a point of privilege usually involves our personal privilege as legislators. In all kindness, I do not think this is the method to raise a grievance of this type.

I am wondering whether other honourable senators and you, Madam Speaker, agree with my point.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I think the point of order raised by Senator Benidickson is well taken. It is important that we do not abuse our rules. However, if honourable senators are in agreement, leave can be given to Senator Rowe to proceed with this matter now because it does not appear that there is any other business to be proceeded with today. That is my suggestion. I agree that Senator Benidickson's point of order is entirely correct, but since the point has been made and it cannot be used as a precedent, I would be willing that unanimous consent be given for Senator Rowe to proceed.

Senator Benidickson: I simply want to make sure that it is not used as a precedent for rising on the basis of a point of privilege. Our practices are rather free—and I see no reason why they should not be—but I would be loath to think that a matter of our “privilege” could be repeated in this particular form. There are other ways matters which are fairly broad in application, and which affect more than members of Parliament, can be brought to our attention.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that Senator Rowe proceed now?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Rowe: Thank you, honourable senators. I thank Senator Benidickson for raising this matter and the Leader of the Opposition for his generous cooperation. I was under a misapprehension. Inasmuch as this is a service which affects to a serious degree the activities of members of Parliament—and in what I am saying I can assure you that I have the support of the Newfoundland members of both houses—I thought that this was a matter which could be raised on a point of privilege. However, I assure the house that I shall not take advantage of this and regard it as a precedent.

As I was saying, there are now between 1,000 and 1,200 passengers in the average month going and coming between St. John's and Ottawa, and a very considerable portion of that traffic is made up of members of both Houses of Parliament, who are travelling back and forth constantly. This is especially true of members of the other place. I do not need to point out that practically every weekend members of the other place go back to their constituencies. This also applies to senators. Senior public servants, both federal and provincial, also travel this route extensively. They are extremely busy people, to whom an hour's delay can sometimes represent a serious loss.

As schedules now stand, it is impossible to go from Ottawa to St. John's without using two or three planes with changes at Montreal and/or at Halifax to cover what is, in this jet age, a comparatively short distance, a thousand miles. That is a distance which can be covered by a DC9 or a DC8, or any of the jet planes for that matter, in just two hours, namely, from St. John's to Montreal, or from St. John's to Ottawa, a difference of only five minutes if they come direct, the difference between two hours and ten minutes and two hours and five minutes.

● (1420)

For many people, particularly members of Parliament, the trip from Ottawa to St. John's can be an ordeal. Most travellers complete their business in Ottawa in the late afternoon and want to get to St. John's that night, rather than undergo the expense and inconvenience of spending another night in Ottawa or Montreal, getting only part of a night's sleep.

Perhaps I might be allowed to make this personal reference. My own schedule this afternoon and evening is a good example of what I have in mind. Hopefully I shall take a plane at about 4.30 this afternoon with the intention of going to St. John's. I will go to Montreal and wait around there for a while—for how long, I do not know; it varies. I may have to wait an hour or two. I will then take a plane to Halifax. If that plane is on time, I will have to sit around at the Halifax terminal for three hours. It is too short a time to go into Halifax or Dartmouth. There is nothing to do but sit around, and then hopefully connect with the Toronto-St. John's flight, which lands at Halifax. I said hopefully, because very often that flight is late. If it is on time I will arrive at Torbay Airport at midnight; otherwise it will be one, two or three o'clock in the morning.

I would emphasize that to make what should be a two-hour flight, you have to take three planes, which triples the chances of mechanical or other trouble. Apart from that, it triples the possibility of the nuisance of having luggage mislaid. I do not need to remind honourable senators how often that happens when taking only one flight. When you have to take three flights, the possibility is multiplied.

I have heard, and I think it has been announced publicly, that this spring a Toronto-Charlottetown flight will call at Ottawa, coming and going. It is good to know that. No one will begrudge our Prince Edward Island friends this service. All we in Newfoundland are asking is that the service between St. John's and Ottawa by Air Canada be improved. We are not asking for something special. We are asking for a service equal to the Ottawa-Charlottetown service, the Ottawa-Halifax service and the Ottawa-Fredericton service. I do not think that is too much to ask. We are asking that the St. John's-Ottawa service, coming and going, be upgraded to the level of the services between Ottawa and the other three capitals of the Atlantic provinces.

Basically, this would entail boarding an airplane in Ottawa and disembarking from it at Torbay Airport in St. John's. How this can be arranged is for Air Canada to decide. I can think of a half-dozen options. For example, the flight from Toronto to Charlottetown, which is to begin in the spring, instead of terminating at Charlottetown could terminate at Torbay, which is only one hour further. Another choice would be the Toronto-St. John's flight, which at the present time calls in at Halifax. During the summer months there are several direct flights from Toronto to St. John's, because most of the traffic between Newfoundland and the mainland consists precisely of traffic between those two cities. Perhaps that flight could call in to Ottawa, to pick up the Newfoundland passengers from Ottawa in one direction and drop them off in the other. This would involve no more of a delay than 30 or 40 minutes, but it would be of tremendous convenience to Newfoundlanders. The important point to note is that the present set-up must be changed, so that people travelling from the capital of Newfoundland to the capital of the nation will be subject to fewer vexations and fewer inconveniences. One should realize that relatively large numbers of people are involved in this, because Torbay Airport serves a population of approximately 300,000 people.

Honourable senators may know that there are four or five airports serving Newfoundland. There is the great international airport at Gander, which serves the north-eastern part of Newfoundland; there is the great former American base at Stephenville, which serves the western part of Newfoundland, and there are some other smaller airports as well. But Torbay at St. John's serves not only the capital, which has a population of approximately 150,000, but the regional area which includes 300,000 people.

In making this request for an upgrading of this vital service, I feel confident that I have the support of all Newfoundland members of Parliament as well as of all those who have to make frequent trips between these two cities. Once more I would thank honourable senators for their tolerance in this matter.

Senator Carter: Honourable senators, may I just add one word in support of Senator Rowe's plea for a better and more convenient schedule of air services to St. John's from our national capital. Indeed, I should like to see an improvement in the entire service to Newfoundland and the establishment of better terminal facilities. Of the Maritime Provinces, Newfoundland is the farthest away from the national capital; it has the most inconvenient schedules, the poorest service, and the worst possible terminal facilities.

Senator Langlois: Moreover, you are an island.

Senator Carter: Yes, we are an island. But what makes the matter seem even worse is that Air Canada does have a service to Newfoundland which terminates at Gander, and if this flight were merely extended for a matter of 20 or 30 minutes it could take passengers on to St. John's without any particular inconvenience to others using the flight.

Senator Rowe would be wise to take the advice of Senator Flynn and initiate a regular inquiry on the broader subject of transportation. I think he had an inquiry on it during the previous session, but it died on the Order Paper. It would be wise for Senator Rowe to revive it at some convenient time.

CUSTOMS TARIFF, (NO. 2)

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Senator Cook moved the third reading of Bill C-39, to amend the Customs Tariff, (No. 2).

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, unless there is some urgency in passing this bill, and I believe there is not, I would move that the debate on third reading be adjourned. The reason is that answers were given by an official to certain questions I raised in the Senate, and the sponsor of the bill, Senator Cook, was good enough to let me have a look at the "blues." However, certain other questions have arisen in my mind which I would like to think about a little more. I would like to get in touch with the official, perhaps, to discuss some qualifications I might have to the answers he has given. I do not want to raise these matters without, if possible, consulting him, so I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 11, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

STATEMENT RE DECISION OF COMMITTEE TO TELEVIEW CERTAIN OF ITS PUBLIC HEARINGS

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, to which was referred Bill S-19, to amend the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Criminal Code, has decided to permit the televising of certain of the public hearings on this bill, or parts of such hearings, on an experimental basis and on the understanding that this will not constitute a precedent.

The committee has directed me to draw this decision to the attention of the Senate.

AUTHORITY OF COMMITTEE—QUESTION

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. Does a committee of the Senate have the authority to proceed in the manner that has just been indicated to us without the overall authority of the house?

Senator Perrault: I appreciate the question put by the honourable senator. This afternoon I undertook to obtain a legal opinion on this matter, and I am informed that the committee is within its rights, and acting within its powers, in taking the decision which it apparently has.

Senator Flynn: I would suggest, honourable senators, that this question should not be directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, but to the Senate itself.

Senator Prowse: Honourable senators, I am inclined to agree that it is something for which such authority cannot be given. Either the authority is there or it is not. I wonder whether the Leader of the Government or some other member of the Senate can suggest the procedure we should follow in order to give some legal basis for the acts that are proposed here.

Without arguing with the opinion, with which I am not familiar, I would be surprised if an agent has authority to do something which the principal has not given. Unless the Senate gives the committee, which is the agent of the Senate, authority to do certain things, to act in a certain way, I do not know where the committee gets the authority. I can think of no manner in which a Senate committee could agree to its hearings being televised without the express permission or authority of this house.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, I feel that the point of view of the honourable senator has some validity. I knew of the proposal to have television coverage of the proceedings of this committee because the Leader of the Government mentioned it, just in passing, last week. In my opinion it is an excellent idea, but I do think that if the Senate is to depart from its previous practice and give permission for television in any form, it should be by way of permission from the chamber. This will not be the first time our proceedings have been televised. On a previous occasion, if my memory serves me correctly, the matter was cleared and received the approval and assent of the Senate.

In my opinion we are jousting rather unnecessarily here. Personally, I am of the opinion that the television idea is a good one, and I would be glad to move that the Senate approve the committee's having its proceedings televised. I do not question the legal opinion but from the point of view of precedent I am of the opinion that we are on rather dangerous ground unless we give that permission. As I have said, I would move that this proposal be approved.

Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière): Honourable senators, I am inclined to think along the same lines as the honourable senator who spoke before me. If my recollection is correct, it is a well established principle in the Roman law and in our constitutional and civil law that delagatus non potest delagare—

[Translation]

—he who has been given a mandate cannot transmit it to anyone nor enlarge it.

[English]

Senator Macnaughton: Honourable senators, I should like to hear arguments for and against the proposal from the Chairman of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee as to why the committee thinks its proceedings should be televised, the reasons for and against the televising, and why the committee came to its conclusion.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I welcome the suggestion by the Leader of the Opposition that the inquiry is not directed so much at the Leader of the Government in the Senate, but that this is a matter of interest to honourable senators generally.

It seems to me that there is no motion before the house. The chairman of the committee merely reported the decision taken by the committee. I presume the chairman of the committee is reporting to the house on an action taken by the committee, with the guidance of the legal counsel of that committee, buttressed by an opinion given this afternoon by Mr. Fortier, who occupies a position of some importance in counselling the actions of this body.

I suggest, honourable senators, that the action of the committee is legal, but there is no motion before the house. Indeed, I question whether it is appropriate, necessary or proper for a motion regarding the committee's decision to be moved, debated, and voted upon this evening.

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, I have listened with great interest to the different opinions which have been expressed. Although I agree with some that the television media can distort the proceedings of the Senate, I am sure the people of Canada would be much more interested in the proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs in its study of Bill S-19, because it will bring to the attention of the country the fact that the Senate is a useful instrument, and is prepared to discuss and debate intelligently the particular amendments before it regarding the use of cannabis or marihuana. If honourable senators were to vote on this matter as a body, they would be infringing on the rights of a committee to determine whether its deliberations should or should not be televised. This is a matter entirely up to the committee in question.

Senator Molson says he would be happy to initiate a resolution before the Senate. I do not agree with that. I think it is entirely up to the committee itself. If the committee wants to crucify itself, all well and good. A committee examining a piece of legislation has the right to determine whether or not its deliberations should or should not be televised, and if the media, in their good judgment, decide to pick highlights out which will be derogatory to the Senate itself, then let them do so.

Senator Denis: Honourable senators, may I direct a question to the chairman of the committee? Was a vote taken on this subject and, if so, what was the result?

[Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière).]

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, it is a little more than that. When I reported what the committee decided to do today, I was not speaking for myself. This matter was referred to me after a request had been received to televise, and I referred it to the committee. The committee made its decision.

Senator Denis wants to know whether there was a vote. Yes, there was a vote on a motion, and the statement I made is substantially the motion which was approved by the committee. I expressed no personal view in the matter, but I did take counsel and was told that the committee had the authority to decide to televise some of its proceedings.

Senator Denis: That does not answer my question. If a vote was taken, I should like to know how many were in favour of the motion and how many were against.

Senator Flynn: It makes no difference.

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, I think that is wrong. The deliberations of this particular committee, to the preponderance of young people in this country, are very important. I have talked to many of these young people and they say, "Well, we have tried it; we don't like it."

An Hon. Senator: What are you talking about now?

Senator Riley: I am talking about the televising of some of the proceedings of the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, which is presently considering Bill S-19, to amend the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Criminal Code as they relate to marihuana or cannabis. These proceedings are of great importance to the young people of this country, and they should be entitled to see them on television.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, may I offer a solution to this problem? It is obviously a matter of our rules. In looking at our rules I see nothing that would prohibit the committee from televising its meetings. However, if the Senate is not in agreement with such a decision, I suggest that any senator could be given permission to revert to Notices of Motions and under rule 45 give notice for an instruction to a committee not to televise its meetings, as provided for in rule 45(1)(e), which states:

45.(1) One day's notice shall be given of any of the following motions:

(e) for an instruction to a committee;—

So, if there is an objection, any senator can move that an instruction be given to the committee not to televise its sittings. In that way, the question could be solved. I am quite sure the chairman of the committee in question would not arrange for a meeting before the Senate decided on the matter.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, may I try to bring this to a head as a point of order? I believe the discussion as to whether it is good or bad that, on this bill, in this particular committee, there be coverage by television is totally irrelevant. It has nothing to do with the question I had in mind.

As a point of order, I would ask Madam Speaker to determine whether it is appropriate for a committee of this house to agree or arrange on its own for television coverage, which is precedent setting. It is the back door approach into this chamber. I would ask that there be a decision on the appropriateness of such a move under the rules of this house. It seems to me that no committee can on its own decide such an important matter and establish a precedent that could in the longer term become binding upon this chamber. I think it is a very dangerous approach. If this is to be done, certainly it should be done with the majority agreement of this chamber and not in the committee.

I would ask, Madam Speaker, that you take this under advisement and give us your view at a later date.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, speaking to the point of order raised by Senator McElman, with due respect to you, Madam Speaker, I hesitate to accept the proposition that you can rule on a decision taken in committee. I think the suggestion made by Senator McElman is out of order and should not be accepted. The committees are masters of their own proceedings, and, with due respect, I do not think the Chair in this chamber can interfere with any decision taken by the committees. The Senate as a whole can, as has been suggested by the Leader of the Opposition on the motion made in this house, decide to instruct a committee to act otherwise, but beyond that I do not think the Honourable Speaker of the Senate has any power to overrule a decision taken by a committee.

Senator Riley: I should like to point out that the committee is the master of its own destiny.

Senator Molson: No, it is not.

Senator Riley: Then abolish all committees. I would point out that proceedings in the Australian Parliament are televised. Irrespective of Senator McElman's point of order, the Senate as a body has the power to restrict the possibility of the proceedings of the Senate being televised, but it has no power to restrict the televising of the proceedings of a committee.

Senator Desruisseaux: As far as I am concerned, the question that has arisen this evening stems from what I have read in the Ottawa Journal. I will quote from one paragraph:

● (2020)

The proposal to get television cameras to cover Senate activities reportedly was first suggested by Senate Government Leader Ray Perrault late last week.

I agree fully with him as to the beneficial effects of having some of the committee meetings televised. I am fully in agreement with televising the proceedings of the committee. But it says here that, "It was subsequently approved by the Liberal Senate caucus." Well, that makes it a caucus situation, and regardless of political affiliation I do not think that is proper. The Senate should be able to establish the procedures which must be followed by all committees with respect to whether they wish to go outside any of the accepted procedures in use. I suppose they can, if they clear it. I would think that the clearance of it would be done through the Senate. We should not make too much of an issue of all this, but there is a lesson to be learned from it.

Senator Denis: Honourable senators, may I ask the chairman of the committee if he has been empowered by the Senate to make such an inquiry?

Senator Goldenberg: What inquiry?

Senator Denis: Have you been empowered to request that we should have the proceedings of the committee televised? I would refer honourable senators to rule 71, which reads:

A standing committee shall be empowered to inquire into and report upon such matters as are referred to it from time to time by the Senate, and shall be authorized to send for persons, papers and records, whenever required, and to print from day to day such papers and evidence as may be ordered by it.

If the chairman of the committee has not been empowered by the Senate to inquire into this question, then I think it is out of order.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, with the greatest of respect to others who have spoken in a contrary sense, on the point of order I would like to suggest that a committee is surely master of its own proceedings unless it does something flagrantly contrary to the rules of the Senate. A committee, to the best of my belief, can always meet in camera and decide not to hold certain sittings in public. It can decide on the other hand, as it ordinarily does as a matter of course, that the press should be present. I should have thought that it was equally entitled to decide that the television cameras should be present. That seems to me to be the simple essence of the point of order, unless there is some rule in our rule book that forbids this, and I am not aware of the existence of such a rule.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, may I draw the attention of the Senate to rule 73, which says:

Members of the public may attend any meeting of a committee of the Senate, unless the committee otherwise orders.

I would think a television crew consists of members of the public.

Senator Prowse: It does not say anything about taking pictures.

Senator Riley: Madam Speaker, my attention has been drawn—

Senator Grosart: Order. Order.

Senator Riley: You can shout "Order!" all you want, but I have the right to speak. This is a point of order. It is not a debate.

Senator Asselin: Did you not speak once on this matter?

Senator Riley: Yes, but this is a point of order, and it is a very important one as far as I am concerned. It is very important to the people of this country, and if honourable senators want to sit back on their rumps—

Senator Grosart: Order! Order!

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Riley: There is nothing unparliamentary in what I have said.

Nothing in any of the rules has yet been pointed out to contradict what Senator Godfrey has just said, that the public are entitled to attend the meetings of the committee. I think committees have the right to determine whether or not the public can attend, as members of the press can determine whether to report the proceedings. Reporters can attend, members of the other place can attend, and the public can attend. In these circumstances, why not television, if the committee has decided that the proceedings should be televised? The people of the country are entitled to know—particularly on this subject, which is of great concern to the young people of the country—what the Senate thinks of the amendments to the Criminal Code and other statutes with respect to cannabis.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I think we are getting away from the basic matter of discussion before the Senate. Rule 27 is as follows:

A senator may speak to any question before the Senate—

There is no question before the Senate.

—on a question of privilege—

And there is no question of privilege before the Senate.

—or upon a point of order—

There was a point of order; indeed, there have been several.

—or upon a motion or an inquiry, or in making a mere interrogation, but not otherwise except with the consent of a majority of the Senate which shall be given or withheld without debate.

I think we have had an infraction of the rules by one senator speaking four or five times. I would suggest that the way to resolve this, perhaps, is by resorting to rule 33.

I may say that I agree with Senator Molson. I am entirely in favour of the committee's televising its proceedings. However, I do not think this is the point at issue before the Senate. The point is whether it should be done without the consent of the Senate. This is the point that Senator Molson raised, and I think it is a legitimate point.

One senator said that the Senate has no power to restrict the powers of a committee. Of course the Senate has the power to deal with its own proceedings, its own actions, and the actions of its committees. I think that is incontrovertible. Most certainly the Senate has that power.

The question is whether, in this particular instance, the Senate should exercise that power. I suggest, therefore, that we refer to rule 33, and deal with this as a matter of privilege, which I think was the implication in Senator Prowse's question, and perhaps the implication in the question raised by Senator Molson. Rule 33 is:

When a matter or question directly concerning the privileges of the Senate, of any committee thereof, or of any senator, has arisen, a motion calling upon the Senate to take action thereon may be moved without notice and, until decided, shall, unless the debate be adjourned, suspend the consideration of other motions and of the orders of the day.

I suggest that if Senator Molson wishes to proceed with his motion under rule 33 he may so proceed without notice, and if he wishes to move the motion I suggest that he would be perfectly in order in so doing.

Senator Riley: Then the Senate should be reformed.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, I raised a point of order, with all respect to those who have spoken.

[Senator Riley.]

That point of order has not yet been disposed of. Before it is disposed of by Madam Speaker, I would simply suggest to the house that at one stage in the not too recent past this house made a decision that it would not permit the televising of its proceedings. It would seem to me that such a decision by this house would be binding upon its committees. It would be a precedent governing the procedures of committees until such time as a contrary decision is taken by this house. I would suggest, therefore, before any other means of getting through the back door is sought, that Madam Speaker consider very seriously the point of order raised. Before this debate wanders any further, it should be kept in mind that there is a point of order to be disposed of.

● (2030)

MOTION TO APPROVE DECISION OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, I agree with the Leader of the Government that it is not really the normal practice to ask Madam Speaker to rule on a point of this sort, because it is the collective will and the collective judgment of the Senate which must decide. In saying that let me make it quite clear that I have no question about Madam Speaker's good judgment that she would bring to bear on this question. I support my friend in seeking to appeal to have this matter ruled upon, but I do not think the suggested way is fair or right, and I do not think it is the way the Senate has operated or the way that it has historically been constituted. I believe that when an issue of this sort comes up it has to be decided in accordance with the collective will of the members of the chamber presided over by the Honourable the Speaker.

In this case we have now got far away from this argument; we have got thoroughly out of order, as Senator Grosart has pointed out. This is not, perhaps, very important as long as it is useful. But, as he also points out, under rule 33 a situation such as this is specifically covered. I do not think we are debating the merits of television coverage of a committee of interest. Senator Riley has been making the point that the public is interested in the consideration of the bill. There is no doubt whatever about the public's interest in the matter before this committee, and I am sure that is the reason Senator Perrault suggested that television coverage was desirable. That is why I agree that it is an excellent thing to do. The only point I question is this: Over the years that I have been in the Senate, the subject of televising the proceedings here and, from hearsay, in the House of Commons, has been raised quite often. In committees we have at times had some television coverage, but I do not believe that we are wise to have one of our committees taking action to create such a precedent without the general blessing of the house. I am sure it would be freely and cheerfully given. That is why I suggested that if it were any help in resolving the argument as to whether it was right or wrong, I would be happy to move that the actions of the Chairman of the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs in inviting television coverage of the proceedings of his committee be approved by this chamber. Senator Macdonald has suggested that he would like to second this motion, and if this proposal meets the consensus of the chamber, then under rule 33 I would so move.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, first of all may I suggest that there is no resistance, so far as I can see, in any part of the house to the proposal which has just been advanced. However, I question the words "the actions of the chairman of the committee" in the proposed wording. I think the words, "the actions of the committee" would be more appropriate and accurate.

Earlier this evening reference was made to a newspaper item which said that the idea was mine. Let me give you briefly the chronology of events. Before I do so, however, I should like to remind honourable senators that precisely the same type of debate once surrounded the idea of allowing a Hansard report of the proceedings of parliamentary assemblies. At one particular time in the evolution of parliamentary democracy the public galleries were peopled, as senators may recall from history, by certain reporters with exceptional memories. They attempted to remember the speeches of honourable members and then they developed their newspaper accounts and other accounts from these memory "transcripts." Then parliamentary democracy accepted the idea of permitting members of the fourth estate to report on the activities of parliamentary chambers. The proposal to televise may be a natural evolution of that concept. I happen to believe that it is. However, be that as it may, the current idea to televise came originally from the press gallery here in Ottawa. I was contacted by a member of the press who said that from coast to coast throughout Canada there was unprecedented interest in this particular debate about canabais, that this is one of the great emotional issues affecting Canadians in all provinces. And, because this is one of the most important committee activities in years on Parliament Hill, I was asked whether I thought, as Leader of the Government in the Senate, that it would be appropriate to have these proceedings televised.

My first action was to contact the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs and report the conversation to him. I said, "The idea has been advanced from the press gallery, and I leave it with you to decide what you may or may not wish to do with it."

I have discussed this proposal with Her Majesty's Leader of the Opposition in this chamber. I say this to assure honourable senators that in no way has there been any attempt by me to impose a unilateral opinion or personal decision on any committee or on this chamber which is, of course, the master of its own destiny.

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, if I may add one word, I think Senator Molson unintentionally referred to the "actions taken by the chairman of the committee." I took no action, as chairman of the committee, nor has the committee taken any action apart from making the decision. No arrangements for television were made and the committee instructed me to inform the Senate of the decision, presumably because the committee wanted to hear the reaction of the Senate.

So, I assure the Senate that there has been no action taken and no arrangements made of any kind for televising, because we wanted to get the Senate's reaction to the statement I made.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. There is no motion before the Chair. The question has not been put. Therefore, I suggest that before honourable senators continue to speak, the Speaker should put the question on the motion that Senator Molson made.

Senator Petten: If there is a motion before the house and Senator Molson speaks, then that closes the debate on the motion.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, I have a point of order before the house. In order that the house can proceed and deal with an appropriate motion, I shall now withdraw my point of order.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps it should be pointed out that there is a motion before the house, but not a question. There is a great difference in our rules between a motion and a question.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, before the question is put, I want to point out that I have been corrected in my phrasing of the motion both by the Leader of the Government and by the chairman of the committee. I would be the last person in this chamber to bandy the choice of words with the chairman of the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs or with the Leader of the Government. I am delighted to change the wording of my motion.

If it is acceptable, I now move, pursuant to rule 33, that the Senate do approve the decision of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to permit the televising of certain of its proceedings on an experimental basis only.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I regret to say that I will oppose this motion, and I hope that the Senate will not adopt it. After all, we are asked to approve something that may create a precedent. I am in favour in this particular case of having occasional meetings of this committee televised. I understand all the reasons that have been advanced in favour of this. However, I say again to the Senate that if this proves to be a bad precedent the decision which we are called upon to make tonight will be with us for several years. If we do not say anything with respect to the report made by the chairman of the committee, that it has decided to allow some of its meetings to be televised, the Senate then remains free in the future to decide otherwise. That is why I suggested—

Senator Molson: No—

Senator Flynn: I do not care if you are in agreement with me or not, Senator Molson. However, I say to you that instructions to the committee not to proceed would have been the proper method of doing it. If we are all in agreement, why should we, as a Senate, say yes, when we do not wish to do so? We should not take a position that will bind us in the future. What we are discussing here now was done previously by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I do not wish to approve or disapprove the decision of the committee and I do not think we will be doing anything of that kind by rejecting this motion. We could simply have allowed the committee to proceed, if it so desires. But, by approving this motion, we are indicating to every other committee that whenever they wish their meetings to be televised we must approve unless we have special reasons to disapprove. In my opinion, it would be a bad precedent for the Senate to approve this motion and indicate to the committee that if it wishes to do what it has in mind that will be acceptable to us. In my opinion, we are wrong in setting this precedent; we are wrong in giving permission.

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, I have no strong personal feelings at the moment, but I do feel, as does Senator McElman, that this is setting a precedent. I do not believe it is a matter which should be decided tonight without notice, immediately after introduction of the subject. For that reason alone I am simply rising to adjourn the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Benidickson, seconded by the Honourable Senator Croll, that the debate on the motion be adjourned.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Grosart: On division.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those who are in favour, say yea.

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those who are opposed, say nay.

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the yeas have it. Motion agreed to, on division, and debate adjourned.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-370, to amend the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Petten moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next.

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS TARIFF (NO. 2)

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 6, the debate on third reading of Bill C-39, to amend the Customs Tariff, (No. 2).

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, in what I hope may be a somewhat calmer atmosphere of the Senate, I beg your indulgence to make a few comments on the motion for the third reading of this bill.

[Senator Flynn.]

The bill was given second reading by the Senate, and immediately referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, which met the next morning. Mr. J. Loomer, Director, Tariffs, Tariffs Trade and Aid Branch of the Department of Finance, was good enough to appear before the committee and make some comments with respect to one or two questions I had raised in connection with this bill. Mr. Loomer was in the gallery at that time and took notes of the comments I made, and I am most grateful to him for going to that trouble. It was a courtesy to the Senate that this important official came here, listened to the comments that were made on second reading, and the next morning, before our Hansard was available, answered the questions I had raised. In my opinion, his answers were excellent. I might qualify that by saying they were excellent departmental answers. He gave the answers that one would have expected from the department.

I would, however, like to make a few comments. First of all, I did raise the question as to whether this bill should be properly described as a major thrust in the anti-inflation program of the government. Senator Cook, the sponsor of the bill, told us that it refers to approximately $1 billion-worth of imports. I have since been able to ascertain that the average decrease in tariffs is approximately 5 per cent, which might total approximately $50 million of decreases in tariffs. The only figure against which we might put this amount, if we are to assess its impact, is that of our gross national expenditure which in 1972, which is the last year for which I have seen complete figures, was well over $100 billion. We might, therefore, be dealing with something like one-twentieth of one per cent of the gross national expenditure which might be affected by these tariff reductions. Therefore, I repeat my doubt as to whether this is a major thrust against the inflation problem. If it is any kind of brake on inflation, then of course we must welcome it. On the other hand, it is fair to point out that it is becoming the fashion to describe almost any bill as part of the anti-inflation program, whether it is or not. I merely say that I have serious doubts whether these particular decreases in customs tariffs will have any effect whatsoever on the inflation problem.

I have asked the question—I asked it when I spoke on second reading, and I have asked it since—whether there is any follow-up, whether the government says, “We are reducing these tariffs to bring down prices.” Is there any follow-up? Does anyone say they really will bring down prices?

I am told that after the tariff and tax reductions in 1973, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs made some studies and satisfied itself that there was some relation between the intention of the government in reducing taxes and tariffs and the impact on the consumer price index. I would suggest now that it would be very important to follow up these kinds of tariff reductions. Surely it would make a lot of sense if the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, or someone, followed up these tariff reductions.

Senator Benidickson: Or excise tax reductions.

Senator Grosart: I am dealing now only with the Customs Tariff reductions. There is another bill before us on excise tax. I would have to make a distinction between excise tax and excise duties on the one hand and Customs Tariff reductions on the other. They are not quite the same thing.

However, it seems to me that we should follow this up. Here is a $50 million reduction in the cost mainly of commodities coming into Canada. Someone should follow this up and ask, "Are these reductions passed on?" I have not been able to find out if there is any definite program for doing this in this particular instance. It is very important that something like that should be done.

The second question that I raised was in connection with the generalized preferences tariff, where we found that Canada had undertaken to grant very special preferences to the developing countries. Over the years we have had a rather bad record in this connection. As far back as ten years ago we managed somehow to make the developing countries very annoyed with us because we took a very strong stand against generalized preferences for developing countries.

We had our reasons for doing that. It immediately followed the first United Nations trade and development conference—UNCTAD. When the developing nations urged the developed nations to introduce the generalized preferences, we resisted this very strongly. I am not saying that we did not have good reasons for doing so, but we did resist.

Over the years we have lagged behind. Even the European Community moved in to grant these preferences to developing countries before we did, despite the fact that we think of the common economic tariff (CET), and the common agricultural program (CAP), as tending to be more protectionist than we would like to see them. It is true that we are a little ahead of the Americans. The Americans have not quite got off the ground with these generalized preferences to developing countries, but this seems to be merely a matter of their getting the intentions of government through Congress.

My third point was in connection with the UNESCO Convention, sometimes called the Beirut Convention. I raised the question whether the UNESCO Convention was being fully honoured in Canada. We had taken a position in this connection, and I said we had reneged on it. I am still inclined to feel that we did.

The parliamentary secretary, in introducing that bill in the other place, said, as reported at page 2523 of House of Commons Hansard, that we had absolutely no authority whatsoever to prohibit the importation into Canada of certain goods so long as they were covered by the Beirut Convention of 1948. The parliamentary secretary at that time told the other place:

The convention provides that they come in free of duty, and there is no discretion allowed the host country. Once you sign the convention, the products must come in free.

I raised some doubts about that. Mr. Loomer, I think quite rightly, clarified the situation by saying almost the opposite. He said:

The convention provides that the final authority to decide whether an imported product should be accorded the duty-free entry privilege contemplated by the convention rests with the appropriate governmental agency of the importing country.

I suggest that the information on which I based my remarks, as given by the parliamentary secretary, was unwittingly misleading. It is easy to understand the confusion that arose here, because actually, as it has been explained to me since, the convention permits the importing country to have the final decision, but we in Canada, in our Customs Tariff, had not implemented this and had not therefore taken the authority to give us the full sanction to which we were entitled under the convention. That disposes of that point. I would say on my part, and on the part of others, that it was a mere semantic misunderstanding. I am very grateful to Mr. Loomer for clearing this up.

I then raised doubts on the question of the extension of the regulatory authority in the general matter of handicrafts. I am not quite satisfied with the explanation given here. Mr. Loomer did point out, as I had pointed out, that there were precedents for this rather large extension of the ministerial discrimination, one of which provided for a ministerial discretion where the goods coming into Canada are to be used in processing by Canadian manufacturers, and another where the ministerial discretion was extended to situations where it might be needed to negotiate concessional advantages with another country. But I suggest that this extension is still what I called, when I spoke on second reading, a case of "creeping precedents."

As Mr. Loomer pointed out, there are limitations in the two precedents. He did not say there were limitations in this one. He said there was a clear definition, which is not quite the same thing. This, of course, raises the question of the function of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. The committee is authorized to affirm or to refuse to affirm to Parliament the intra vires, if I may use that phrase, of government actions under a regulation, but is not authorized to go beyond that and to say whether Parliament should have passed the regulation or not.

I am going to suggest to that committee it is important that in the future it look very carefully at the powers given by regulations. There is already an obvious tendency—perhaps just by draftsmen—to expand discretionary regulatory powers given to a minister for the purpose of fending off the joint committee, if I may use that phrase. In other words, they say, "We will make these discretionary regulatory powers as wide as possible so that the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will not be able to move in and say, 'You have gone beyond the regulatory powers.'" That, I think, is a very real danger which confronts us in the whole matter of delegated legislation.

Finally, I did ask some questions about items dropped from the budget. In that respect, I am quite satisfied with the explanation given that those were of a protectionist nature. As Senator Cook pointed out, because of a slowdown in the building and housing industry, it was necessary to retain a certain protection for Canadian producers in those areas, even though the tariff reductions had been suggested in the budget of May 6. The explanation I was given, I find entirely satisfactory.

Again, I say I am grateful to the committee for the careful examination given to the points I raised, and particularly to Mr. Loomer for coming before the committee, as he did, to give the necessary explanations. Even though I cannot fully agree with him, it was a gesture on which I think the Senate is entitled to compliment him, as well as the department.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

AGING

THE ANATOMY OF A SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE REPORT— DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, November 28, 1974, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Croll, calling the attention of the Senate to the anatomy of a special Senate committee report, and in particular to (a) its evaluation, (b) its beneficial results, and (c) as a follow-up, to a suggested future course of action for the Senate.

Hon. Muriel McQueen Fergusson: Honourable senators, I agree with Senator Carter, who preceded me in this debate, that the public generally, as well as all members of Parliament, should be grateful to Senator Croll for making available to us the excellent analysis and report on the various actions which have been taken to put into effect the recommendations of the Special Senate Committee on Aging. This report refutes completely claims so often heard that Senate committees and their reports are useless, that no attention is paid to them, and that after they have been submitted they are simply put on a shelf to gather dust.

Senator Croll's novel idea of having an analysis made of the results which followed the publication of the report of the Special Senate Committee on Aging was an excellent one. As he told us in his speech in this chamber on October 22 last, which appears at page 146 of Hansard, he encountered considerable difficulty in getting support for this unusual project. That must have been very discouraging for him. However, his persistent search for help was rewarded when the Parliamentary Librarian, Mr. Erik Spicer, and Mr. Philip Laundy, Director of the Research Branch of the Parliamentary Library, appreciating the value of such a report to Parliament and to the public, assigned Miss M.A. Carroll and later Mrs. Barbara Reynolds, researchers on the library staff, to this project.

As honourable senators are aware, those two individuals produced an excellent document which was printed as an appendix to Senate Hansard of October 22, 1974. The information in the report is of great interest to many people throughout Canada who, largely through the publicity given the hearings of the special committee, became aware that in this country, as well as in many other countries of the world, the increasing number of senior citizens in the population is presenting certain problems.

I mailed a number of copies of Senate Hansard of October 22, 1974 containing that report to many friends, as was suggested by Senator Croll, all of whom expressed appreciation and asked for more copies. However, I should like to see that report made available to the public in a separate booklet, which could be done through Information Canada. The very fact that the report proves results do come from the work and recommendations of Senate committees would amply justify such an expenditure.

For years I have been aware of the increasing need for research staff in the Library of Parliament, and as a member of the Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament for the past 20 years, I have always supported the hiring of such staff. The work done on this analysis of the report of the Special Senate Committee on Aging by researchers from the library staff strengthens my belief that such research staff members are invaluable to our work in Parliament. Like Senator Carter, I see the need for highly trained, highly qualified research personnel on the staff of the Senate, as well as more researchers on the library staff, for the library staff must, of course, serve the members of both Houses of Parliament and have many calls on their time.

I support Senator Croll's suggestion that the Senate make a similar study and analysis of other valuable reports of its special committees. This would bring to the attention of Parliament and the public the excellent recommendations that have been made by other Senate committees. Those recommendations were arrived at through the expenditure of much thought by highly qualified and competent people. Surely, it would be worth the time and effort of honourable senators to bring those recommendations once again before Parliament and the public for re-assessment.

Honourable senators, the number of elderly people in Canada's population is increasing. In October 1974, at a symposium in Winnipeg on the "Dilemmas of Modern Man," Dr. Nathan Shock, chief of the Gerontology Research Centre at Baltimore City Hospital, pointed out that in 1900 the average age at death for males was 46 and for females 48. He said the average male now lives 69 years, and the average female 76 years. At the same symposium, Sir Ferguson Anderson, Professor of Geriatric Medicine at the University of Glasgow, said that the world population of elderly persons has been increasing rapidly, and based on 1970 figures it is estimated that the world population of those of 60 years of age and over will more than double by the end of the century. Very little research has been done in Canada on how to deal with this drastic change, which has produced new health and social problems.

In discussing research in this field at the symposium Dr. Shock said:

Research will not produce a fountain of youth, but it will help to make old age, those added years, more productive and more fun.

Dr. Shock is also reported to have said that there must be changes in attitudes "which downgrade elderly people and deny them access to full participation in society." He also said that a "meaningful social role" for the elderly could do as much to improve the quality of their lives as research into the diseases of old age.

Sir Ferguson Anderson stressed the need for specialized geriatric training for doctors, nurses and paramedics.

At the same symposium, Dr. Helena Lapoto, Chairman of the Department of Sociology in Chicago's Loyola University, discussed the sociological aspects of aging. She stressed that the strength of the "Protestant work ethic," which is that work is virtuous and leisure is wasteful, has made retirement from work a traumatic experience. Dr. Lapoto suggested that society's classification of "over 60 or 65" and idealization of physical beauty and muscular strength have resulted in an automatic cut-off date, which usually occurs prior to physical and mental deterioration.

As I said when speaking in this chamber on October 24, 1974, reported at page 186 of Hansard, during the sixties the interest in aging aroused by the special committee of the Senate, and the Committee on Aging of the Canadian Welfare Council, now the Council on Social Development, resulted in a national conference on aging in Toronto, and also a number of provincial conferences. It is now felt that further national discussions on this matter should take place. At a meeting of the provincial ministers of social welfare in Winnipeg a few months ago, the Honourable Catherine Callbeck, Minister of Social Welfare for Prince Edward Island, and her deputy, Mr. J. Eldon Green, proposed that a national consultation on aging should be held. Later this month a preliminary meeting of officials and observers will take place in Toronto to give further consideration to plans for such a consultation. The consultation is being held under the direction of Mr. Lawrence Crawford, Executive Director of the Ontario Office on Aging, who was consultant to the Ontario Select Committee on Aging, and who is very highly regarded in the fields of social service and gerontology throughout Canada and internationally.

The Legislature of Ontario in 1964 appointed a select committee on Aging, which made its third and final report in 1967. This committee heard many submissions and made 180 visits to major facilities. In 1966 an Office on Aging was set up in Ontario under the Department of Public Welfare, largely through the efforts of that select committee.

On page 45 of the analysis of the Report of the Special Senate Committee on Aging 1966, reference is made to that select committee of the Ontario Legislature in the following words:

Its final report in 1967 reiterated the views of the Special Senate Committee on Aging and 60 per cent of the recommendations of that committee—

That is, this select committee.

—have been fully or partially implemented. Those not implemented are considered "not practical for Ontario alone without cooperative changes at the federal level or are no longer applicable".

This, I believe, is the number of recommendations of the Ontario select committee implemented up to December 1974, but it seems to me that 60 per cent is a very good record.

A special branch or division in the Department of National Health and Welfare concerned with health care of the aged was the subject of recommendation 34 of the special Senate committee. Press and other reports have mentioned the need for such a department of geriatrics.

No such branch or department has been established as yet, and there is nothing on the "health" side of the Department of National Health and Welfare to correspond with the "consultant on aging" within the Welfare Research Division of the department. However, as you will have seen on page 58 of the analysis of the Senate committee report, Dr. Kozakiewicz, Senior Consultant, Rehabilitation of Health Standards and Consultants of the Health Programs Branch, is heading a committee on aging. Two main sections of this committee are studying community services and education. The community services committee will report on the nature and extent of services available to the aged in the community. The education committee will investigate what educational facilities are available to doctors, nurses and psychiatrists so they can work effectively with the aged.

Because of the increase in the proportion of elderly persons in our population, because there is rapid growth in knowledge about the special requirements of health care for the elderly, because the attitudes and knowledge of technical skills of medical doctors affects the quality of health care, and, more important, because there is minimal representation of geriatric content in the organized teaching in the curriculum of most Canadian faculties of medicine, one of the projects of the education committee is to formulate recommendations regarding the detail of curriculum content of geriatrics for faculties of medicine of Canadian universities. If the recommendations of the committee are approved by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, they will be presented to a meeting of the Association of Deans of Faculties of Medicine to be held in conjunction with the meeting of the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Canada.

This is a great step forward and, if approved and adopted, should ensure that graduates and post-graduates of Canadian medical schools have up-to-date knowledge of the latest developments in the field of geriatrics. More education on this subject should also be included in the curriculum of schools of nursing and in the training of nurses aides.

For some years now the Victorian Order of Nurses has given special attention to nursing in the field of aging, but so far as I know this is a subject not stressed very much in nursing education. I hope that the committee investigating this will make recommendations in this area, too.

Among matters that are to be considered at the preliminary meeting to plan for a national consultation on aging is the subject of a national institute on gerontology, a subject which is receiving considerable attention and support in Canada. There is a precedent in that at present there are in existence several crown corporations. Aging is certainly a matter of universal concern, and improvements in geriatric medicine and in the social well-being of the aged will benefit not only those who are elderly today, but everyone else tomorrow. We should all be interested in this.

Since 1963, in the United States the presidents have designated the month of May as "Senior Citizens' Month." Even before 1963 the governors of many of the states had proclaimed May as "Senior Citizens' Month," during which time special attention is paid to senior citizens.

About a year ago the United States changed the term "senior citizens" to "older Americans," which I think sounds a little better.

One recommendation of the Ontario Select Committee on Aging was to set aside one week as Senior Citizens' Week. Ontario has adopted this recommendation, and now observes the third week in June as Senior Citizens' Week.

I certainly would like to see such a week, or at least some period of time, set aside for observance throughout Canada. This year the theme in Ontario for Senior Citizens' Week will be "time of our lives." The main purpose is to point out that retirement may be one of two things: It can be a time of fun and enjoyment because of increased leisure, or it can be a time of increasing boredom and frustration.

Honourable senators, I know I have wandered a bit from Senator Croll's motion, but I hoped that you might be interested to hear of some of the things that are currently taking place in Canada in this field of aging.

Again, before closing, I would like to say that I support Senator Croll's suggestion that we should take a sober second look at committee recommendations that have not yet been acted upon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as no other senator wishes to participate in this debate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

THE WORK ETHIC IN CANADA

PROPOSED SPECIAL COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Croll calling the attention of the Senate to the status of the "work ethic" in Canada today, and the need for the establishment of a Senate Committee to examine and report thereon.—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, as this is my inquiry may I say a word on it?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, has Honourable Senator Croll leave to speak?

Senator Flynn: Are you closing the debate?

Senator Croll: I am not closing it. I am just going to say a word or two on it.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Croll: The inquiry stands in my name and the usual practice is to place an inquiry, have it debated and then move a motion. Since there are no further speakers, the inquiry dies on the Order Paper.

I wanted to thank Senator Asselin and Senator Carter for their contributions, for their understanding and for their indication that there was need for examination. But it is quite evident to me that there is not sufficient interest or concern or dedication to the study in the Senate, and there is lack of public interest. So I rise to say that I will not now move the motion to establish the committee. However, anyone who wishes to do so is at liberty to do so.

Senator Flynn: The time will come.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I do not know if any comment from me is in order, because I presume Senator Croll, having given notice of the inquiry and having just spoken on it, has closed the debate. However, if that is not the case, I should like to make one comment. I do not think the fact that the inquiry may die on the Order Paper is any indication of a lack of interest in the Senate in this very important subject. The fact of the matter is, of course, that the Committee on National Finance is engaged most actively in an inquiry into this very matter. It is now studying the whole manpower policy of the Government of Canada.

On behalf of the chairman of that committee I think I should say that there is no suggestion whatsoever that that committee is not interested in this most broad and important question of the work ethic. It is. This, of course, will be the subject of questioning and the taking of evidence in that committee. So I think Senator Croll should not be in any way discouraged. There is perhaps just a slight conflict here. If I can speak for myself, I should say that I know many other senators are actively interested in this most important question of the relation of the work ethic to certain problems we have in connection with what we all hope in due course—perhaps under another government—will be full employment.

The Hon. the Speaker: The debate may still be adjourned but, honourable senators, if there is no other senator who wishes to participate in this debate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Copies of proposed amendments to Bill C-49, An Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax, issued by the Department of Finance.

EXCISE TAX ACT AND EXCISE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, February 5, the debate on the motion of Senator Macnaughton for second reading of Bill C-40, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, Senator Macnaughton did his customary masterful job in speaking to the second reading of Bill C-40. However, I would say his task was made a little easier on this occasion because the bill provides for a reduction in federal sales taxes of an amount estimated at $940 million for a full year. The manner in which he introduced it soft-pedalled the fact that the bill provides for new taxes or increased taxes. The reduction is estimated at $940 million, which is an impressive amount, but there is also an addition of revenues for the government by way of new taxes or increased taxes estimated at $160 million. So, on the whole, the amount of the reduction ends up below $780 million.

I can find no fault, of course, with the idea of reducing taxes in order to combat inflation. These measures spring from the November budget which had as its objective to reduce the rate of inflation. But already the Minister of Finance has indicated that the November budget is a bit outdated. Of course, we on this side of the house have called repeatedly in recent years and months for a reduction in taxes. We are gratified to see that the government is at long last acting upon our suggestions for ameliorating a very sorry economic situation.

It was inspiring to hear the government's spokesman, Senator Macnaughton, say that these tax reductions "encourage the private sector to maintain a healthy level of activity in the present, and to build new capacity to increase the supply of goods and services for the future." Would that this government had never had a crisis of faith with regard to the private sector! One hopes that the government, having realized the economic benefit to be gleaned from reducing taxes, will not limit itself to a mere $780 million. We have been given to understand that the Minister of Finance is considering a new budget for the near future which will be more in accord with the present state of our economy.

While I am pleased with these reductions in taxes, I am left somewhat puzzled and uneasy. Reductions in taxes do not always mean less revenue for the government. In fact, it has been proven in recent years that reductions in taxes have not meant less revenue for the government. Also, since 1968, the increase in federal government spending has been close to 150 per cent. In 1973-74 the federal government spent approximately $20 billion; in 1974-75, $24.4 billion; and in 1975-76 it is expected that federal government expenditures will reach $28 billion or thereabouts.

I think I am right in saying that none of the reductions in taxes which have been granted in recent years—and those reductions were not very substantial—affected the overall revenue of the government, nor have such reductions induced the government to reduce its expenditures. Since the government has obviously decided not to reduce its expenditures, I can see nothing but trouble ahead. The government cannot be sincere about combating inflation by cutting taxes if it is not simultaneously going to do something about reducing its own fantastic expenditures. One can almost hear the minister saying, "Let's give them a few tax cuts to keep them from getting too restless."

The worst tax presently, of course, is inflation which, while reducing the value of our money, allows the government to increase its expenditures because it continues to collect more from the taxpayers of Canada.

This bill reduces from 12 per cent to 5 per cent the federal tax on building materials. Of course, the industry is in trouble. The housing shortage is acute, and prices are skyrocketing. For those reasons, these reductions will help somewhat. However, a complete removal of the federal sales tax on building materials would have helped even more. One of the major costs to the building materials merchant is the cost of administration involved in collecting the federal sales tax. To relieve business of that burden would surely serve to benefit the consumer, because no matter how you look at it, it is the consumer who, in the end, has to pay for all these things.

I hope that the reason the government did not abolish completely the federal sales tax on building materials was not the fact that the Conservative Party has been suggesting just such a move for years. The Liberal Party has never been shy about stealing ideas from us, and from others. As a matter of fact, some of the best ideas they ever got were those stolen from others.

The other federal sales tax reductions in this bill on adult clothing, footwear and transportation equipment will also serve to benefit the consumers of Canada.

With regard to the measures to deter wasteful energy consumption by imposing a special excise tax on high energy-consuming vehicles, I have my doubts. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Honourable Donald Macdonald, tried to influence people to conserve energy a couple of years ago. It did not work. It did not work because they found out that the minister was exaggerating somewhat, that there really was not an energy crisis. Now he is back at it again. This time, however, he admits not being too worried about an immediate fuel crisis. What he hopes to achieve is a change in the Canadian life style. We are going to force Canadians to be prudent rather than lavish users of fuels that might become scarce.

● (1410)

There is one particular problem about this piece of legislation that I especially want to draw to the attention of the Senate. I will go into it in greater depth in committee, but I want to draw attention to it now because I think it is important. Senator Macnaughton, in his presentation of the bill, noted the fact, as had the Minister of Finance, that on December 2, 1974, the government announced relief from federal sales tax paid for tax-paid inventories of trucks and other transportation equipment affected by the sales tax exemption proposed in the November 18 budget speech. According to Senator Macnaughton:

This action was necessary because of a combination of critical factors affecting the trucking industry and related transportation industries.

He explained further:

Dealers were unable to sell tax-paid inventories because the sales tax already paid on larger trucks and other equipment often amounted to several thousands of dollars per unit. In addition, customers were refusing to accept shipment of many highly specialized, custom-built items which had been ordered but not delivered as of budget day. Many customers were prepared to wait for tax-free goods to become available or to transfer orders to dealers who already had tax-free inventories on hand.

I mention this because, while the government acted swiftly to solve that problem, it has not acted at all to clear up a similar problem affecting some distributors of construction equipment. Many construction equipment dealers across Canada have been placed at an even more serious disadvantage that was the case with truck dealers. The reason is that some of their competitors were able to operate under a sales tax licence allowing them to import machines into Canada or purchase from domestic suppliers without paying federal sales tax until the machines were sold.

To qualify for such a tax licence, over 50 per cent of total sales for the preceding three months had to have been to sales tax-exempt customers. Needless to say, not every distributor could meet that criterion. As a result, unlicensed dealers have had in stock since November machinery on which they paid the full sales tax, while their licensed competitors have the same or similar machinery which they could and can offer to customers at 12 per cent less because they did not have to pay federal sales tax on it.

Prior to the November budget the unlicensed dealer could recoup the federal sales tax he had had to pay upon importing the vehicle or upon purchasing it from the Canadian supplier. If the end user was, for some reason, exempt from federal sales tax, then the dealer claimed for a refund of the 12 per cent federal sales tax he had had to pay. If the end user was not exempt from federal sales tax, then the dealer passed on to him the 12 per cent he had paid when he imported or purchased the vehicle from the supplier. But now that unlicensed dealer in construction equipment has a problem. There is no question of certain end users being exempt and of others not being exempt, because there is no more tax.

So, the unlicensed dealer cannot claim a refund of the 12 per cent sales tax he paid on vehicles he purchased before November 18 and has not yet sold; nor can he pass on the 12 per cent tax to the non-exempt end user, because the tax no longer exists. And that sales tax, it appears, is not to be refunded to these unlicensed dealers as it was to people who dealt in transportation equipment.

So, these unlicensed dealers have tax-paid inventories which cost them 12 per cent more than those of the licensed dealer down the road. How can they compete? They have to sell everything for 12 per cent more than their licensed competitors in order to maintain a similar profit margin, and who is going to buy from dealer A when B down the street is selling at 12 per cent less? I think all honourable senators will agree that 12 per cent can be a most sizeable sum when you are dealing with equipment costing tens of thousands of dollars.

There is, of course, an obvious inequity here. If a tax break could be given to the suppliers of trucks and related transportation equipment to cover tax paid inventories, as has been indicated by Senator Macnaughton, I do not see why the same cannot be done for unlicensed dealers in construction equipment. Their problem is the same, as I see it. Why could the solution not have been the same?

When the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce meets to study this bill, as I understand it is going to do if it receives second reading, it is my intention to request that representatives of the Canadian Association of Equipment Distributors be called upon to appear and explain the plight of unlicensed dealers, and to state their argument as to why they should be granted the same tax concessions as the suppliers of transportation equipment.

Senator McDonald: Honourable senators, if I am permitted I should like to ask the Leader of the Opposition a question. What is the difference between a licensed and a non-licensed dealer? What is the distinction?

Senator Flynn: It is a question of regulations. My understanding is that the licensed supplier can buy without having to pay the tax immediately. He needs to pay the tax only when he is selling to the ultimate user. On the other hand, the unlicensed dealer has to pay the tax when he buys; that is, before he sells to the end user.

Senator McDonald: By whom is he licensed? Who is the licensing authority?

Senator Flynn: I understand that it is under the regulations of the Revenue Department.

Senator Croll: One fellow has a credit card, in other words.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

[Senator Flynn.]

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Macnaughton: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

● (1420)

Senator Flynn: I would like to ask the chairman when he expects the committee to deal with this bill, in view of the indication that I have given that some people would like to appear before the committee.

Senator Hayden: If we can be ready, tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: Tomorrow? What if it is not possible for them to appear tomorrow, in view of the short notice?

Senator Hayden: Next Tuesday or Wednesday.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

MOTION TO APPROVE DECISION OF COMMITTEE TO TELEVISION CERTAIN OF ITS PUBLIC HEARINGS—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Molson, pursuant to rule 33, that the Senate do approve the decision of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to permit the televising of certain of its proceedings on an experimental basis only.

Senator Benedickson: Honourable senators, you will recall that last night I moved the adjournment of this debate. I felt that after rule 33 had been referred to there was a possibility that we might move rapidly to a decision, and that as it was rather a precedent in connection with our committee work and general proceedings in the Senate, and even in the other place, a little reflection would be beneficial. I think that period of reflection has helped me, and I hope it has helped other members of the Senate.

I judge, from what some members said yesterday, on a point of order, that it might have been possible, particularly as legal counsel has been taken, for the chairman of the committee to proceed and make available the television cameras to his committee, without reference to this body. However, I think it is typical of the chairman, and his sensitivity to the opinions of others, and of his good judgment, that he did not proceed in that manner but gave us notice of the decision of the committee that it proposed to have some television coverage of this particular drug-law study, in view of the wide interest throughout the country concerning it.

In addition I am glad that we adjourned the debate because I think that some questions were not answered last night. Senator Macnaughton raised the question of the manner and the form the television coverage might take. When I read Hansard I see that the chairman of the committee himself stipulated that the use of television might be limited. He refers to the televising of "certain" of the public hearings on this bill. He also refers to the televising of "parts of such hearings," et cetera, so I think it would be of interest if he or some other members of the committee could give us an idea of the consensus of the committee as to how they might proceed in this particular instance.

I personally do not have a bias one way or the other with respect to the televising of Senate proceedings. In this particular instance I think there is some merit for it. On the other hand, I cannot eliminate from my mind some conception of certain abuses that have taken place in congressional televising in the great nation to the south of us. I was in Washington before Christmas for several days. I saw several members of the Congress and this subject among others was discussed. Several of those members admitted that the rather widespread televising of their committee proceedings, in particular, had had questionable and adverse results. TV cameras frequently reduced the objectivity of the members of the committees. They encouraged certain unseemly self-seeking on the part of those committee members who were examining the witnesses, and so on. There were some rivalries between the chairman and less prominent members of the committee for the opportunity to get their faces on the screen.

I know there are certain disadvantages. But in addition I question whether going too far forward in the use of this particular medium might not also reduce the usefulness of our committee work which at times can be conducted in a quieter way to greater advantage. There is the question of the sensitivity of certain witnesses, their shyness and even resulting intimidation and nervousness in the type of presentation that they would otherwise give in a more conservative type of committee inquiry.

However, with this explanation I think it is possible this afternoon, in consequence of the adjournment last evening, to have some answers from members of the committee as to what their proposals might be in this instance, and particularly the limitations, if any, that they would propose to exert on the portions of the committee meetings that might be accessible to television and the portions that would not be so accessible, and how they propose to regulate that question.

Senator O'Leary: I wonder if I might ask Senator Benedickson a question. Why has he concluded, as he seems to have concluded, that there is a widespread public interest in the proceedings of this committee, an interest that goes beyond the usual interest in Parliament?

Senator Benedickson: Perhaps I am overly sensitive to the feelings of the younger people of this country at the moment because of what I hear from my own children. I think that they have developed something of a cynical distrust or lack of faith in our political system. I think there is in particular among youth an undue lack of respect for this body. I think that even in the populace as a whole this drug use issue has an interest which is wider than the interest in many other matters of study that we undertake, and that the objectivity, the good sense, and the impartiality and the non-political aspect of inquiries made in the Senate would be seen and would enhance its image.

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, having in mind the fact that there are thousands of young people in this country now carrying criminal records as a result of being found in possession of a marihuana joint, does my friend not consider that those people are entitled to the benefit of the discussions in this particular committee? Does he not consider that they are entitled to be aware—and many of them are not aware—of the fact that these amendments to the Criminal Code are designed to soften the effect of mere possession of marihuana, and there has been nothing proven to date, so far as I can find, that marihuana is addictive or injurious to health?

Senator Flynn: You are out of order.

Senator Riley: I am always out of order with Senator Grosart.

● (1430)

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, I would not feel competent, at this stage of our investigation, to answer that question. It gives me an opportunity simply to say that an idea respecting that particular matter has already come before the committee. It came from one of the most respected organizations in the country and the most competent in this field—namely, the Canadian Medical Association.

Part of the reason why I was loath to see us reach a decision last night was because I saw on the agenda that the first testimony subsequent to the proposal to initiate TV as advanced to us yesterday might have been a presentation today by the RCMP.

I have looked around the proposed meeting place and I would not have anticipated, knowing the chairman, that he would have already made preparations, had we made a decision this afternoon to go ahead today with such televising. I saw no sign of such apparatus today, and I say it is in keeping with my estimation of the good judgment of the chairman. I would not have wanted specially to start with the televising of an RCMP presentation.

Senator Walker: Honourable senators, I am opposed to this motion—and not because of Senator Riley. Had there been any doubt in my mind, I would have been opposed to it after hearing Senator Riley so many times during the past 24 hours.

The reason I am opposed to this motion—and let us get away from this marihuana business—is because in my opinion it is a question of whether we should have our committee meetings televised. Why should we? What benefit would there be for the Senate?

As soon as we get into that sort of thing, we become just puppets for the TV camera. The producers put in what looks ridiculous or funny, or what appeals to their sense of humour, or something else. In saying that, I am not reflecting on the TV cameramen, but the producers have to get something that will be of interest to the public.

Secondly, we are supposed to be, and I think we have proved ourselves to be, a house of sober—I emphasize the word “sober”—second thought. We have tried to be that, and I think we have succeeded in being that.

We are not seeking election. We are trying to do our job. I can understand the temptation for the House of Commons or the United States Congress to put in this sort of thing, and the mad and unseemly scramble of U.S. senators and congressmen to get on camera has been appalling. Why should we get into that sort of thing? Why should we lower the dignity of the Senate by interesting ourselves in that sort of thing?

[Senator Riley.]

It seems to me that we cannot be sincere and be on television. It is impossible. The human ego, or whatever it is, gets in the way, and when one is on television one tends to act up to that experience.

Where has it worked successfully? No one can point to where it can be said to have worked successfully. Surely we can get along objectively, the way we have been doing in the past. Certainly we may not be popular with the media, because we do not have the wonderful rows that used to occur in the House of Commons, nor the back talk, the fights and the feuds that used to go on there. But that is not our function. We are here to do a job.

In my opinion, this is not a party matter. I have the greatest respect for Senator Molson and I do not like to oppose him on this, but I would ask each honourable senator to give this matter his or her honest consideration. What benefit will follow from our doing this, and shall we not be keeping our independence and doing our job as a chamber of sober second thought by refusing to get mixed up in this TV maelstrom?

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: I wonder if Senator Molson is trying to close the debate?

Senator Molson: I am not trying anything.

Senator Flynn: You have already tried to do something. You moved a motion.

Senator Molson: I waited for some time.

Senator Flynn: You should have waited a little longer.

Senator Carter: Honourable senators, I have no special bias either for or against the use of television in this particular instance, but I am going to vote against this motion mainly for the reasons outlined last night by Senator Flynn, because as I see it this motion accomplishes nothing positive. All it does is tie our hands unnecessarily as a chamber.

I should like also to draw attention to another point that was made last night by Senator McElman, which seemed to get lost in the shuffle when we became absorbed with the rights of the committee. Granted that this Senate committee may have the right to do this without reference to the Senate—and, of course, there is no gainsaying the fact that this chamber has the right to take any action it wishes in any matter which affects it—Senator McElman raised the question of the propriety of the committee proceeding with this televising operation, even though it had the authority to do so.

To my mind, that was a valid point. I would carry the question of propriety a little further, and raise the question as to whether it is proper for this house, in a matter of this kind, to take an action which may in some way be used as a lever to get the other place to do the same thing.

Whatever rights our committee may have to act on its own, certainly we must concede that the committees in the other place have exactly the same rights, and, of course, the House of Commons has the same rights as the Senate. On this particular question, the Commons committees have refrained from taking action, and the House of Commons, as a chamber, has refrained from taking any action.

In my opinion, we shall not be giving proper consideration to the other house if we, as a body, or any committee of this body, take any action which could later be used to put pressure on the other place to take similar action.

This is a matter which should be resolved on a joint basis, where a committee of this house should meet with a committee of the other house to work out a common understanding and course of action on this matter, which has been troubling us for some time and will trouble us even more in the future. It is something we shall have to come to grips with. It should not be done on a unilateral basis but on a joint basis.

Before concluding, honourable senators, there are one or two questions that I should like answered. Last night, in the course of the arguments put forward, it was implied that some precedents existed for televising Senate committees. If there are precedents, I should like to know what they are. I have made inquiries and, so far as I have been able to ascertain, there are no precedents which exist for this. That is why we are in this particular bind.

● (1440)

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, it so happens that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs is short a member, who is here rather than over there. The committee meeting was to start at 2.30, and the chairman and other members are there now. In the circumstances, I move the adjournment of this debate until Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to, on division.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 o'clock.

THE SENATE

Thursday, February 13, 1975

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report on operations under the Clean Air Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1974, pursuant to section 41 of the said Act, Chapter 47, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1) (g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, February 18, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before the question is put, I should like, as usual, to give a brief outline of the work schedule for the next week. Dealing first with committees, the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will meet on Tuesday at 10 a.m. and 2 p.m. to hear witnesses on Bill S-19, to amend the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Criminal Code. The Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs will meet at 2:30 p.m. to continue its study on Canada-U.S. relations. The Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will meet on Tuesday at 8 p.m.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will meet at 9:30 a.m. on Wednesday to consider and hear witnesses on Bill C-40, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act, as well as Bill C-29, respecting Canadian business corporations.

It is also expected that the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will hold a meeting on Thursday at 9:30 a.m. Also at 9:30 a.m. on Thursday, the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance will continue with its examination of the Manpower Division of the Department of Manpower and Immigration, and our Foreign Affairs Committee will hold another meeting on Canada-U.S. relations.

I am also informed that a meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture is being arranged for Thursday next to allow that committee to complete its examination of Bill S-10, to amend the Feeds Act. In addition, I am informed that the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications will meet on Wednesday at 9:30 a.m.

In addition to the committee work, the House will continue with the items now on the Order Paper. Furthermore, it is hoped that Bill C-49, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, will come to us from the other place by the middle of next week.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, perhaps I might be permitted to add to what the Deputy Leader of the Government has just said. I think perhaps the house should be informed that the Joint Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments has a meeting scheduled for 9:30 on Tuesday morning, when we shall be starting consideration of the guidelines on production of papers and that part of the reference to us from the House of Commons. I expect we shall be having also our regular meeting at 9:30 next Thursday morning. The 9:30 Thursday morning meeting is pretty well a fixture now. I should have warned the leader of this beforehand and I am sorry I neglected to do so.

Senator Flynn: I can see from the statement made by the Deputy Leader of the Government that some of us, on this side at least, will be in a difficult position, because we will be invited to attend at least three committee meetings at the same time.

Senator Langlois: That is the situation we have to deal with. This morning I had three committee meetings to attend and could attend only two of them. It is a situation we must live with.

Senator Flynn: Two in succession is not bad, but three at the same time is difficult.

Senator Langlois: This morning I had to leave one meeting to attend the other. I have just been informed by the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce that his committee will be sitting Thursday morning at 9:30 a.m. to consider Bill C-29, respecting Canadian business corporations.

Senator Walker: As well as on Wednesday?

Senator Langlois: Yes.

Senator Flynn: We have a slave driver as chairman of that committee.

Senator Langlois: He is a good driver, though.
Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY

COMMITTEE ON BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE—BUDGET TABLED

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

posed expenditures of the said committee with respect to its study of the budget resolutions relating to income tax, in advance of any such bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto, authorized by the Senate on November 21, 1974.

COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL FINANCE—BUDGET TABLED

Senator Laird, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled the committee's report approving the budget presented to it by the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance for the proposed expenditures of the said committee with respect to its examination and consideration of such legislation and other matters as may be referred to it, authorized by the Senate on December 5, 1974.

COMMITTEE ON REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS—BUDGET TABLED

Senator Laird, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled the committee's report approving the budget presented to it by the Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments for the proposed expenditures of the said committee with respect to its review and scrutiny of statutory instruments, pursuant to the report adopted by the Senate on October 29, 1974.

COMMITTEE ON EMPLOYER-EMPLOYEE RELATIONS IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE—BUDGET TABLED

Senator Laird, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled the committee's report approving the budget presented to it by the Joint Chairman of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service for the proposed expenditures of the said special joint committee with respect to its consideration and recommendations upon Parts I, II and III of the paper entitled "Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service of Canada", prepared by the Chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board, authorized by the Senate on November 14, 1974.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO INCUR SPECIAL EXPENSES

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h), I move that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized, subject to rule 83A, to incur special expenses for the payment of fees and travelling expenses in respect of witnesses in connection with its examination of Bill S-19, an act to amend the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Criminal Code.

This request was generated through the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, and I would ask Senator Laird to explain the purpose of this motion.

Senator Laird: Honourable senators, the reason for having this motion moved at this time is that we are faced with one problem only up to this point in the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. It arises out of the request by us to have the Chief Prosecutor of the State of Oregon appear as a witness before the committee. Oregon has tried a different law with regard to marihuana, and their experience, which is a year old, would be very useful to us. Unfortunately, being the Chief Prosecutor he felt, for political reasons, that during his absence on such a mission he would have to forego his normal pay as Chief Prosecutor, and all he asks for is to be reimbursed in exactly that amount.

Senator Flynn: There is no objection, but I suppose this is a problem that should be dealt with by means of a general rule. It seems to me that we should have some guidelines to follow in such cases. We should not have to make a motion every time a problem like this occurs. It could probably be referred to our Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

Senator Laird: I quite agree. The only reason for moving the motion now is the urgency of getting this man while we have the chance, and covering any other similar situation, which I doubt will arise.

● (1410)

Senator Langlois: Under our rules it is not necessary for the Rules Committee to have any matter referred to it in order to convene. The committee will no doubt take note that it should consider the matter at its next sitting.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps I could ask: What Rules Committee?

Senator Langlois: The Rules Committee of this house.

Senator Grosart: We do not have one.

Senator Langlois: Yes, there is one.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Langlois: Yes. The Senate Rules Committee was formed at the opening of this session and its members were selected by the Committee of Selection. The only thing that was not done was to appoint a chairman. As stated in this house two weeks ago, as soon as there is some work for the Rules Committee, a meeting will be convened and a chairman appointed, at which point the committee will immediately be able to carry on with its business.

Senator Grosart: I wonder if I might ask the Deputy Leader of the Government why a meeting of that committee is not being held. It is all very well to say that the Committee of Selection, which automatically selects members for all committees, has done its work. But surely there is a responsibility in the leadership of the house to have this committee called so that it can carry on with its work.

The Deputy Leader of the Government suggests in one breath that there is no work for it; in another breath he suggests that it does not need to have work referred to it. Under our rules this committee has the responsibility from the day it is appointed of considering our rules. It has exceptional authority and power for the very reason that the Senate has decided that the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders should be in operation all the time. I suggest to him that it is time the committee was called.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, addressing myself to the point just made by Senator Grosart, I must say that we have received numerous complaints from senators saying that there are too many meetings of committees and that they cannot possibly attend them all. I do not see any purpose in convening a meeting of a committee just for the purpose of appointing its chairman when there is actually no work to give to that committee. The whole thing could be done in one shot. As soon as there is need for the committee to sit, it could take one minute of its time to appoint a chairman and then it would be ready to work right away. That is the obvious solution.

Senator Flynn: If it takes only one minute to appoint a chairman, why not meet for that one minute and do so? As Senator Langlois said, all problems related to rules are deemed to be referred to the Rules Committee.

Senator Langlois: Under our rules, yes.

Senator Flynn: And we have had a few examples recently of problems that should be dealt with by the Rules Committee. The point I am making is that it is normal practice for committees to be convened by their chairmen. Without a chairman, it is difficult for a committee meeting to be called, because that is the normal responsibility of the chairman.

Senator Prowse: It could be done by the committee clerk.

Senator Flynn: I hope Senator Prowse is not insisting that we give to the clerk the responsibility and authority for calling meetings of committees. Surely he is not seriously suggesting that?

Senator Prowse: No.

Senator Flynn: No? Very well. I was just saying that the chairman can consult with members, but it is most difficult for members—including Senator Denis—to decide by themselves that a committee should be called.

Senator Denis: What you are saying is a waste of time, anyway.

Senator Flynn: If someone has time to waste, it is surely Senator Denis.

Senator Denis: The honourable senator does not understand the situation when he says that we can call several meetings at the same time.

Senator Flynn: Understanding what you have to say is the only problem I have.

Senator Denis: It is no use talking to you.

Senator Flynn: The fact that I can't understand you will never affect my reputation.

Senator Denis: You are talking through your hat.

Senator Flynn: Even when I have none? I am surprised that Senator Denis does not wear a hat like members of Parliament used to wear 50 years ago. It would suit him very well.

[Senator Grosart.]

Senator Bourget: He is not that old.

Senator Flynn: I am not too sure. He is an institution in Parliament. He is the dean of our Parliament.

Senator Walker: And he is a fine fellow.

Senator Flynn: There's no argument there. It is only very infrequently that he refuses to cooperate with me, but I am always very surprised and deeply chagrined when he does refuse.

Now, what I was trying to say, and I trust it will not hurt Senator Denis' feelings, is that the chairman of the committee has the responsibility, generally, to call the committee together. If there is no chairman, that becomes most difficult. We had a problem yesterday and the day before with regard to the report, or the information supplied us by the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs pertaining to its intended activities. That was one problem. Now we have this one today. If we had a chairman and a deputy chairman, or a steering committee, we could deal with these problems. That is the only point I want to make.

Senator Perrault: May I say, honourable senators, that in view of the questions relating to rules in the house which have been posed in recent days, I think a sufficient case has been made for convening an early meeting of this committee. There will be an initiative in that regard.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps it might be as well to read into the record what our rules say.

Senator Langlois: Will you give the number of the rule, please?

Senator Grosart: It is rule 67. (1) (e):

It reads:

67. (1) The standing committees shall be as follows:

(e) The Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, which is empowered on its own initiative to propose to the Senate amendments to the rules from time to time.

Senator Langlois: That is exactly what I said.

Senator Flynn: You win.

Senator Grosart: We can hardly do what the rule suggests if the committee has not met.

Motion agreed to.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved the second reading of Bill C-370, to amend the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, which established the commissions to set up electoral boundaries, provides in section 13 rules to be applied by those commissions. Basically, those rules are that the constituencies should have roughly the same size with regard to population, and that the commissions should take the number of seats in each province, divide it into the population, establish a quota, and attempt to have the various constituencies come as close as possible to that quota.

There was an exception made to this, however, in recognition of the geographical problems and the small populations in certain parts of Canada. Under section 13 (c), therefore, the commissions were empowered to depart from the strict application of this rule under certain specific circumstances. These circumstances are listed in paragraph (i), as follows:

(i) special geographic considerations, including in particular the sparsity, density or relative rate of growth of population of various regions of the province, the accessibility of such regions or the size or shape thereof, appear to the commission to render such a departure necessary or desirable—

Under those specific conditions the commissions were empowered to depart from the quota to the extent of 25 per cent in either direction, so they can go 25 per cent above the quota or 25 per cent below. The maximum deviation, therefore, between the constituency with the highest population, and that with the lowest, would be 50 per cent. That was the rule under which they were to operate.

When the commissions proceeded with their redistribution they looked at this section, but when they balanced the two items of sparsity and density on the one side, and relative rate of growth on the other, they decided that they could not really deviate from the norm.

Therefore, in their recommendations, the rural constituencies, by and large, were not considered as qualifying for the smaller population, and the rule simply did not take effect. The result was what we saw in the maps that were produced. General dissatisfaction was expressed across the country to the effect that the rural constituencies, particularly the northern constituencies, had not been looked at properly in the light of this rule, and that they contained far too great an area to be covered. Members of the House of Commons objected, and there were objections as well from the public.

The purpose of Bill C-370 is to correct this situation, and to permit the rule to take effect. All that happens under the proposed bill is that paragraph (i) will be replaced by a new paragraph, the only difference being that the words "or relative rate of growth" are removed. This means that under the new section the considerations that the commissions will have will be the geographical considerations including, in particular, the sparsity or density of population. This will then permit the commissions to apply properly the 25 per cent rule, and give an opportunity for constituencies of very large size to be reduced in population and thereby reducing the geographic size.

This seems to have had the general approval of members in the other place, and I commend it to all honourable members of the Senate. Under normal conditions, I prefer to have bills referred to committee where questions can be asked, and there can be much more detailed discussion, but in this particular case because the bill is actually very simple—

Senator Grosart: Don't say that.

Senator Flynn: What a mistake.

Senator Molgat: —I do not believe that is necessary. However, if it is the wish of honourable senators, it is within our right to refer it to committee. I would also point out that there appears to be, if not some urgency, at least some advantage in dealing fairly quickly with this measure. I understand that if it is passed by the end of February the commissions can begin their work soon after that.

I commend this bill to all honourable senators.

Senator Flynn: May I ask a question of Senator Molgat? The evaluation or the assessment provided for in this bill will be made by provincial commissions, I understand.

Senator Molgat: Yes, each commission in each province is empowered under the act to make the decisions within the particular province, which are applicable to that province only.

Senator Flynn: Has it been foreseen that there could be a different basis of application of this bill by one commission as compared to another in view of the fact that there are ten commissions? And from that it would follow that the results of the application of this bill might produce different effects as between one province and another.

Senator Lafond: I point out that these are federal commissions at the provincial level. They are not provincial commissions.

Senator Flynn: I know that, but if each commission is free to interpret the provisions as it sees fit, do you not think there is the danger of a different evaluation as between one province and another?

Senator Molgat: From my reading of the act I believe this can happen. The act specifically says in section 13:

13. In preparing its report each commission for a province shall be governed by the following rules—

So I would assume that it is up to each commission, and I take the point made by Senator Lafond that these are federal commissions working in each province. They are appointed independently, as you know, with the chairman being appointed by the chief justice of the province.

Senator Flynn: There is no rule for uniformity of interpretation of the act by these provincial commissions.

Senator Lafond: I do not believe there is any rule, but it seems to me that there is a very convenient and adequate safeguard in that the Representation Commissioner himself is automatically a member of each commission in each province. Here I am speaking of Mr. Castonguay. I think that was one of the initial purports of the new formula, to have the Representation Commissioner as a member of the commission in each province in order to assure a good minimum of uniformity in interpretations and procedures.

Senator Bélisle: May I ask the sponsor of the bill a question? Now that we have been informed that these commissions are federal-provincial commissions and—

Senator Molgat: No, they are federal commissions.

Senator Flynn: They are federal commissions appointed for each province.

Senator Molgat: Yes. Each province has its own commission, but each one is set up in the same manner. Each province has four commissioners—the chairman, two other members who are appointed by the Speaker of the House of Commons, and the Representation Commissioner. However, there is one of these commissions for each province.

Senator Bélisle: Knowing that there is a possibility that some of these boundaries are parts of the Canada-United States boundary, is there a possibility that a member of the International Joint Commission will be consulted, or does it have representation on the commissions?

Senator Molgat: No. Each commission is empowered, in fact instructed, to prepare the maps, but then it must hold hearings, which anyone is free to attend and make representations.

Senator Desruisseaux: May I ask Senator Molgat whether the members of these commissions have been nominated, and is there a list of such nominations for each province?

Senator Molgat: Yes, I believe that they are actually nominated each time there is a redistribution. The method of nomination is set out very clearly in the act. The chairman of the commission in each province is appointed by the chief justice of that province, or his appointee. Two other members for each province are appointed by the Speaker of the House of Commons. The fourth member is the Representation Commissioner. It is my understanding that they are re-appointed at the time of each redistribution.

Senator Desruisseaux: Have they been re-appointed?

Senator Molgat: I shall have to verify that. A redistribution was proceeded with, but it was found to be unacceptable. The result of that redistribution was that a number of provinces lost some seats. It was decided, therefore, to make a change in the whole structure to increase the number of seats in the House of Commons and proceed, therefore, with a new redistribution.

I will have to verify whether the commissioners who did the first one are automatically those who will do the new one. There could be new commissioners appointed. My assumption is, in view of the fact that it is a new act, that there will be a re-appointment. They could very well be the same people, of course.

Senator Desruisseaux: Can we expect to receive the list of these nominations?

Senator Molgat: Yes. I shall inquire to see whether they have in fact been re-appointed; if they have, I shall be happy to obtain the list. In any case, I can get the list of the commissioners who did the previous redistribution, if that is your desire.

Senator Walker: Senator Molgat, with your background and rich experience as leader of the Liberal Party of Manitoba, and also as the present President of the Liberal Association of Canada, can you assure us that these commissions cannot get involved in gerrymandering?

Senator Molgat: Under the provisions of this bill, Senator Walker, they would find it extremely difficult to do so, in view of the safeguards which have been introduced in addition to the method of appointment of the commissioners.

[Senator Molgat.]

You will recall, from your experience in the other place, that in past years—

Senator Walker: Indeed I do.

Senator Molgat:—the government in power sometimes had a great deal to say as to the actual geographical boundaries, but that is no longer the case. Under this act, as I mentioned, the commissions are clearly established, as is the method of appointing the members. Furthermore, in order to provide an additional guarantee, the rules which they must follow are laid down and, in my opinion, are quite clear. They must follow the basic rule of having every constituency as close as possible to the quota established, with the exception of this 25 per cent rule for large ridings.

Senator Walker: And this one.

Senator Molgat: Yes.

Senator Walker: Thank you.

Senator Molgat: It is apparent, therefore, that this bill is in fact an outstanding piece of legislation, and one of which the Liberals who introduced it have good reason to be proud. When we look at certain countries or, in some cases, certain provinces, where after an election the majority ends up by not being represented, or a party with a minority of votes ends up with more seats in the house, I think we can appreciate the value of this legislation.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, Senator Molgat having convinced us that this bill is so simple, I think I should move the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I suggest that while the legislation itself may not be very simple, the amendment proposed in this bill is simple. It merely changes four words.

Senator Flynn: That is what you say.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

CRIMINAL CODE (COMMUTATION OF DEATH SENTENCE)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud moved the second reading of Bill S-21, to amend the Criminal Code (commutation of death sentence).

He said: Honourable senators, I hope that the debate that will ensue from this moment on will be as friendly as that which we have just heard. To my mind, we proved a moment ago that we are indeed a house of sober second thought. That is what makes this institution as important as it is, that we can discuss matters without becoming emotional or passionate, and we can fulfill that real role which members of the Senate should fulfill.

I am on my feet today to express my personal feelings on this bill without in any way wishing to influence others. Every person should follow his or her own conscience and vote accordingly.

Bill S-21, to amend the Criminal Code (commutation of death sentence), is simple in concept. There is nothing complicated about it.

In 1973 Parliament enacted a law to the effect that the only persons subject to the death penalty, upon conviction for murder, are those who cause or assist in causing the death of police officers or prison guards. Parliament, including this body, passed similar legislation in 1968. So, our laws provide for capital punishment in certain cases. Personally I find it unfortunate that we have another law which gives the federal cabinet the royal prerogative. The cabinet is perfectly within its rights in exercising this prerogative, but I find it distressing that since 1962 we have not been adequately protecting society. Not one sentence of capital punishment has been carried out since 1962, despite the fact that it is the law of the land.

If we do not want such laws, then we should change them. I believe in the royal prerogative, but only in cases where the peers of the accused recommend clemency or commutation of sentence. Such a recommendation may come from any member of the jury, and also from the judge. A case may come before the Appeals Division of a provincial supreme court, and perhaps before the Supreme Court of Canada, and if no one during the whole judicial process has seen fit to recommend clemency, the Cabinet may do so.

It is my feeling that we are not doing the right thing, when I see what is happening today in our country. I do not have to report to the Senate the number of major crimes, involving the murder of police officers, which have been committed in Canada during the past few years. However, perhaps I should. I obtained the following figures from the Library of Parliament.

In 1967, three policemen were murdered in Canada. Three suspects were arrested, one of whom was killed in a gun fight with the police. The second committed suicide, and the third was tried and convicted, but the death sentence was commuted. I shall not put any interpretation on this. One committed suicide and one was killed in a gun fight with the police, so honourable senators can draw their own conclusions.

In 1968, five policemen were murdered. Nine suspects were arrested, one of whom committed suicide. Eight were charged and tried. One was acquitted by reason of insanity, one was acquitted, one was convicted of non-capital murder, four were convicted of manslaughter, and one was convicted of a lesser offence.

In 1969, five policemen were murdered. One case still remains unsolved. Seven suspects were arrested and charged. Two were convicted of capital murder and given the death sentence, which was commuted. Four were convicted of non-capital murder, and one was convicted of manslaughter.

I am speaking only about the murder of policemen, not of prison guards or of people who are being slaughtered right and left in our country.

In 1970, three policemen were murdered. Two suspects were arrested, one of whom committed suicide. One was charged and convicted of capital murder, but the death sentence was commuted. Honourable senators will have noticed the number of suicides. When society refused to play its role, some of the accused committed suicide because they had accepted the consequences of their act at the time they committed the murder.

I repeat that these are my personal feelings, which I do not wish to impose on anyone else.

In 1971, three policemen were murdered. One case remains unsolved. Two suspects were arrested and charged. One was acquitted by reason of insanity, and one was convicted of capital murder. One case is still pending. I am sure we all know to which case I refer.

In 1972, three policemen were murdered. Two suspects were arrested. One man was killed in a gun fight with the police, and another committed suicide. These are not my statistics. They were provided by the Library of Parliament.

In 1973, five policemen were murdered. Seven suspects were arrested, two committed suicide, five were charged and two were convicted of capital murder—their cases are pending; we do not know what will happen—two were convicted of non-capital murder, and one was convicted of a lesser offence.

● (1440)

I could go on with statistics of this type. I think the trend has gone too far, not only in this country, but particularly in the United States. If we go to such American cities as Cleveland, Buffalo, Los Angeles and New York, we are told not to walk the streets after sunset—and that is done in the name of freedom! In the name of freedom, we cannot be free to walk the streets in those cities. It can reach such proportions in this country too, unless we do something about it, and I think it is up to the Parliament of Canada to do something.

Nobody, but nobody, will make me believe that capital punishment does not act as a deterrent. It does. Everyone is afraid of it, except those who want to commit suicide anyway. A good many of these individuals do commit suicide, as evidenced by the statistics I gave earlier. I think it is our duty to protect society.

As I said on December 19 last, when I introduced this bill—which happened to be three or four days after the horrible murders that took place in the city of Moncton—it is up to this body to do something about it. However, it was not that particular incident that prompted me to introduce it. My bill was already printed. Rather, it was the number of such incidents which are happening from east to west, north to south, in this country.

I could quote biblical texts, and other such texts, in support of this bill, but how would that help? It would not. It is up to our individual consciences. We must do whatever we feel necessary to provide society with the best measure of protection.

I am not going to open the debate on capital punishment in general. I do not think that should be discussed until the five-year moratorium has lapsed, because that is the law of the land. I do not think this body was wrong in 1973 when it passed that legislation, nor do I think it was wrong in 1968 when it retained capital punishment for the murderers of policemen and prison guards. A discussion on capital punishment in general will come later, but as long as we have laws to protect our families, our neighbours, our friends, those laws, I believe, should be respected.

There is a body that can recommend the commutation of sentence, or make a plea for mercy or clemency, and that is the peers of the accused, the equals of the accused, after hearing all of the evidence and being in possession of all of the facts. If they do not see fit to recommend clemency, another superior body does it for them. That is where I think we are wrong. I want it to be crystal clear that I believe in the royal prerogative, provided it is exercised on a recommendation from the trial judge or the jury for clemency, or when a jury cannot agree on a recommendation for clemency. That is my personal stand on the matter.

I hope we can discuss this bill without passion. Perhaps I cannot do so myself; I do not know. I believe we owe our society this protection. Our policemen are paid to protect us, and I believe we should give them the same degree of protection.

Senator Bélisle: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the sponsor of this bill.

When you asked for the adjournment of this motion until today you gave as your reason that you would be attending a meeting of the Atlantic Provinces Policemen's Association in Moncton, which might provide you with further information. Would you care to elaborate on that meeting and tell us the association's reaction to this bill?

Senator Robichaud: I thought I might do that when closing the debate on second reading. My personal impression of the meeting, held last Saturday in Moncton, of policemen and prison guards in the whole Atlantic region was that they were unanimously in support of this. I might say that in my estimation they are going too far in wanting capital punishment, period. Perhaps they, themselves, are a little too violent in their emotional reaction, and I told them so. On the other hand, perhaps we are not going far enough.

In answer to your question, Senator McElman, it was a united meeting. They were unanimous in their support of capital punishment. Does that answer your question, or did you want me to go beyond that?

Senator McElman: Not entirely. You said at the outset that there should be sober consideration given to this bill. Could you give us your personal judgment as to whether the deliberations at the meeting you attended in Moncton were cool and calculated, or whether there was emotion involved?

Senator Robichaud: Well, when you get 200 people at a meeting, you can expect that some of them will become emotional and some will react in a responsible manner. Some were extremely responsible, some were a little too emotional. There were 200 or more people at the meeting.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I should like to make a few brief comments on this bill. I have looked at it with more than usual interest because it was introduced by a man whom I have known for many years, who was a fellow provincial premier, and for whose viewpoint and judgment I have great respect.

I have said in this house on several occasions that I personally believe in capital punishment. I believe in it because I believe in the sanctity of life. I am convinced that respect for the sanctity of life cannot be preserved by a society that permits people to take the lives of others with impunity. For that reason, I support the restoration of the death penalty in all cases of willful and premeditated murder.

As has been pointed out by Senator Robichaud, the Criminal Code makes a distinction between the murder of a police officer or prison guard and the murder of any other individual. In my judgment, that distinction is invalid. The willful murder of an individual who is neither a police officer nor a prison guard surely is no less a crime by reason of that fact.

● (1450)

If murder is a crime that under any circumstances warrants the death penalty then, frankly, I fail to see the logic in a distinction between the murder of a man in one occupation and the murder of someone in a different occupation. Certainly the sorrow and anguish of the survivors is equal in all cases. As I say, the mere fact that one man happens to be engaged in one occupation seems to me to be an invalid reason for saying that his murder is significantly different from that of a man in another occupation.

Senator Robichaud has said that the reason he introduced this bill is because in recent years it appears to be a quite firm policy on the part of the present government to commute all death sentences to life imprisonment. There certainly has been no exception to that policy for quite a number of years.

Senator Flynn: Twelve.

Senator Manning: This bill purports to, and would, override the prerogative of clemency or mercy, whatever you like to call it, in the case where there has been no recommendation for clemency by either the presiding judge or a jury, or in the case where a jury has been unable to agree on whether a recommendation for clemency should be made or not.

I can fully appreciate Senator Robichaud's thinking, and I can fully appreciate why the law enforcement people of this country would be almost unanimously in favour of this kind of legislation. But having said that, I must also say that I personally could not support this particular bill. I say that for two reasons.

In the first place, this would be, in effect, asking a jury or a judge to assume the prerogative, that is the discretionary power, of clemency or mercy, which I believe should remain with the Governor General in Council. Under this legislation, any jury would, by refusing to attach a recommendation for mercy, be taking away from the Governor in Council the prerogative of exercising clemency in a particular case.

In any case where there were any qualms on the part of even one juror, he could set the whole thing aside by merely refusing to agree with his colleagues, thereby creating a situation where there would not be a unanimous recommendation by the jury one way or the other. In that case the provisions of this bill would return to the Governor General in Council the prerogative of mercy.

Frankly, honourable senators, I do not think this is a prerogative or a responsibility that we should pass to juries, or even to presiding judges. I know the argument is that they have at their disposal all the evidence that bears on all the pros and cons of the case. But that evidence and information is available to the Minister of Justice, and it seems to me to be inappropriate to ask the jury to assume the role of deciding whether there shall or shall not be clemency.

However, there is a second and, I believe, more fundamental reason why I could not support this type of legislation, and that is in fact that it would restrict the prerogative of clemency or mercy by the Governor General in Council. I do not believe that is a right that should be restricted or circumscribed in any case. There might well be some case in which a jury, swayed by sympathy or whatever other factors there might be, would recommend mercy. It might well be that it is a case in which mercy should not be shown. The opposite is equally true. In my judgment, at least, this prerogative of clemency is such that it is just as much an abuse to restrict its exercise by the Governor General in Council as what is being done by the government of the day in commuting all death sentences to life imprisonment is an abuse.

For those two reasons, while I fully appreciate the purpose of the bill, which I know would have the almost unanimous support of law enforcement people and, I think, many other Canadians—in fact, it is my view that if the people of Canada had the opportunity to express themselves on this whole question of the death penalty they would undoubtedly ask for its restoration in the case of willful murder of any kind—I do not feel it right that the Senate, as a part of Parliament, should do anything to circumscribe the prerogative of mercy, which rightly belongs in all cases to the Governor General in Council. I think the solution to the problem this bill seeks to deal with is for the Cabinet, or the government of this country, to stop abusing its responsibility, and not to impair or restrict the exercise of the prerogative in any case where the circumstances warrant it.

Senator Bélisle: Honourable senators, I had moved the adjournment of the debate, but I am glad that we have heard Senator Manning.

Senator Manning: I am sorry, honourable senators. I did not hear the motion to adjourn.

Senator Bélisle: I am pleased to have heard your views.

Senator Hicks has told me that he will be ready to speak on Tuesday or Wednesday. I shall not be ready by then, but I should like to move the adjournment of the debate. If any other honourable senator would like to speak then, he will be free to do so.

Senator Robichaud: Honourable senators, may I express a personal wish? Because I am so vitally concerned with this piece of legislation I would not wish to miss any part of the debate. In September last I accepted an invitation to attend a meeting in Quebec City of the Canadian Association of Teachers on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday of next week, and I would like to be there. However, I would like to listen to the debate on this bill too.

On motion of Senator Bélisle, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 18 at 8 p.m.

THE LATE HONOURABLE ARTHUR LAING, P.C. TRIBUTES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, together with some of you I have just returned from the West Coast and a very sad event, the funeral of our late colleague, the Honourable Senator Arthur Laing. For months many of us were aware of Senator Laing's gallant, tenacious but impossible struggle against cancer. We saw his physical strength waste away while his mind and his keen intellect remained undiminished in their powers. Indeed, I visited him in hospital three days before he passed away. That meeting did not involve a list of personal complaints about his very obvious suffering, but rather his view that there were some major economic decisions to be made in Ottawa in the next while. In that connection he asked me to obtain some data and research material from the Parliamentary Library. He said, "Before I'm finished I want to get some of my ideas down to the government." I think that is a remarkable spirit.

That long, cruel struggle for survival came to an end last Thursday after the Senate adjourned. Now Arthur Laing has found his peace.

Senator Laing was born in British Columbia, but his love for Canada encompassed all of our land. He spoke just as eloquently, affectionately and knowledgeably about our great Atlantic provinces, the East and the Prairies, as he did about his native British Columbia. He developed, as honourable senators are aware, a great and passionate interest in the North. He evolved a remarkable expertise about the area. His reputation for a knowledge concerning the North came to be known, indeed, in other countries in the world, as those who have travelled abroad with delegations can attest. He knew a great deal about the people of the North—the geography, the resources and the problems. For Arthur Laing was no narrow person; his zeal for Canada and its future was as large as our great country itself.

Now he is gone. What has he left behind? Certainly the gratitude of those who knew him and were his associates. As a young politician I worked as an assistant to Arthur Laing, and I learned a great deal about public life from him. I remember working on his first federal campaign. I came to know him as a person of absolute integrity, and candor. These qualities may not always have served him for immediate political gain, but in the short term and in the long term they were the right qualities.

Arthur Laing had an uncompromising dedication to the common good and he has left behind good memories for all of us. Perhaps, above all, in an age of increasing cynicism about politics and politicians—and these are difficult times for politicians—Arthur Laing's career is a model to young men and women who aspire to positions in public life, for he gave far more to this country than he ever took out of it. He rejected the notion that any one political party in this country has any exclusive preserve on virtue or its dedication to Canada, or to positive and useful ideas.

He was no short-sighted partisan. He saw good in all men and women, regardless of race, politics and religion. His pall bearers, both active and honorary, and those who attended yesterday's services, included those from every one of Canada's political parties and they came from all walks of life.

During his career, Arthur Laing dared to advance new ideas and new concepts. He dared to challenge pomposity in all of its forms. Appropriately, he asked that the hymn "Dare to be a Daniel" be sung at his funeral. The words of that hymn are not to be found in most modern hymnals, but perhaps they should be restored:

Dare to be a Daniel,
Dare to stand alone,
Dare to have a purpose firm,
And dare to make it known!

All of us here are grateful that we were given the opportunity to serve with him. Those in the other place, where he served with distinction as a member of Parliament and as a cabinet minister with responsibility in Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Public Works, and Veterans Affairs, share a sense of gratitude for having had him in their midst.

We extend our most profound sympathy and condolences to his wife, Gerry, his daughter, Linda, and to all his relatives, who grieve his passing.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, the words just spoken by the Leader of the Government about the way in which our departed colleague, Senator Laing, faced his inevitable fate during the last few months of his life serve better to describe him than anything that could be added about his career.

It can be said of him without exaggeration that he was an excellent parliamentarian. He understood thoroughly what this place is all about, and the quality of the work he did here reflected that insight.

As minister, he defended three different portfolios, each with enviable success. The reasons for his success are easy enough to understand: He was a most clever man with an immense capacity and respect for hard work. He did his homework well, and that meant he was always on top of problems.

Another reason for his success was that wonderful personality of his. He was a pleasant, even-tempered man. His courtesy and dignity; his solicitude for others; his willingness to help; his willingness to provide everyone with as much information as possible—these traits won him the respect and admiration of everyone.

Senator Laing will best be remembered as the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development who started development of the North and altered government policy to make the North a place of self-sufficiency for our native people.

He was a liberal in the classical sense. He believed firmly in self-reliance and personal responsibility.

Regardless of what political stripe they may be, men of such quality and vision, men with such a love of liberty and respect for individual rights, will always be an asset to Canadian public life.

Our colleague, Senator Yuzyk, represented the Progressive Conservative caucus at the funeral in Vancouver yesterday. He reports to me that the people of Senator Laing's old riding were there in great numbers to pay tribute to the man. And well they should have been, for he served them, as he did all Canadians, with admirable distinction.

Arthur Laing leaves behind him none but friends—friends who realize that men of his kind are not easily replaced. To his fellow Liberals and to his wife and family I extend, on behalf of our caucus, my most heartfelt condolences.

● (2010)

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, when my deskmate and former cabinet colleague, Senator Arthur Laing, came here last October, I and all of his friends were apprehensive that he would not be here long, and that when he left he would probably not be back. He himself was apprehensive at that time but also realistic, as the Leader of the Government has pointed out, and he was very brave.

His death last week came with tragic swiftness, but it was also merciful. For his devoted wife this is a heavy blow indeed, because she had dedicated her life to Arthur's life of public service in British Columbia and in Ottawa, where he was a member of the House of Commons and of the government. Our sympathy for her and her daughter is deep indeed.

Senator Flynn has mentioned that Senator Laing had three portfolios in the course of his career as a member of the government—Veterans Affairs, Public Works, and Northern Affairs and National Resources, as it then was. It is not too much to say that he consecrated himself to his ministerial responsibilities when he was in the government. He was never flashy, he was never over-political, but he did display a hard-nosed realism. He was an experienced, practical administrator. These were his great qualities in all his portfolios, and particularly so when he was Minister of Public Works.

It was in Northern Affairs and National Resources that he shone. He had great faith in the ingenuity and judgment of the business community of his native province, British Columbia. He knew fully the tremendous economic opportunities of British Columbia. He grasped, early in life, the unique position that British Columbia occupied with regard to commercial activity on the Pacific rim, and the superport at Roberts Bank is a monument to that conviction.

One of Arthur Laing's abiding interests was the people of, and the opportunities in, the frontier regions of the North, as the Honourable Leader of the Opposition has said. In what was perhaps his first speech as Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources in the House of Commons he paid tribute to the then Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Diefenbaker, for his views about the North and the opportunities that lay there. There had always been a friendship between those two, but it was refreshing for parliamentarians to see that kind of statesmanship displayed by a man who came new to the ministry of Canada.

A few years ago, when a group of senators visited the Arctic-Antarctic Institute at Leningrad, we were told of his earlier visit there, of his visits to Siberia, and how impressed the Russians were with his knowledge of northern conditions, his desire to learn all that he could of the Russian experience and expertise in those regions, and his hopes for development on the Canada-Russia frontier and south of it.

Arthur Laing shared the Russians' enthusiasm for the northern regions. He worked at it and he improved it. The investment of the Canadian government in Panarctic Oils was his doing, and it was hard doing at that time. It was his policy that the government should take this practical step to lead, to stimulate interest on the part of the private sector, and to prove the immense new resources that he and many experts knew were there. These resources are now vital to Canada's future, particularly in the field of energy. Such was his interest in the West and in the North of this great country, the extent of its wealth, that the magnitude of the territory did not overawe him. These things stimulated him.

His interests were not solely economic. Senator Pater-son reminded me this morning, when talking about Senator Laing, of the notable speech he made in this chamber shortly after he first came here on the value of our national parks. He knew and loved the beauty of the remote regions of Canada, and he understood something of their majesty. He had great admiration for Canada's aboriginal people, the Indian and the Eskimo. He knew them and he cultivated them, and he was a dedicated collector of their artifacts and handicrafts.

Arthur Laing was a robust, sincere, practical Canadian, an ornament to family life and to public life. It was a privilege for each one of us to have been his colleague.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I first met Arthur Laing when he came into the House of Commons in 1949. We became good and warm friends, and that friendship continued. I remember as though it were yesterday when I spoke to him at his home just before he went into the hospital.

He was a hard and devoted worker, and his view was a national one. Despite the difficult departments he headed from time to time, he had a sense of courtesy and decency that made him many friendships that he retained.

He had a special affection for the native people. He thought they had been wronged, and that something should be done about righting that wrong. He made a particular contribution to the veterans, not so much in what he did but in the way he did it, and they knew and accepted this. His love for the North was legend. I was privileged to accompany him on one of the trips he made to the North country. He was anxious that the natural resources which were ours should be used for the benefit of all Canadians. He was a great public servant, a great Canadian and a fine man. In his political life he walked the street called Straight.

To me, honourable senators, his passing has brought a deep sense of loss and sadness, and I join with all in this house in extending sympathy to his widow and daughter.

● (2020)

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, there is little I can add to what has already been said so eloquently by my leader, by the Leader of the Opposition and by other senators who are old friends of Arthur Laing and old political compatriots, by the way, just as I. I will take only a moment of your time, as another member of the Senate from British Columbia, to join in paying a modest tribute to him.

Arthur Laing was of all things a professional politician. There are many in other walks of life who would not appreciate fully what I mean. However, I think all of us in this chamber understand the type of professionalism there is in this field, which was Arthur's chosen field and which brought to him the admiration of friend and foe alike. Upon the tragedy of his illness coming to the attention of Liberals in British Columbia, a testimonial dinner was arranged for Arthur Laing last September. It was almost unique in Canadian political history. A thousand or more attended, including the Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau, and a former Prime Minister, Mr. Diefenbaker; the Premier of British Columbia, Mr. Barrett, and a former Premier, Mr. Bennett. The Commissioners of both the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories insisted on attending. The National President of the Veterans' Associations of Canada insisted on coming and, I might say, paid Senator Laing the most glowing tributes at that dinner for his work as Minister of Veterans Affairs.

It was an astonishing event and a great tribute to Arthur. The Prime Minister took the opportunity to announce that the new bridge connecting Vancouver to the international airport—which, incidentally, has one end in Arthur Laing's riding of Vancouver South and the other end in his birthplace of Richmond—would be named after him upon its completion in a few months. His funeral was a further manifestation of the esteem in which he was held by people in British Columbia, who came in large numbers from his riding, from all sections of Vancouver society, from all walks of life. The leaders of this nation came together again at that funeral. There were many from Ottawa who attended, one of whom said to me on the plane coming back that he would have attended Arthur Laing's funeral even if he had had to walk from Ottawa.

I should like to join with others in paying tribute to a man I have worked with politically for 25 or 30 years. We had our differences, but I always admired him greatly as being a true professional.

Hon. Guy Williams: Honourable senators, I should like to extend a few words of sympathy to the family of our late colleague, the Honourable Arthur Laing.

I first met Arthur Laing approximately 38 years ago. At that time I was already well established in the work of the Indian organizations of British Columbia. I learned a great deal from him when he became Minister of Indian Affairs. The way of life of the Indian was a matter of concern to him.

It was his viewpoint that the Indians of this country—250,000 of them—were losing their identity and were unable to get themselves out of the vacuum, as he put it to me at one time. At one time, when he was Minister of Indian Affairs, he said to me, "I had to shock you and your people into coming back to life." He said that the Indian people of Canada could not fight their way out of a wet paper bag.

He encouraged them back to life, and for that the Indian people are grateful to the great Arthur Laing. His name had become a household word among the Indian people, even before he left us. They are grateful to him for enabling them to regain their courage and identity.

I appreciate having known Arthur Laing, and having worked with him on many occasions. For that I am most grateful.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Wednesday, February 19, 1975, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, before the question is put I should like to add a word of explanation. I understand that tomorrow morning the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will consider Bill C-40, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act, and that the Minister of Finance will be in attendance. There is a possibility that consideration of that bill might be completed before the noon adjournment of the committee, but it may extend into the afternoon. As soon as the committee completes its consideration of Bill C-40, it will then begin its consideration of Bill C-29, respecting Canadian business corporations.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators have heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 13, the debate on the motion of Senator Molgat for second reading of Bill C-370, to amend the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I assure you that I shall not detain you very long. I am not entirely in agreement with the sponsor of the bill, Senator Molgat, that this is a simple bill merely because it deletes four words from the present legislation. I have read Senator Molgat's speech. It was a good speech which tried valiantly to simplify the problem. I am not entirely convinced, however, that the practical results of the amendment proposed to the existing legislation will be exactly those expected or that they will be as practical as has been suggested.

As honourable senators know, the general rule as to the determination of the boundaries of an electoral district is that the population has to be in accordance with the electoral quota for that province, give or take 25 per cent, the commissions being entitled under certain circumstances to depart from this rule. Subparagraph 13(c)(i) of the present act reads:

- (i) special geographic considerations, including in particular the sparsity, density or relative rate of growth of population of various regions of the province, the accessibility of such regions or the size or shape thereof, appear to the commission to render such a departure necessary or desirable, or—

This bill would delete the words, "or relative rate of growth" because, as Senator Molgat said, the commissions find it difficult to consider that factor at the same time as other factors. I may be entirely wrong, but as I read the present legislation I do not take it as meaning that all factors have to be taken into consideration at the same time. As I read it, the commissions can take one and forget the others. In other words, the commissions may take only one factor into consideration, and the deletion of the factor in relation to the relative rate of growth of population does not simplify the job of the commissions.

It may be that some commissioners have interpreted this subparagraph in such a way that makes their task awkward. In order to find out what exactly they have in mind and to get specific cases, I think it would be a good thing to have this bill referred to a committee. Honourable senators could then find out from the commissioners themselves exactly what they feel the problem is and whether this solution would really help them in their work, really achieve the purpose intended.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if Senator Molgat speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Flynn: He has not asked to speak.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, if no one else wishes to speak, I am prepared to close the debate on second reading.

First of all, I thank Senator Flynn for his comments. I agree with him when he says that there are a number of factors listed and, presumably, a commission could take one and ignore the others. Apparently what has happened is that the commissions have felt that because of this list they should look at each of the factors. Therefore, they ended up by balancing those factors such as sparsity of population against the rate of growth. The result was that in respect of the urban constituency, where the rate of growth is high, vis-à-vis the rural constituency, where the rate of growth is not high but where the density is low, they decided they should make little differentiation, if any. Hence the original intent of the act, which is to allow a smaller population in the larger geographic areas, in the rural areas in particular, was not effected.

The purpose of the proposed amendment is to remove the words "relative rate of growth," so that the commissions will not find themselves in that bind, and can actually follow the original intent of the act, which was to give them the discretion where they felt that because of the distances involved, or the sparsity of population, they should reduce the total number of electors in certain ridings.

From a legal standpoint, I think Senator Flynn is correct. The commissions could probably have taken one factor to the exclusion of the others. I think they looked at it and assumed that they had to balance the whole thing. I do not criticize them for that. In presenting the bill, I recognized what had happened. This bill merely intends to correct that. I believe that the proposed amendment will correct the act so as to make it effective in the light of its original intent.

During the second reading debate certain questions were asked. In particular, Senator Desruisseaux asked me questions regarding the appointment of the commissions and the names of the members. I obtained a list of those members, and supplied it directly to Senator Desruisseaux. I have that list available. If other honourable senators wish to have it, obviously I can make it available to them also. I suppose it could be printed in Hansard, but I do not think that is necessary, although if there is a desire that that be done I am quite prepared to do so.

There was a further question about the appointment of the next commissioners. The list with which I have supplied Senator Desruisseaux is that for 1972, which is now no longer in effect. A new list of commissioners will have to be established, and I believe that will be done, under the law, within the next ten days. By the first week of March the commissioners must be reappointed, and it is my understanding that that will be done. As I said, the list that Senator Desruisseaux has is the list of the last group of commissioners, and does not necessarily contain the names of the next group.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Molgat: Next sitting.

Senator Flynn: Are you moving third reading at the next sitting?

Senator Molgat: Yes.

Senator Flynn: I thought the bill would be referred to committee and that we would be given some explanation of precisely why it is needed.

Senator Molgat: As I indicated during the debate on second reading, I certainly have no objection to its being referred to a committee.

Senator Flynn: That is what I suggested.

Senator Molgat: There is a problem related to the reply I gave about the appointment of commissioners. It is my understanding that under the law they must be appointed within 60 days of a report made on January 3, and this should therefore be done no later than March 3. It would, I think, be helpful to the whole process if this bill could be passed so that they can be appointed soon and start their work. However, if there is a desire that the bill should go to committee, I have no objection. I believe it has been the practice of this house, on a matter pertaining specifically to the operations and rules of the House of Commons, to leave the decision mainly to that house. Certainly, if there is a desire on the part of honourable senators that the bill should go to committee, I am quite prepared to so move.

Senator Flynn: There is a question of balance between the provinces here. I think it is important to have the bill referred to committee. That will in no way preclude the immediate appointment of members of the commissions, if that is the desire of the government.

Senator Molgat: If there is a desire that this bill should go to committee, I am prepared to move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, with the hope that it will be considered soon so that the matter may be disposed of with dispatch.

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, on that point, I would say it is absolutely impossible for the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to consider this bill in the near future. As you know, we have hearings scheduled on the cannabis bill, which will continue for some weeks, and I cannot see how we can change the plans we have made.

Senator Flynn: Surely the honourable senator can find an hour for the committee to examine this bill. It is not difficult to postpone a scheduled hearing from 9.30 to 10.30. I have seen that done before by Senator Hayden, for instance. Tomorrow morning the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will deal with Bill C-40, before going on to consider the Canadian Business Corporations bill, which was scheduled to be before his committee at 9.30. I am willing to help the honourable senator with his administrative problems if he wants any help.

Senator Goldenberg: I will ask the honourable Leader of the Opposition to convince some members of my committee that we should start at 9.30.

Senator Flynn: Senator Hayden convinces the members of his committee.

On motion of Senator Molgat, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, February 5, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Deschatelets calling the attention of the Senate to the claim made by the Minister of Justice of the Province of Quebec for financial compensation from the federal government with respect to the Quebec Provincial Police Force and to the ever-increasing costs of maintaining the various police forces in Canada.

● (2050)

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, first of all, I should like to congratulate Senator Deschatelets for having drawn the attention of the Senate to a matter which, to my mind, now proves to be a real credibility test for our federal regime.

As we know, since its foundation, our country has lived through difficult periods from a constitutional point of view. It will always be thus, where various governments are called upon to administer exclusive and concurrent jurisdictions under a federal system.

Throughout the years our federal system has been qualified variously, depending on whether the relations were harmonious or discordant, between the federal authority and the provinces. We have often heard Canadian prime ministers claim that their administration was representative of decentralizing cooperative and just federalism. At the present time, it seems that we are living under a just federal system. However, to date, that just federalism has not performed any miracles, if we look at existing constitutional conflicts between the federal government and the provinces. No solutions have been found to those conflicts in many a year.

I remember the Victoria Charter which was studied in the hope of reaching an agreement with the provinces. That formula has been set aside.

We know the difficulties there are in interpreting the offshore mining rights policy, when some Maritime provinces challenge the federal government over the ownership of those natural resources.

We are now aware of the problem between Alberta and Ottawa about oil. We are also aware of the conflict between British Columbia and the federal government about natural gas.

A few years ago we established a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to examine and review our constitutional system. The committee spent a great deal of the taxpayers' money. It travelled throughout Canada, held sittings in almost all the capital cities in the country. A report was tabled in the Senate and the House of Commons, but it has been shelved.

Therefore, as I said earlier, I feel that if we live in a fair federal system, so far federalism has not worked miracles. We are tackling the matter now before the Senate from that point of view.

Of course, I shall not detail once again the agreements the federal government negotiated with eight of the provinces for the services of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. We know Section 20 of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act. We know that Senator Deschatelets made a brilliant presentation of it. But, to sum it up, the federal government, through agreements passed with eight provinces, pays 52 per cent of their police costs while Ontario and Quebec pay their police costs in full.

The Quebec Minister of Justice, the Honourable Mr. Choquette, calls that discrimination because Quebec and Ontario taxpayers have been helping by their taxes to pay 52 per cent of the police costs supported by the federal government in provinces much richer than Quebec since the fiscal year 1966-67 up to and including 1973-74.

The tax compensation demanded by Quebec would be equivalent to the cost the Government of Canada would have incurred to maintain RCMP services in the province of Quebec. I think all honourable senators received from the Quebec Department of Justice a booklet entitled Le coût de la police—Où sont-ils donc tous ces millions? (Police Cost—Where Are All Those Millions?). If one looks at page 7 of that booklet one can see what would have been the costs to the RCMP of supporting police costs in Quebec. One can read the following:

Part of the average operating and maintenance cost from 1966-67 to 1972-73 inclusive—$199,139,769

Part of "HQ" division expenditures included in the average operating and maintenance cost from 1966-67 to 1972-73 inclusive—$8,609,312

Space used by QPP from 1966-67 to 1972-73 inclusive—$21,893,818

Law enforcement and maintenance of peace and order in a number of Quebec municipalities from 1966-67 to 1972-73 inclusive, in a proportion equivalent to the number of municipalities policed by the RCMP in other provinces—$63,598,918

Claim for year 1973-74—$68,868,930

That would represent an outlay of $362,110,747 which the federal government would have spent had the RCMP been exclusively entrusted with policing that province.

Those figures, honourable senators, are not opposed by the Solicitor General.

Due to this disparity, Quebec and Ontario get no compensation. What are the consequences of this dispute between Quebec and the federal government?

● (2100)

First of all, Quebec and Ontario are penalized because they are not part to the agreement—I shall speak in a moment of this agreement between the federal government and the eight other provinces in respect of services provided by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Quebec and Ontario taxpayers have to pay twice for their police services in their respective province, as well as for the services provided to the eight other provinces that are party to the agreement, since the taxes of Quebec and Ontario taxpayers are also used to defray the costs of the RCMP in the eight other provinces where the latter has jurisdiction in lieu of the provincial police concerned.

What are also the other consequences? Well, our police services are less efficient in Quebec because they lack equipment and staff, and because they have to operate within restricted financial limits. What are the other consequences? Municipalities in Quebec are losing this year $15 million—for this year only—comparatively to municipalities in the other provinces which benefit from the services of the federal police. And all this under agreements concluded with the other eight provinces allowing those municipalities to get compensation from the federal government when they ask for the services of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in the municipalities. What are also the other consequences? I am still referring to Quebec. Our police forces and our municipalities have to sustain an acute financial crisis. One may recall, particularly when reading newspapers, the financial difficulties experienced by the M.U.C. in Montreal. The metropolitan government has to lay off police officers; but municipalities, as well as the metropolitan government, cannot indulge in this luxury because they lack equipment, mostly in Montreal where the municipalities must be better equipped than elsewhere to fight against organized crime. Now you know to what degree the Montreal area is affected at the present time by the underworld, also that crimes are being committed everyday as one can read in the newspapers. What happens? What are the consequences for the province of Quebec? As I said, society's security in that province is endangered because we have at our disposal inadequate means for fighting organized crime. That debate between the federal government, Quebec and Ontario, and especially Quebec, has been going on for a long time.

The minister, Mr. Choquette, raised that question on January 16, 1973. One can read on page 20 of the booklet I mentioned a while ago that on January 16, 1973, the Minister of Justice, Mr. Jérôme Choquette, raised for the first time in public the question of financial compensation from the federal government for the maintenance and administration of the Quebec Police Force, at a conference or on a one-day symposium held by the Quebec Police Commission.

That question was raised almost every month during 1973. There were conversations, discussions between the Solicitor General and the Quebec Minister of Justice, which did not come to much. I will say a few words about that later on. I am sure that all senators received those papers from the Quebec Minister of Justice. When one reads the explanatory letter as well as the answer given by the Minister of Justice to the Solicitor General on October 24, 1973, one can realize that the case as presented by the Quebec Minister of Justice was not refuted by the Solicitor General. In his letter, the minister states, and I quote:

Quebec is only calling for a just treatment within a just federalism. Whatever may be the reasons given by the federal government to justify the advantages it grants other provinces, that does not explain why Quebec should tolerate any longer the financial discrimination exercised against us.

Further on, he had this to say, and I quote again:

You tell us that it is not your fault if Quebec was not represented at the conferences where the cost sharing formula was discussed in 1960 and 1964.

But a few lines further down he mentions his written communications with the Solicitor General:

You deprive us of the right to take part in the discussions and negotiations for the renewal of the contracts in 1976, probably to be able to say afterwards that it is not your fault if we are not part to the agreements which will be renewed in 1976.

And the letter goes on in the same vein. Of course, the minister says that it is beyond question that under the Constitution the provinces and the municipalities have responsibilities in police matters. In this, I believe that the federal government and the Solicitor General are not questioning the exclusive rights of the provinces in police matters under the Constitution.

In his letter, also, the minister speaks of arbitrary action since the reasons mentioned by the Solicitor General do not hold water. When he says that the case cannot be reopened since Quebec and Ontario are not party to the agreements signed with the eight other provinces in 1966, and when he also denies Quebec and Ontario the right to attend the conferences in 1976 when the agreements will be renewed with the other eight provinces, I suggest that the Solicitor General has failed to grasp the problem. I do not understand how he can turn down so categorically the claims of Quebec and Ontario concerning financial compensation for police costs.

Yet, in Quebec, everyone supports the arguments of Mr. Choquette. Police forces and the National Assembly support unanimously the position of the Quebec Minister of Justice, as well as certain Quebec members of Parliament in Ottawa. The position of the official Opposition in the Senate is well known: our party leader already asked the former government leader, the Honourable Paul Martin, whether the Solicitor General had taken a decision about the request addressed to him concerning compensation for Quebec, and the Leader of the Government answered as reported in the Senate Hansard for April 4, 1974:

The Solicitor General told me that his reply was not yet ready, he was preparing it.

● (2110)

Now I am asked is it because the Solicitor General is finding some difficulty. Well, that could be one of the reasons.

It was obviously difficult, and it still is difficult for the Solicitor General to support his refusal with a tight and strong argumentation on constitutional grounds. I can imagine no way of doing so. I shall just have to state in what way the financial compensation could be carried out.

The representatives of the ten Canadian provinces who met in Toronto, during the interprovincial conference of ministers of justice and attorneys general, unanimously acknowledged the validity of the claim made by Quebec and Ontario. Moreover, the attorneys general and ministers of justice who had all met together had come up with two resolutions in that respect. The first one reasserts the constitutional jurisdiction of provinces over police matters. The second one calls for a new distribution of tax resources on an equal basis throughout Canada with other provinces that are able to assume their constitutional responsibilities.

The attorneys general and the ministers of justice from all provinces together in Toronto approved on May 14, 1974 the claim put forward by Quebec and Ontario with regard to police expenses.

The only person now arguing his case in—shall I say—confused fashion is the Solicitor General. He does not deny the provinces, on constitutional grounds, the right to administer their police forces because clearly, under section 92 of the BNA Act, provinces have that right. What he implies, however, is that since Quebec and Ontario were not party to the agreements with the eight other provinces, we cannot go over that, that Ontario and Quebec must go on paying for their own police forces. Also, that the taxpayers in those two provinces have to subsidize through taxes the upkeep of police forces in other provinces of Canada. The Solicitor General feels that is absolutely normal. That is federalism in 1975.

I believe, however, that problem could be solved very easily, through the opting out formula. In 1965, agreements were signed between the federal and provincial governments on ten joint programs that could be implemented either by the federal government or the provinces. Provinces were told if they did not wish to exercise their jurisdiction, the federal government would step in but provide financial compensation. So it was with ten federal-provincial programs.

So the Solicitor General can very easily use the opting out formula in order that Quebec and Ontario receive compensation. There is no constitutional precedent, in my view, in granting such fiscal compensation.

In his letter dated October 24, 1974, the Quebec Justice Minister does not mince his words. He says the federal government's attitude is high-handed. He says Quebec and Ontario taxpayers, mainly those in Quebec, are discriminated against when financial compensation is denied. On page 6 of that letter, he says, speaking to the Solicitor General:

You will appreciate that I regret to note the fact that, according to the logic of your last letter and from your past position statements, you are satisfied to see the Quebec taxpayers receiving no financial assistance for the maintenance of their police force and on the other hand, contributing through their taxes to the maintenance of police forces in other provinces.

And you will recall that in the same letter, the Quebec Minister of Justice had made the people of the province aware of that problem, and that he invited the Solicitor General to take part with him, on channel 10 in Montreal, in a TV debate in order to explain to the Quebec people why he rejected those claims from Quebec and Ontario. You will recall that on June 13, 1974, the province of Ontario, through its Solicitor General the Honourable George Kerr, had taken the same position as Quebec regarding the management of police costs and he had submitted the same request to the federal government.

I think it is an important issue as I said earlier and I think it is a credibility test of today's federalism. Are we going to keep on living with our present constitutional system merely granting to provinces rights and privileges a few at a time? I think it would be important to consider the feasibility of a complete constitutional review.

I know that certain rights belonging exclusively to provinces could be exercised better by the federal government and that federal rights would be exercised better by provinces. As I said earlier, since 1963 there was no constitutional change. We still have a hundred-year-old formula but we are in 1975.

Honourable senators, I will tell you quite frankly, when the taxpayers of the other provinces are concerned with the rise of separatism in Quebec and, at the same time, refuse the Quebec government such a financial compensation—which I feel is absolutely justified—we are knowingly sowing the seeds of separatism in Quebec. When one witnesses this public debate between Quebec and the federal government, when the Quebec Minister of Justice is unanimously supported by the National Assembly in Quebec, which means that the representatives of the 108 Quebec ridings, regardless of their political party, vote and tell the minister "You are indeed right, you are entitled to a financial compensation"; when the Solicitors General and the Ministers of Justice of all the other provinces of Canada, meeting in Toronto, also state that Quebec is right in claiming such a compensation; when the police bodies, the people and the municipalities in Quebec agree with the minister, Mr. Choquette, there is only one man to say no, the Solicitor General. He says, "No, because you are not party to the agreements signed by the other eight provinces in 1966."

If the Solicitor General has other reasons than the ones already given in his correspondence with the Quebec Minister of Justice, then let him make them public, since this debate has now become public. In view of the stubbornness of the Solicitor General, this debate must not be allowed to become acrimonious, because such a risk cannot be incurred.

Of course, if such trivial requests are continually turned down, how are we going to agree on vital constitutional matters? I really believe—and so do the people in Quebec—that it is such petty things which give Quebecers serious doubts on the soundness of the present federalist system.

It is a prize issue for the Quebec separatists. And God knows that the Parti québécois makes the most of it.

I have a feeling that Senator Deschatelets has raised a major issue. It concerns the Senate, which was actually created to safeguard the rights of the various minorities in the provinces, and here we have rights that two provinces are upholding before the federal government. I think that the Senate must take a clear stand on such an important matter. I hope that after this debate, Senator Deschatelets will see the possibility of moving a motion asking the government to reconsider its decision and above all to ask the Solicitor General to try and better understand, yes, better understand, Quebec's needs in the area of police administration.

Honourable senators, it is our responsibility to express an opinion on this matter, to whatever party we may belong. There are in this chamber senators from Ontario, and also from Quebec as well as from all the other provinces. I think we must express our views clearly in this matter. I shall listen to this debate with pleasure and, if Senator Deschatelets does move a motion, I shall be very glad to second that motion asking the Senate to take a collective stand on this important matter.

[English]

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, before the debate is adjourned would Senator Asselin permit a question? Would he not agree that he has oversimplified this case somewhat in that precisely the same agreement that was offered to eight provinces of Canada is and has been available to Quebec and Ontario if they wished to enter into it?

Senator Asselin: I think the question is also oversimplified, Senator Hicks. But the entire idea is quite clear and quite simple in my mind.

Senator Hicks: But is it not correct that the same agreements were made available to Ontario and Quebec as were available to the rest of Canada?

Senator Asselin: They were available in 1966 and 1967 but the time has changed since then and we are now in 1975. But are Quebec and Ontario entitled to attend at this conference of all the provinces dealing with this question in 1976? Why should the Solicitor General refuse to allow Quebec and Ontario to attend this conference?

Senator Hicks: That is a good question.

Senator Flynn: I hope Senator Hicks is going to speak on it.

On motion of Senator Desruisseaux, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I would like to correct a slight error in the report sent to honourable senators on Thursday, following my statement in the house with respect to the work schedule for this week. I mentioned in that statement that the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications will sit tomorrow. Unfortunately, and for reasons unknown, that part of the message was left out of the circular letter sent out.

Therefore, I wish to remind you that the Standing

Senate Committee on Transport and Communications will meet at 9.30 tomorrow morning in room 356-S.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

CANADIAN COUNCIL OF CHRISTIANS AND JEWS

BROTHERHOOD WEEK

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, I should like to draw your attention to an event that is well known to many of you, and that is the celebration of Brotherhood Week this week, from February 16 to February 23. I know that many of you know about it because of your being deeply involved with the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews and having participated in many of its programs.

Brotherhood Week is sponsored by the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews. The chairman this year—and this is perhaps of particular significance since this is International Women's Year—is Betty Kennedy, the well-known radio broadcaster of CFRB in Toronto. The motto for this year is "Do Good." We appreciate the fact that there is a pejorative sense, a nasty sense, in which people call a lot of others do-gooders. The council is pointing out that without the work of the service groups—the churches, fraternal organizations and others—who may be called the do-gooders, society would be in great difficulty indeed.

The motto for this week is, "Do Good." There are functions going on all across the country. Many of you already know, I am sure, of the functions that are going on in your particular part of the country. For example, in Toronto, tomorrow, there is a no-lunch luncheon for women, at which they expect approximately five hundred women to pay $5 for a lunch they will not have; that $5 will then be used for various aid projects of the organization.

The observation in Ottawa will be in the Railway Committee Room tomorrow between 6 o'clock and 10 o'clock in the evening. It will take the form of a wine and cheese party, which everyone is invited to attend.

You are probably aware of the programs of the organization, but perhaps the one best known is the exchange which is carried out each year. Last year some 3,800 youngsters, half French speaking, half English speaking, crossed the country to visit with people of the other language group. During the summer that is a large program, and the council hopes to repeat that again this year. They have been doing it for many years.

They also carry on a labour-management conference every year. In addition, there are police-community consultations which take place all over the country. They are going on constantly. I had the opportunity to participate in one last week.

The religious dialogue is another important aspect of this program, because prejudice is always with us; and, because, particularly at times such as now, when fear seems to be mounting in people's minds, the tendency is to forget about our equality and our brotherhood under God.

A simple little program, which I think is indicative of the usefulness of the organization, is a program they have set up in Calgary in which 20 Indian children and 20 non-Indian children are given horses and are sent off into the wilderness together for a couple of weeks of camping. They just live together and learn about each other during this time. So, the programs of the Council are such that there is one in operation almost every day of the 365 days of the year.

[Translation]

I would like to point out that on Thursday, February 20, at 6 p.m., there will be a wine and cheese party in the Railway Committee Room.

I also invite honourable senators to attend the event which will be held on Parliament Hill Thursday evening as well as the various celebrations which will take place throughout the country during Brotherhood Week and also to take part in the programs of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews throughout the year.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Wednesday next, February 26, 1975, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is there unanimous consent?

Senator Flynn: The Deputy Leader of the Government will put on record the reason for the motion?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, the reason for this motion is that on next Wednesday the committee will be considering Bill S-20, the Territorial Lands Act, and the minister will be in attendance. I understand that is the only time that the minister could make the necessary arrangements to attend the committee meeting. It is not anticipated that the meeting will be long.

Senator Flynn: The minister is not just trying to be away from the House of Commons during the question period, is he?

Senator Goldenberg: The hour for the meeting will be 3.30 p.m. It will give him time to attend the question period.

Senator Flynn: That is better.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I hope we are not into a proliferation of this kind of motion. We had a motion for another committee to sit while the Senate was sitting this week. I understand that may not be necessary now.

Senator Langlois: It is not necessary.

Senator Grosart: However, we had the motion, and now we have a motion for another committee to sit while the Senate is sitting. I would suggest that the business of the Senate in this chamber should take precedence over any request of any committee to sit while the Senate is sitting. We are told over and over again that the important thing for us to do, to show that we are in business, is to have attendance in this chamber. The experience in the past has been that once a committee is given this power we have committee after committee asking permission to sit while the Senate is sitting. I hope we have an understanding that this will be only in exceptional cases.

In this particular case I am not convinced that the minister could not appear before this committee at any other time than 3.30 next Wednesday afternoon. Surely the business in this chamber should take precedence over the convenience of any committee chairman or any committee.

I know there can be exceptional circumstances. The reason I rise at this time, however, is that we have had two such motions in two successive weeks, and if our experience in the past is any indication of what may happen in the future we will have two committees wanting to sit while the Senate is sitting next week.

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, may I explain to Senator Grosart that the minister might be able to appear on Tuesday the 25th, but the committee has scheduled a whole series of witnesses for that day, and we just could not fit the minister in without having witnesses from out of town change their arrangements. That is the only reason.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it should be pointed out that there is a possibility, of course, that the house could adjourn by the hour of 3.30. Therefore, the idea of having as many senators as possible in this chamber, and the idea of full representation on committees, as well, are concepts that are not too incompatible.

● (1410)

I want to report to the Senate that the question, indeed the problem, of scheduling meetings of Senate committees, and the setting of appropriate hours for those committees, is now under active consideration. We hope in a short time to establish a system of committee co-ordination in order to avoid scheduling clashes insofar as it is possible to do so. Some of the points that the Deputy Leader of the Opposition has just made certainly have validity.

Senator Asselin: I hope you will take into account the small number of senators sitting on this side of the house when you are working on this problem of co-ordination.

Senator Perrault: We are concerned about that problem.

Senator Walker: And you are going to correct it?

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO TELEVIEW CERTAIN OF ITS PUBLIC HEARINGS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molson, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald:

That the Senate do approve the decision of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to permit the televising of certain of its proceedings on an experimental basis only.—(Honourable Senator Croll).

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, with the permission of the Senate I should like to speak now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that Senator McElman shall speak now instead of Senator Croll?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, I wish first of all to thank Senator Croll for his generosity in permitting me to take his place at this stage of the debate on this motion.

Senator Flynn: Don't mention it.

Senator McElman: Let me say immediately that I support the purpose of the motion that electronic broadcasting of certain proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be permitted on a purely experimental basis. Since the initial question concerning the propriety of the manner in which this matter was first brought before the Senate was raised by me, several honourable senators have expressed to me their mistaken conclusion that I opposed the proposition itself. I did not oppose it and I do not now oppose it. I do in fact support it. I am convinced that such an experiment will assist the Senate in any future consideration it may give to the electronic broadcasting of its proceedings either in the house or in any of its committees.

Having expressed that agreement, I should be less than candid if I did not also say that I disagree with the manner in which this important subject was referred to the standing committee. I disagree with the expressed view that that committee had power and authority to decide upon the matter without having first been so empowered or authorized by the Senate itself, and I disagree with the committee in so acting. I disagree with the way in which that committee, through its chairman, delivered a statement—not a written report—to the Senate, simply advising the Senate of its decision, after it had become a fait accompli, on a very important matter that had not even been referred to it by the Senate.

Finally, I disagree with some of the wording of the motion now before us, because in its present form the motion could be interpreted as giving approval to the course followed by the committee in this instance. That, in my view, would be a bad precedent.

In all fairness it must be said that Senator Molson's motion was drawn in haste, in an effort to bring some order out of the exceptional discussion which was then taking place in the Senate.

I will move an amendment to the motion in an effort to meet the concerns that have been expressed by several honourable senators in this matter, concerns that I share. One is that we must avoid the creation of a precedent that could hang around our collective necks like a millstone at some future point in time. It is significant that among those senators who have expressed their concern are Senator Molson, long-time member and Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders; Senator Grosart, a long-time active and productive member of the same committee; Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière) and Senator Denis, who together have accumulated a total of over 80 years of experience in Parliament.

Senator Flynn: It shows.

Senator Argue: Perhaps that accounts for it.

Senator Asselin: Is that a good reference?

Senator McElman: I assure Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière) that it was meant as a compliment.

Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière): Thank you.

Senator McElman: These senators have knowledge of the rules, practices, procedures and privileges of Parliament. I would also mention Senator Prowse, who served as an Opposition Leader in a provincial legislature before coming here some nine years ago; Senator Benidickson, with some 30 years' experience in Parliament, Senator Carter, another veteran of both Houses of Parliament, and Senator Flynn, the respected Leader of the Opposition, with some 16 years of parliamentary experience.

The point is obvious. When such a battery of experienced parliamentarians express concern and counsel caution over something that is being done, the Senate should take pause and consider cautiously the course to be followed. Hasty decisions are very often not the best decisions. We have now had such a pause and I am sure that many senators have used that time to study the rules, practices, precedents and privileges as they may be brought to bear in this instance.

Honourable senators, with your indulgence and before moving an amendment, I would draw your attention to some of our rules as they may be brought to apply to the sequence of events under discussion.

An old New Brunswick friend of mine, now departed, who was a tremendous woodsman and professional guide, used to advise: "If you want to know where you're goin', you have got to know where you've been at." We should look at where we've been at. The Leader of the Government in the Senate received a request from a member of the press gallery asking permission to televise certain proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Senator Walker: May I ask a question? Is my friend referring to his friend K. C. Irving?

Senator Langlois: He is not a member of the press gallery.

Senator Perrault: He is not a New Brunswick woodsman.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, I do not recognize either the relevance or the purpose of the question. I do recognize that Senator Walker is a great friend of Mr.

[Senator McElman.]

Irving and I hope he will recognize that, although I have been one of Mr. Irving's critics in certain respects, I am still one of his great admirers.

Senator Walker: And one of his friends, I suppose.

Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière): Don't be jealous.

Senator McElman: As I said, the leader received a request from a member of the press gallery asking permission to televise certain proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. Senator Perrault referred the request to the committee. The committee considered the matter—in camera, I understand—and decided to permit such televising. In some manner the press was advised of those events, and some senators learned of this for the first time by reading about it in their local newspapers. The Senate was later informed, on Tuesday evening last, of the decision reached by the committee, but Senate approval of that decision was not sought.

● (1420)

What do our rules provide in such circumstances? Rule 5(s), on page 4, defines the term "standing committee," as follows:

(s) "standing committee" means a select committee appointed to consider and to report thereon to the Senate matters falling within the duties specifically assigned to it by these rules, and on other matters that may from time to time be referred to it by the Senate.

Rule 67(1)(j), on page 34, provides for the establishment of a Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, and sets forth those matters that shall be referred to it. It reads:

(j) The Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which shall be referred on motion all bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to legal and constitutional matters generally, including:

- (i) federal-provincial relations;
- (ii) administration of justice, law reform and all matters related thereto;
- (iii) the judiciary;
- (iv) all essentially juridical matters;
- (v) private bills not otherwise specifically assigned to another committee, including those related to marriage and divorce.

Rule 67(2), at page 36, provides for reference of residual matters to Senate committees. It reads:

(2) Any bill, message, petition, inquiry, paper, or other matter which does not fall within the subject matters assigned to a standing committee under subsection (1)—

The one to which I have just referred.

—shall be referred, as the Senate may decide, to any committee.

One should emphasize the words "as the Senate may decide."

Rule 71, also at page 36, sets forth the powers that shall be conferred upon a standing committee. It reads:

A standing committee shall be empowered to inquire into and report upon such matters as are referred to it from time to time by the Senate, and shall be authorized to send for persons, papers and records, whenever required, and to print from day to day such papers and evidence as may be ordered by it.

Under our rules, only one committee is empowered to act "on its own initiative," namely, the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders. This is provided for under rule 67(1)(e), at page 30, which says:

The Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, which is empowered on its own initiative to propose to the Senate amendments to the rules from time to time.

Honourable senators, I suggest it is very clear that the Senate is jealous of its powers and that it exercises great care in delegating its powers even to its committees.

The rules quoted are precise, explicit and clear. In the matter under discussion, the Senate did not empower, instruct or authorize the committee in question to consider or decide upon the question of televising proceedings of any committee. It was, I submit, entirely beyond the powers of that committee to either consider or decide upon such a question. Such a question can be decided only by the Senate, and if it should decide the question in the affirmative, it could then empower a committee to permit such televising of its proceedings by motion, as provided for in appendix II of our rules, at pages 114 and 116.

Should there be any doubt concerning the relevance of the rules referred to, let us look at rule 1 on page 2, which is marginally noted, "Procedure in unprovided cases." It reads:

1. In all cases not provided for hereinafter, or by sessional or other orders, the standing orders, the rules, usages, forms and proceedings of the Parliament of Canada, in force up to the day on which the present rules go into operation, shall be followed so far as they can be applied to the proceedings of the Senate or any committee thereof.

I need not stress that neither the Senate nor the other place currently permit electronic broadcasting of proceedings, except on very special ceremonial occasions. That fact, in itself, I suggest, constitutes precedent. It follows as day follows night that no committee of the Senate can or, indeed, should attempt to arrogate to itself powers that have not been delegated to it by the Senate expressly.

All of what I have said to this point would apply if the subject under discussion concerned only a matter that could be referred or not referred by the Senate for consideration by a committee. I submit that it goes even deeper. I submit that it is a matter that involves the privileges of the Senate as a whole and the privileges of each senator. It falls directly within the privileges of the Senate, and it is an imperative of our privileges that the proceedings of the Senate and its committees be free from any and all outside or extraneous disturbances which would impede or inhibit the debate or the participation by honourable senators in the debates and proceedings.

Let me refer to some of the recognized authorities on parliamentary procedure: Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, Eighteenth Edition, and Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Fourth Edition, 1958. At page 76 in May, under the head, "Right to control Publication of Debates and Proceedings," subhead "Lords," is the following:

Under the Lords' Standing Order No. 15 the printing or publishing of anything relating to the proceedings of the Lords is subject to the privilege of the House.

At page 75 the following:

The determination of the Commons to secure freedom of debate is connected historically with measures designed for the avoidance of publicity, once steadily enforced on grounds of privilege and now maintained in reserve for use in emergency—the exclusion of strangers and the prohibition of the publication of debates.

And at page 132, under "Acts of Conduct Constituting Breach of Privilege or Contempt," it reads:

It may be stated generally that any act or omission which obstructs or impedes either House of Parliament in the performance of its functions, or which obstructs or impedes any member or officer of such House in the discharge of his duty, or which has a tendency, directly or indirectly, to produce such results may be treated as a contempt even though there is no precedent of the offence.

In Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Fourth Edition, citation 105(2), reads in part as follows:

It seems that the first duty of Parliament is to keep its privileges and no rule or standing order should restrain its conduct when it must vindicate its authority.

There is also a reference on page 97 of Beauchesne, citation 106(2), which I think is relevant in that there is such a breadth of privilege and yet so little in writing on privileges. It reads:

(2) The dignity and independence of the two Houses are in great measure preserved by keeping their privileges indefinite. If all the privileges of Parliament were set down and ascertained, and no privilege to be allowed but what was so defined and determined, it were easy for the executive power to devise some new case, not within the line of privilege, and under pretence thereof, to harass any refractory member and violate the freedom of Parliament.

● (1430)

There is one further quotation from Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice that I will give without comment. It is from chapter 10, "Breaches of Privilege and Contempts," at page 143:

The publication or disclosure of proceedings of committees conducted with closed doors or of draft reports of committees before they have been reported to the House will, however, constitute a breach of privilege or a contempt.

Honourable senators, there are numerous other references that could be brought to bear in this instance, but so many of them have to be read together in order to produce the intent.

Senator Walker: Could the honourable senator give us some references that are relevant?

Senator McElman: I thought these were relevant. If they were not, that is unfortunate. If the honourable senator wishes to take part in the debate he is quite at liberty to do so.

Senator Walker: I have already taken part.

Senator McElman: I am sorry. I had forgotten what you said.

Senator Argue: Let Senator Walker speak to the amendment.

Senator McElman: The public is permitted, under privilege extended by the Senate, to attend sittings of the Senate and its committees. The same applies to the press. Both are required to interfere in no way with the orderly proceedings of the house or its committees. Neither the public nor the press is permitted to bring with them anything that may inhibit or interfere with the orderly proceedings of the Senate, such as typewriters, cameras and flashguns. It is a privilege that can be, and on occasion is, withdrawn.

Television and radio broadcasting is another kettle of fish. The microphones, TV cameras, the glaring hot lights, the camera crews, producers and all the paraphernalia of the trade constitute a physical intrusion into the chamber or the committee room itself. They can inhibit, intimidate, disturb, distract, disconcert and discomfort. Their effect can be felt equally by honourable senators and by witnesses before the committee.

Honourable senators, most debates do have their lighter moments, but I guess this is not one of them. I suggest that the element of humour was provided when Senator Godfrey, so gregariously and vehemently supported by Senator Riley, invoked rule 73 which reads:

Members of the public may attend any meeting of a committee of the Senate, unless the committee otherwise orders.

Senator Godfrey went on to say:

I would think a television crew consists of members of the public.

Perhaps he did not mean to be humorous, but as he spoke I found it hilarious to carry his thesis to the extreme. In my mind's eye I could envisage the Toronto philharmonic orchestra as members of the public attending en masse a meeting of a committee, complete with strings, woodwind and brass in glorious action.

Senator Flynn: Why Toronto?

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, I submit that the admission of the physical accoutrements of the broadcast media to our proceedings, either in the Senate or in any of its committees, does come within the scope of privilege, and only the Senate itself can decide matters of privilege. I remind honourable senators that when matters of privilege arise in a committee, the committee cannot decide. It is required under our rules to report progress, and to put the matter of privilege before the Senate for its consideration and decision. I repeat, only the Senate can bestow the benefit of privilege, because only the Senate as a whole is in possession of privilege. A committee, being only a part of the whole Senate, cannot tamper with, expand, diminish or deal with the privileges of the whole Senate.

If the Senate were to approve this motion as it now stands it would approve "the decision" of the committee. I suggest that such approval would give credence to, or recognize improperly as a precedent, a right of consideration or decision that the committee does not possess. The amendment that I will propose purposely avoids any reference to any previous consideration or decision by the committee.

There is one further item in the motion that requires clarification. The motion as it now stands refers to the "televising" of proceedings. It is my view that such terminology could unintentionally leave the Senate open to a charge of discrimination against radio broadcasters, and I will propose that the term "electronic broadcasting," which includes both TV and radio, be used. It would also obviate the need for a further motion if a request is received from radio broadcasters.

Honourable senators, I have discussed my views—and, Senator Walker, only my views—

Senator Walker: With a lawyer I hope.

Senator Grosart: I hope not.

Senator McElman: Oh, a good one. I have discussed my views in this matter with the Leader of the Opposition, Senator Flynn, the Deputy Leader of the Government, Senator Langlois, and with Senator Molson, the mover of the motion, as well as others.

I cannot, of course, speak for any other senator, yet I can say that, although there may be differences of opinion as to how we may achieve a desired result, the common purpose is to resolve this question in a way that will respond to the concerns expressed by many members of this house, and that will avoid the creation of unintended precedents that could be embarrassing or detrimental to the proceedings of the Senate or its committees on some future occasion.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Honourable senators, it is with those purposes in mind that I now submit this amendment to the motion. I move, seconded by Senator Thompson:

That the motion be not now adopted but that it be amended by striking out all the words after "That the Senate do" and substituting therefor the following:

"empower the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to permit electronic broadcasting of certain of its proceedings, at the discretion of the committee, on an experimental basis only, while the committee has under consideration Bill S-19, intituled: 'An Act to amend the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Criminal Code', it being clearly understood that precedent will not be thereby established for such electronic broadcasting of future proceedings of this or any other committee of the Senate.

Senator Rowe: Honourable senators, I wish to speak to this amendment, but before I do so I believe Senator Neiman wishes to make some point on its legality.

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, I am not too concerned about the legality of the motion. In that respect I am in your hands. I am not quite sure if this is in order, but I wonder if there are not two questions to be decided here, the first of which is whether in fact the rules are as Senator McElman has stated them to be. There are a number of most knowledgeable and experienced lawyers in this chamber, and I certainly intend to refer to them so far as advice on the rules is concerned. I do not pretend to be an expert on the rules.

It seems to me, however, that the part of our rules which Senator McElman quoted referred to the substantive powers of inquiry of Senate committees; it had nothing to do with what I consider this to be namely, a peripheral matter. This may not be a procedural matter, but it certainly does not go to the topics that are actually to be discussed and considered by any committee. For that reason I cannot see how it could extend to this matter now under consideration.

As I have indicated, I would defer to the more experienced senators with respect to this matter, but I do feel that we should settle, hopefully to the satisfaction of everyone, whether in fact the rules do state what Senator McElman says they do, namely, that this matter comes under the list of subjects with which a committee may deal. I do not consider that to be the case at all.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I suppose I should make some comment upon the verbal spanking I received from Senator McElman a few moments ago.

Senator Flynn: If I may intervene, I am not sure whether Senator Neiman raised a point of order. It seemed to me that she did not, but I think it should be decided before we proceed.

Senator Croll: I do not think she raised a point of order.

Senator Flynn: I think the point Senator Neiman raised is a matter for argument, and not a point of order.

Senator Godfrey: I would think so, and I was also going to comment on Senator Neiman's remarks.

I should explain that the committee met on Tuesday morning, and later, in camera, we discussed this question of televising our proceedings. When Dr. Bette Stephenson, President of the Canadian Medical Association, started to give her evidence in the morning, there was a crew of movie cameramen present, about eight or nine in number, who proceeded to record in a very noisy manner. I rose immediately to object, explaining that I could not hear what the witness was saying for the noise they were making. I asked whether the televising of proceedings was permitted, because, if it was, I was certainly against it—as much as I would be against the Toronto Symphony playing during the committee hearings while a witness was testifying. I was assured by the chairman that they were going to be allowed only 30 seconds which, so far as I was concerned, was 30 seconds too long.

At any rate, when the committee was in camera the first questions I asked were: "Do television cameras make any noise? Will they disturb the witnesses? Can we carry on in an orderly fashion?" I was assured that they made no noise and would not disturb the witnesses, and on that basis, and that basis alone, I then supported the idea of televising as an experiment.

I believe, in spite of what Senator McElman says, that rule 73 is relevant, because otherwise the committee, so far as I was concerned, would certainly have ordered those members of the public, consisting of about 9 cameramen, who were making all the noise, to cease and desist and get out if they had remained for more than the 30 seconds allowed.

I am slightly concerned that we are spending more time here wrangling about procedures than we should. I agree with Senator Neiman that this is a procedural question which does not go to the root of the references. But, so far as I am concerned, it is rather irrelevant at this time, and in my opinion Senator McElman's amendment is acceptable. I say let us get down to it and decide the question on its merits, and not keep wrangling about what the procedure should be.

The committee itself, having been advised that it had the legal power—and it was so advised by our own parliamentary counsel—realized that there could be some dispute about this matter, so right at the beginning it decided to officially notify the Senate so that if the Senate did not agree, or did not want the committee's proceedings to be televised, it could, under the rules, instruct the committee not to permit such televising. The Senate has that power, so I say let us get on with it. As far as I am concerned, the one thing we should consider here is whether it is in the public interest to have these proceedings televised so that the public can see and hear what is going on in that committee.

After hearing the evidence so far before the committee, I am most strongly of the opinion that the more widespread the publicity we give to the proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, the better. But I am concerned that the truly interesting evidence we shall be hearing from now on will have been given without adequate coverage if there is any kind of filibuster or delay here. If that happens, then at least half of the purpose of televising these meetings would be defeated.

I see no point in televising the proceedings of committees which are considering ordinary bills, but the bill in question here is an extraordinary one that is attracting a great deal of public interest, and I think the proceedings should be televised.

Senator Rowe: Honourable senators, I shall not debate at length the merits of whether or not television should be allowed in our committees. An important principle to emphasize here, however, is that any decision to televise the proceedings of any of our committees would create an important precedent. I have the utmost respect for the work of committees and for the tireless efforts of their chairmen, but no committee should have the right to make a decision of such significance on such an important matter without reference to the Senate as a whole. And if, as Senator Godfrey suggests, the parliamentary legal advisers have indicated that that right is deemed to be there already or is inherent in the terms of reference of committees, then I say that right should not be there.

The principal reason for my concern is that we are not dealing simply with one committee; we are dealing with several vitally important committees—committees which are important because of the importance of the matters with which they are concerned. To cite one example, the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs is meeting at least once a week, and sometimes more often, to consider relations between Canada and the United States. Obviously, this is a most important topic, the discussion of which would be followed with a great deal of public interest.

In my opinion, one committee, such as the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, should not be allowed to take a decision which would, in creating a precedent, have the effect of compromising or embarrassing the activities and proceedings of any other committee of the Senate—indeed, of all other committees of the Senate. In other words, in matters as important as whether or not a committee's proceedings should be televised, the decision should not be in the power of any committee, but should be made for the committee by the Senate as a whole.

Senator Manning: Honourable senators, when this matter was first brought to the attention of the house many of us regarded it as a rather minor question: Should the committee, on its own initiative, make the decision involved or should it be a decision of the house? I certainly regard it as a rather trivial matter. Frankly, I am still puzzled as to why so many honourable senators feel it necessary to take so much time to debate a question which, in my view, is insignificant when compared with the many problems this country faces and which could more profitably be discussed in this chamber.

As far as the amendment is concerned, I think it clarifies, in a way that I assume most honourable senators would welcome, any ambiguity that may exist as to whether a committee, on its own initiative, can permit its hearings to be televised, or whether that should be a decision of the Senate at the request of the committee.

Personally, I am quite in favour of the amendment, but I rise at this time to draw attention to another factor that is inherent in this subject, and certainly in the amendment, that I regard as more serious, or more important, than the technical, jurisdictional matter that has been debated.

If any committee of this house decided that from the standpoint of public information it was desirable that its hearings on any subject be broadcast or televised, I think there would be very little objection from this house if such a request were made. What bothers me in this matter of precedent is that, as has been explained to the house, the televising of this particular hearing is not something initiated by the committee. It came about, we have been told, as a result of a request from a member of the press gallery—in other words, a decision on the part of the electronic media that in their judgment it is desirable that this particular hearing should be televised. It is to that that I personally take the strongest objection.

It seems to me that any decision to broadcast or televise the proceedings of this house or any of its committees should originate with the house or the committee itself. It should not be left to the media to decide that in one case they are interested in televising that particular hearing, and in another case they are not interested in televising it. I suggest that if we are going to consider televising committee hearings on the basis of requests from the media, then we are accepting a precedent that is far more serious and far more important than the one we are discussing.

I call the attention of the house to the fact that a number of Senate committees are considering legislation that is far more important to the Canadian people than these rather minor amendments to the Criminal Code and other statutes.

Reference was made by my honourable colleague, Senator Rowe, a moment ago to the Foreign Affairs Committee, which is discussing, or will be discussing, serious matters concerning the continuing relationships between our country and the United States. There is no request to televise those hearings. That is not a colourful thing that lends itself to emotionalism and sensationalism, and the media are not interested.

The Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee has had under consideration legislation of great importance to the Canadian people. Certainly, amendments to the Income Tax Act, for example, legislation dealing with the control of corporations, and matters of this kind, affect almost every citizen of this country, but there are no requests from the CBC to televise those hearings. Why is it that this one particular bill becomes the subject of such a request?

I think every honourable senator present knows that the concern of the media is to televise or broadcast that which lends itself to emotionalism and sensationalism. It helps their ratings, or increases the number of papers they sell, and so forth. That is the thing to which I take exception. I do not believe that this house should start on a course in which we are only going to consider television or broadcasting as a result of a request from the media.

While I am quite in favour of the amendment, and while I am in favour of any committee having its hearings televised, if it decides and this house decides that that is important to the public of Canada, I am of the view that it should be a matter of the committee's or the Senate's, requesting the media to televise those particular hearings. It should not be the reverse process, where we merely become those who acquiesce in the televising of something which they select because it lends itself to their particular brand of emotionalism or sensationalism.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, we have listened with great attention to the remarks of Senator Manning. He has made some interesting points.

For clarification, however, let me tell you the sequence of events, because I do not want to be unfair to those whose responsibility it is to report the proceedings in this chamber and in the other place.

I had a luncheon meeting with a prominent writer in the press gallery—one not associated with the electronic media—and he expressed the view on that occasion that some of the best work in Canada is being done by the Senate. He said, "It may be one of the most misunderstood bodies, at any level of government in this nation," and went on to say, "I am one of those reporters who happen to read some of the reports of Senate committees." In effect, he said, "I am aware of the work going on in the Senate and, frankly, some of my associates have been less than fair in their treatment of the Senate and the senators. The trouble is that the Canadian people do not know enough about you, or about the important work you are doing."

He also said, "Take, for example, the current study of the subject of cannabis. That is a major bill before the Senate. You have done outstanding work in many areas. Look at the report on the mass media by the committee chaired by Senator Davey." He talked about the reports produced by Senator Croll's committees on poverty and aging, and suggested that it was incredible that so often the media are critical of the Senate and of senators. Some say how out of touch with everything the Senate is but, in fact, this body just happens to produce some of the best reports in this country today. "As someone who has served at the provincial level, and in the other place," I said, "I am consistently and continually impressed by the high standard of ability which exists in the Senate chamber."

He asked, "Mr. Leader, why do you not do something about it? Why doesn't the Senate communicate more effectively?" I answered, "Well, what do you suggest? It is your job to help explain the Senate better to the people of Canada."

In reply to this he said, "Let me be very frank with you. There are people who have been agonizing on Parliament Hill for years about whether or not the electronic media should be allowed in. They went through the same process years ago with respect to whether or not reporters could be trusted to report accurately, fairly and dispassionately the events in the house. But what do you do? Parliamentarians in both houses allow us to go to the galleries every day, and there we make arbitrary decisions with respect to those matters we believe to be matters of great public concern. Arbitrarily we choose not to write about other events. Take the discussions about the electronic media going on today. Why don't you invite the television cameras in, even on an experimental basis, and let the Canadian people see the endeavour that goes into the work of your assembly? I refer, for example, to the current work regarding the cannabis bill."

It was after this meeting that I contacted Senator Goldenberg, and said, "Here is a suggestion from the parliamentary press gallery. What do you think of it?" It was not—and I want to be fair with the media here—a suggestion by anyone connected with the CBC, or any other television network. It was not a remark made along the lines of, "Look, it seems as though you are going to have some very interesting and controversial testimony on drugs. Let's televise it!"

It may be that the Foreign Affairs Committee, for example, will decide in the future that there is a matter involving Canada's relations with the United States, or the European Economic Community, which should be brought to the attention of the Canadian people, and will seek the support of this house for a proposal to televise certain of its hearings. This could apply equally to other questions involving other committees.

I happen to think—and I know that most honourable senators believe this too—that the Canadian people do not properly understand the work done in this chamber, and so, perhaps, on this proposed experimental basis there should be an opportunity to show the citizens of this country some of the excellent and effective work being done here.

That is the chronology of events.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I was not in the chamber when this matter was first raised, but while listening to the debate today I wrote down one or two points—and I have them listed—before I heard the leader.

● (1500)

As far as I am concerned, I congratulate the Leader of the Government in the Senate on taking the initiative in the way he did, to bring before this committee the television cameras. We complain all the time that the Senate is misunderstood and we complain that we are ignored, but so often when the press wishes to focus on us we become timid, frightened and worried about the press we are getting. Then a good deal of the time we also complain that we are not getting any press.

Some of the discussions in this high-powered, high-level chamber do not impress me at all. I remember a discussion, one in which I took no part, as to whether we were invited to a reception arranged by the National Press Gallery. Apparently we found it difficult to decide whether we should go or not go because we did not know whether we were included in the invitation. We spent a great deal of time in trying to decide that.

I do not think the present question falls into that category at all. I think this is an important question. The House of Commons has been going from one side to the other on this very question and, apparently, they have not been able to make up their minds. I have no idea what they are going to do but, personally, I am very proud that the Senate is taking the initiative in being the first to have the television cameras in to publicize the proceedings of a Senate committee.

What are honourable senators afraid of in having television cameras at Senate committee meetings? Are they afraid? If they are, then I don't know what they are afraid of. I am not a member of the committee in question but I certainly would not be afraid, if I were a member, to have them come in.

When I sit in the gallery of the other place, or when I attend some of their committee meetings, and listen to the kind of shenanigans going on there and the mediocrity of their debates—

Senator Walker: You should know.

Senator Argue: I agree I took part in some of them, but they have got worse since Senator Walker and I left. I agree it was bad enough then.

Honourable senators, we have nothing to fear and we should be pleased that the media has shown some interest—and I take it they have shown a great deal of interest—in this committee.

Senator Manning, as is always the case, sounded very impressive to me, but I really could not see the logic of the point he was making. As I understand it, he was objecting to the method by which this was being brought about, namely, that the media had made a request. Well, I am glad that it has come about that way because it shows that the media is interested in something that is important.

As chairman of another committee I have quite a time in trying to get the media to think that some of the things the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture is doing are important. Personally, I think its work is very important. When we bring a recommendation here on an important matter the chances very often are that the press will not give it any attention at all, although it may later get government action. On the other hand, if somebody somewhere else raises the question, suddenly it becomes very important to the media. Certainly, in the past whenever such a thing was done in the Senate, it was not considered important by the media.

Honourable senators, we should quit being so timid and so afraid. In this case the committee said, "We will let the television cameras in, and we will present a report to the Senate." I think that was exceedingly responsible. I also think that the committee is master of its own destiny. Despite all the quotations from the books that have been put on the record today, I feel they have no bearing on the point unless the Senate itself decides it wants to lay down rules that the committees must follow.

I was not a member of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty, chaired by Senator Croll, but I should be very much surprised if the television people did not get in on some of the meetings held by that committee in various places across this country. I am sure they did, and I think it was a good thing that they did. It showed good judgment on the part of the committee to allow them in, and so allow the public to see some of the proceedings of that committee.

It is my view that the sooner this discussion is wound up and we decide that we are pleased to have the media come in and televise our proceedings, the better. The only thing I would say to the media is, "For God's sake, don't overlook the other important committees of the Senate and the work that is going on. Come around and see the rest of us work once in a while."

Senator Norrie: Honourable senators, I am getting a little bit worked up. I am not at all in agreement with the last speaker, although usually I am. I feel that if we bring in the media we are then intruding on the privacy of the witnesses, and we are intimidating them to a great extent. The witnesses, in many instances, may not be as free with their comments as they might otherwise be. I think Senator McElman brought this point out very well, and I think it is an important one.

Perhaps I am pessimistic but, in my view, the mood of the media is not always to be trusted, and I am very diffident about the parts of our debates that they are going to pick up and publicize. If they were to pick up the things that we treasure and love, and try to promote those, then that would be fine, but they can also pick up things that are not to our credit, and that is what I worry about. They may not be important things, but when shown on television screens they can look pretty bad.

Those are the only comments I wish to make.

Senator Goldenberg: Is Senator Norrie suggesting that we should also exclude the press? The press already attends the meetings of the committee, and it is free to report whatever it wants to report.

[Senator Argue.]

Senator Norrie: There is quite a difference between the two, in my experience.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I should like to join the multitude of speakers in this deluge of advice. My own contribution is based on the fact that I personally have been involved in such a situation at a time when I was the mayor of a medium-sized city where meetings of the council were televised. In that small city council we heard many of the arguments that have been voiced here. However, eventually wisdom prevailed and we allowed the television cameras to come in. They were set up, and they did not interfere at all with our proceedings. All the warnings and grim forebodings that we heard today—selectivity, intimidation of speakers or witnesses, and all that sort of thing—turned out to be groundless. The fact is that after a very short period of time it seemed to be a quite natural thing.

There was, of course, the odd person who liked to show off a little in front of the camera, but we get the same thing when it is known that the press is present. We have all seen it happen where the press has been present, and a certain type of person in political life has moved into the show, but that situation soon sorts itself out. In my view, warnings such as we have heard today really do not find justification in subsequent events.

I consider that an elected city council is an important level of government, and by having its proceedings televised a large number of citizens were given the opportunity to see and to hear what went on. Furthermore, they were given the opportunity to evaluate the performance of some of the people they had elected, and to judge the issues involved. In my experience this led to greater interest in civic affairs.

Honourable senators, I pass that on for your consideration. It is a relatively small experience, but a good one. In my opinion, television would give the country the opportunity to see the Senate in action. Whether that will be good or bad from our point of view is another matter.

However, that is not my main reason for supporting the proposal of the committee. I do not care how it comes about. If we do not adopt the original motion then let us adopt Senator McElman's amendment, because the public of Canada, on a major issue like this, is entitled to have as much information as possible. The subject is difficult and confusing and, at the same time, terribly important. For this reason I say that the easiest way to achieve what is proposed, and to avoid a procedural wrangle, is to support the amendment. Let us try it out. I am sure that after the experience we will agree that it is a major step forward in the political life of this country.

Senator Denis: What was included in that program? Was it in toto, in extenso, or only in part?

Senator Buckwold: It contained the items that were of interest to those who would be viewing it. In other words, it was not a continuous broadcast of the entire two-hour session. There was editorializing, I suppose, from the point of view of the reporter and the television producer. We face that in any type of news report. Obviously, they will take items of the greatest interest and speakers who make the best impression—or the worst impression.

Senator Denis: Who chooses the parts of the proceedings to be shown?

Senator Buckwold: The medium makes that choice.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, it seems to me that the questions we have been debating are three in number. I do not know whether they are all related to the amendment before the house and I will not attempt to define what is or is not relevant to the debate.

The first question put was whether a committee of this house has the right to permit the televising of its proceedings. This question is by no means resolved. I sense, however, that some senators have very definite views on the subject. Senator McElman is of the view that a committee has not that power. I respect that opinion but do not intend to take sides. In my opinion the Senate should recognize, first, that this problem is far from resolved. It is a legal question and I do not believe that any decision we make by voting either for or against this amendment or the main motion will solve that legal question.

The second question is, of course, whether it is desirable to have a committee televise or broadcast its meetings. This is a question of fact which can be ascertained by experience and debate. Again, however, no decision we might make on the motion or the amendment before the house would definitely resolve the question. If we decide finally that it would be desirable to televise committee meetings—and Senator Argue obviously has no doubt that it would be, but I am not prepared to follow him in this respect—

Senator Langlois: He is an optimist.

Senator Flynn: If we arrive at that conclusion, how should the committee proceed to have its sittings televised or broadcast? These are questions which go much beyond the amendment before the house.

I will say, first, in order to clarify my position, that I was in committee when this matter was discussed and I wish to absolve the chairman of the committee from any responsibility in this respect. It is quite clear that we received advice that our rules do not prohibit a committee from deciding on such matters. However, since there was room for doubt, it was suggested that the committee inform the Senate, in order to enable this body to refuse permission if it did not wish the committee to proceed with the televising or broadcasting of its meetings. That was the only point, and I personally did not take sides. I did not know whether the opinion was right or wrong and I still do not know. Further, I do not believe I will form an opinion unless and until this matter receives much further study.

I want to make it clear that I agreed that this was the manner in which to proceed, so that in the event the Senate was not in agreement it could so indicate. That is why I took the position that the manner in which we in the Senate could proceed, with respect to the information given to the Senate by Senator Goldenberg, was to say we did not wish the committee to proceed. Had we said no, that would have been the end of it and we could have considered the problem in another context than the precise situation created by the information given to the Senate by the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

It seems to me that we are now endeavouring to tackle the problem as a whole, whereas the idea is only to decide in this particular instance, which is the object of Senator McElman's amendment. My only criticism is that Senator McElman backed his amendment by saying that he was against giving the impression that the committee could proceed in such a manner. I do not want this interpretation to be given to this motion or his amendment.

In conclusion, I would say that I would like to see this problem as a whole studied by the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, not merely this particular instance. But, in my opinion, the Senate as a body must not decide now on the entire merit of the question but rather must deal only with the particular instance with which we are presently faced. That is why I do not like the wording of Senator McElman's amendment. I would not have wanted the amendment to indicate that we are empowering the committee, because we have not decided yet whether the committee had or had not the power to proceed as it did. My view at this time is that there is nothing in the rules to prevent a committee from having its sittings broadcast.

As a matter of fact, as I remarked earlier, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, when it was considering fiscal reform, had part of one meeting televised without asking permission of the Senate. That committee was not criticized by the Senate for doing so. However, we should not make a final decision in this without having given it full study.

Senator McElman cited that part of our rules which relates to usages and customs applicable in 1867. Of course, there was no television then, no automobiles, no printing as we know it today, or many other things, so it is out of context.

Senator McElman: But there was privilege.

Senator Flynn: There was privilege, of course, but it did not mean the same in those days as it does today.

I have no objection to adopting Senator McElman's amendment, except that I do not wish this motion in amendment to mean that we are deciding today that the committee did not have the power. If we come to the conclusion that it has not the power and we do not wish to grant that power to the committee in the future, that will be something for us to decide, but to decide in the proper context, not in the context of one instance.

For these reasons, honourable senators, I would suggest that we adopt the motion in amendment as soon as possible, with the understanding that a reference of the whole question will be made to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders. The reference should be, first, to determine whether the committee under our rules has the right to broadcast its sittings. The reference should call, secondly, for a study of whether it is or would be desirable for a committee to televise or broadcast its sittings. And, finally, if we come to the conclusion that it is desirable, the manner in which this right or procedure should be followed by committees in the future should be considered. With this understanding the Senate could adopt the motion without creating a precedent, reserving final decision for an occasion which may be more favourable and, certainly, clearer than the present.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, in supporting the general position taken by the Leader of the Opposition I would, first of all, make the comment that everyone seems to want to conclude this debate after they have had their 15 minutes. I hope that some of the observations I may make will help clarify the situation.

I agree with the Leader of the Opposition that we should not regard this as a precedent. We do not have to worry too much about that because, of course, the Senate can reverse its decision on such a matter at any time. Technically, and probably, it is a precedent, because we have a motion of privilege. The matter was raised on a question of the privilege of the Senate, and the motion and amendment seem to me to be asserting that privilege. I do not think this is a terribly important matter. Had it been raised on another motion, the situation might have been different.

My own position is the same as that of Senator Flynn. I have no definite opinion at the moment on either of the two questions which are before us, one of which is whether the activities of a Senate committee should or should not be televised.

My personal preference is to open up all our proceedings to all media. I have never been able to understand why a specific difference should be drawn between the various types of medium, particularly when they are together in the Press Gallery, all with the same basic privileges, the same rights of membership in the gallery, and the same rights to collect news and disseminate it as they see fit, subject to the normal rules relating to non-disturbance of proceedings, and so on. My own inclination is to come down very much in favour of that, because I think it is inevitable.

As to the question whether the committee has the right to permit this, my own inclination is to say, "Yes, it has." I am not arguing this didactically. I say that because there is no specific permission given to committees to admit the press. This is not specific. They can admit the press. It is not a very long jump to say they can also admit the radio and television people because, as a matter of fact, today, in normal conversation, when one says "the press," one means the printed press, the magazine press, and radio and television. It is quite correct to say that when we mention "the press," we include, in common language, all of those.

I shall support the amendment, although I am not entirely satisfied with it. There has been criticism of our spending too much time here on procedure. I am all in favour of our trying to keep our activities in line with procedure, and I suggest to the chairman that had he done so in this case we would not have had all this long wrangling. When he made a statement purporting to be a report of the committee, there was in fact no report before the Senate.

I shall not quote our rules too definitively, but we do have a rule which details the matters on which a senator may rise to speak, and it does not include a verbal report from a committee. That is rule 27. It is a quite specific rule. It would apply also to other irrelevancies which occur here from time to time.

[Senator Flynn.]

Secondly, our rules are quite specific in saying how a report of a committee shall be brought in. I refer to rule 78. Had Senator Goldenberg availed himself of it, there would have been no wrangling whatsoever, because that rule requires that a report be written. This rule refers specifically to a committee report and one which is for information only. I will not read what the rule says, but that is the purport of it.

This was a report of a committee for information only. The committee merely said: "We have taken the decision." Had Senator Goldenberg introduced it that way, under rule 78, he could have taken comfort from the fact that included in the rule is the statement that there shall be no debate, and he would have been home free, unless some honourable senator had read further into the rules and found that he had the right to refer the matter for consideration at a future date. I doubt whether that would have happened, and I am sure Senator Goldenberg would have been much happier had he followed this procedure.

I suggest, as my defence of the comments I make from time to time on the rules, that if we keep to our rules we shall get through our proceedings much more simply. I am not myself a lawyer, but I am amazed that the many distinguished and eminent lawyers here, who have spent much of their lives reading and re-reading law, will not take the time to read the few simple rules of the Senate.

Senator Croll: Who is paying for it?

An Hon. Senator: They are too simple.

Senator Grosart: With those reservations, it seems to me that the motion, as amended, takes care of the situation generally. It speaks to both questions, and it does assert the right of the Senate—because it is a question of privilege—to empower the committee, and in this particular case it approves the principle of televising the proceedings of the committee.

This should satisfy all of us as being a way out of the impasse. We are in a complete impasse procedurally, because the matter would not be before us had it not been for Senator Molson's motion, and it could only have been raised on a question of privilege. Personally, I commend the committee and the chairman on the decision to refer this matter to the Senate. In my opinion, it was a wise decision.

I am not sure whether the Senate has the right to approve or disapprove the televising of committee proceedings, but I do not think it is terribly important because, as I said earlier, it is inevitable that all proceedings of all committees of legislatures everywhere in the world will before long be opened up to television and other broadcasting media.

I sympathize with some of the objections taken, but I would say also that if the worst happens, it probably will be no worse than what happens so often in the antechamber of the House of Commons when the television media intrude—if it is an intrusion—in a way that might not always contribute to the best interests of parliament. However, as the Leader of the Government and others have said, that is a risk we take, and we take the same risk with the press.

I found it difficult to follow Senator Manning's point, because clearly we are not going to decide what is of interest to any media. They will decide that themselves. This has been going on from time immemorial. They are always deciding. It was nothing new that the press decided that the Watergate affair was of general interest, or that the cost of ministers' speeches—about which I read something yesterday—

Senator Perrault: We would not have chosen that one.

Senator Grosart: No. The press decided that the very large sums being paid for ministers' speeches was a matter of interest to the public. I am sure it is. It was certainly interesting to me, because I have written a lot of speeches in my life but never received one cent for them.

Senator Flynn: Be careful.

Senator Grosart: The sensational one referred to cost a little under $2,000.

Senator McDonald: I hope it made sense.

Senator Grosart: I am surprised at that comment from Senator McDonald, because I understand the speech was from the side he generally supports.

I support the stand taken by the Leader of the Opposition, and I am of the opinion that we can resolve this matter, with the reservations I have made.

Senator McDonald: Honourable senators, I had no intention originally of speaking in this debate, and after I resume my seat you may say that I should have kept to my original intention.

The arguments which have been put forward appear to me to be somewhat ridiculous. Senator Grosart said he believes in television being brought into the Senate because it is inevitable. But so is death. I wonder what he will do on the way home. I do not know. Senator Argue said he believes in broadcasting, and the proceedings should be televised.

● (1530)

We know that all the proceedings will not be televised. If television is allowed into meetings of committees of the Senate, or into this chamber, I am sure Senator Argue knows as well as I that the crew and the producer will editorialize. I am quite certain of the job they will do. We have already had some examples of the efforts of the media, including the electronic media, with respect to members of this chamber. If those are indications of what they propose to do in this committee, or any other committee, or in this chamber, then God forbid, and I do not want any part of it. I would have no objection whatever to the media's coming into this chamber, or into a committee of the Senate, to televise the proceedings, but that is not what they will do. They will televise only the spectacular and the ridiculous.

Senator Grosart: Why not?

Senator McDonald: It is the spectacular and the ridiculous that gets publicity. However, that is not the point I wanted to make.

Senator Flynn: You are not the only one who has made other points.

Senator McDonald: There are two points I want to make, one of them being as to whether a committee has the right to decide that television cameras will or will not enter the committee room. In this connection, rule 73 has been referred to several times, and it reads as follows:

Members of the public may attend any meeting of a committee of the Senate, unless the committee otherwise orders.

That is true. Members of the public may attend in the galleries in this chamber at any time, unless this chamber decides otherwise. However, although members of the public are allowed in the galleries, they are not allowed to take notes, they are not allowed to talk, and they are not allowed to take pictures. There is a place in front of the bar, in both this chamber and the other house, and in the provincial legislatures, where the media—press, radio and television—are allowed to write. But rule 73 has nothing to do with the operation of the media in the chamber or in a committee of this house.

Senator Flynn: Agreed.

Senator McDonald: In my view, a committee of the Senate is a creature of the Senate, and the general rules which apply to attendance at committee meetings are the general rules which apply in this chamber. After 27 years of continuous service, in this house and the Saskatchewan Legislature, I am more convinced than ever that no committee on its own has the right to decide to broadcast its proceedings, or have television cameras in the committee room. If that right does exist, it should be taken away. In my view, that is a decision which this chamber, and only this chamber, can make.

Senator Flynn: And it will not make it today.

Senator McDonald: No, and I do not think it should be made today. Whether we adopt the original motion, or the motion in amendment as proposed by Senator McElman—which is the one I prefer—I hope we will not make a final decision at this point in time. I agree with the Leader of the Opposition that this decision ought to be made, and probably will be made, at another time, or at least that a recommendation should be made to the chamber by the Rules Committee. I hope that procedure will automatically follow.

I hope also that some day in the future, the privilege of informing the public in this manner will be extended to both radio and television. There is great benefit in this to the public, but there is also great danger, because the power of the media today, in my view, is even stronger than that of the Prime Minister. What individual in public life in Canada has daily contact with people from coast to coast by way of a syndicated column? No one. But the media has. The media has tremendous powers and, I suggest that because of those powers it has tremendous responsibilities.

In my view, at least, one of the most irresponsible segments of society today is the press—written, spoken and visual. The press today is engaged in anything that is spectacular. If a bus runs off a cliff in Tanganyika today, the television news tonight will show the dead bodies at the bottom of the cliff. After viewing the late night news can you ever go to bed without risking a nightmare? Surely there are some happy happenings in this world that are newsworthy. Do we ever learn of them?

Senator Grosart: Yes.

Senator McDonald: You must subscribe to some periodicals to which I do not have access. Do we ever see them on the news? Once in a while, but very rarely. I hope that when the privileges of the media, including radio and television, are extended to this chamber—and, I hope, the other place—more responsibility will be shown on their part to take the truth to the people of Canada, and not their version of the truth.

Senator Cameron: Honourable senators, this is a discussion which is timely, and one that will continue—not this particular debate, but debate on this whole subject area. For that reason, it is important that we give some thought and time to laying down rules under which the proceedings of the Senate itself and of Senate committees will be covered by the broadcast media. We might very well give some consideration to asking the Rules Committee, as a special assignment, to discuss this matter and report back with a set of rules and guidelines for using the media effectively, or we might set up a special subcommittee to deal with the utilization of the media in broadcasting the proceedings of the Senate.

An Hon. Senator: Question.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I was hoping that the amendment itself might be put. As far as I am concerned, I am opposed to the motion in amendment but in favour of the original motion. If the vote can be recorded on division, I am quite happy.

Senator Flynn: On division. No "Argue-ment."
Motion in amendment agreed to, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion, as amended?

Motion as amended, agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

Senator Fergusson: Honourable senators, I should like to draw your attention to a group of senior citizens in our gallery. They are from March Township and Kanata. They contacted me because they were most interested in seeing the Senate chamber at a time when the senators were in it. As the result of that contact they are here this afternoon to view our proceedings.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Copies of a Report entitled "Towards a Mineral Policy for Canada—Opportunities for Choice", dated 1974.

Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1976.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Goldenberg, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-370, to amend the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Goldenberg moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES

NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE AND REPORT

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures proposed by the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1976, in advance of bills based upon the said Estimates reaching the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: You have heard the motion, honourable senators. Is there unanimous consent?

Senator Flynn: There is unanimous consent, but before the question is decided upon I should like to ask the Deputy Leader of the Government if this means that the bills which will confirm the estimates will be dealt with in the same way as any other ordinary bill, and may be referred to committee.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I can hardly give such an undertaking, because legislation is in the hands of the Senate, not in the hands of any individual member. I am afraid that the Senate is bound by its own rules, and that as usual this bill will be treated as a money bill and not as an ordinary bill.

Senator Flynn: As a money bill? I was wondering whether the deputy leader had changed his perspective on such bills.

Senator Langlois: I am afraid I cannot change the rules and practice of this house.

Senator Flynn: You cannot change the rules, but you can change your own ways and means.

Motion agreed to.

EMPLOYER-EMPLOYEE RELATIONS IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN SENATE MEMBERSHIP

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Cook and Stanbury be substituted for those of the Honourable Senators Neiman and Riel on the list of senators serving on the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that house accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, February 25, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before the question is put, I should like as usual to give a brief outline of the work for the next week. The committee schedule will be heavy. On Tuesday, the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will meet at 9.30 a.m., and the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will meet at 11.00 a.m. The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will continue its study of Bill S-19, to amend the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Criminal Code at 11.00 a.m. and also at 2.00 p.m. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will meet at 2.00 p.m. to continue its consideration of Bill C-40, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act, and will then go on to deal with Bill C-29, respecting Canadian Business Corporations. In addition, the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture will hold an in camera meeting at 2 p.m. to complete its report on Bill S-10, to amend the Feeds Act.

On Wednesday at 9.30 a.m. the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will resume its consideration of Bill C-29, and the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will meet to hear the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development on Bill S-20, to amend the Territorial Lands Act.

On Thursday, the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will meet at 9.30 a.m., and the Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will meet at 3.30 p.m. The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance will meet at 9.30 a.m. to continue with its examination of the estimates of the Manpower Division of the Department of Manpower and Immigration, and at the same hour, 9.30 a.m., the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will again consider Bill C-29, and, time permitting, will then go on to consider Bill C-2, the Combines Investigation Act. That means there will be two committees meeting on Thursday morning.

In the Senate we will continue to deal with the items on the Order Paper, and it is expected that the income tax bill will pass the Commons and reach us some time next week.

Motion agreed to.

TELEVISION

COMMERCIAL ADVERTISING MESSAGE—USE OF PICTURE OF PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS—QUESTION

Senator Davey: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. On Friday, February 14, at approximately 7.10 p.m., television station CBLT Toronto carried a commercial advertising message for Guaranty Trust. The commercial began with a full screen picture of the Parliament Buildings, which scene then dissolved into an office, purportedly inside these buildings and apparently an office of the Department of National Revenue. The tax collector, complete with green eye shade, sat at his roll-top desk and complained about tax revenue being less this year because so many Canadians are availing themselves of a Guaranty Trust Retirement Savings Plan. The commercial closed with the sound of the clock of the Peace Tower striking in the background and, as I recall, another picture of the Parliament Buildings. I have a series of questions:

1. Did Guaranty Trust receive permission from the Government of Canada to use this picture of the Parliament Buildings in its advertising?
2. Is such permission needed?
3. If so, is such permission ever granted?
4. Is permission needed from the Department of National Revenue for this kind of commercial approach and, if so, was such permission granted and why?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, these questions are most appropriate and relevant, touching as they do possibly upon the privileges of Parliament. I have received representations from other sources with respect to this particular alleged commercial telecast. Apparently it is part of a campaign carried over a number of Canadian stations. Indeed, I understand that the same commercial message is being broadcast in the Ottawa area by one of the commercial stations here. While I do not have immediate answers to the appropriate questions posed by our honourable colleague, I shall undertake to make immediate inquiries and, hopefully, I shall have the answers early next week.

WELFARE MINISTERS CONFERENCE

STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE—QUESTION

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, I would like to address a question to the Leader of the Government. We are all aware that in the last two days the Minister of National Health and Welfare has met with his counterparts from the provinces. In my opinion the newspaper reports resulting from that conference are rather confusing. I find in checking Hansard of the other place that last Monday the minister promised to make available to members of that house the actual statement made by the federal Minister of National Health and Welfare to the conference, outlining up-to-date federal policy in the social welfare field.

Will the Leader of the Government make an effort to see that members of this house are equally fully informed as to the policy outlined by the minister, particularly in view of the outstanding work carried out by the Special Senate Committee on Poverty a few years ago in the social welfare field and, in particular, the problems of the working poor?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I shall most certainly attempt to determine whether it would be possible to have this document made available in some form to members of this assembly. It could be tabled here, or produced in some manner whereby the position of the minister can be made known to all senators.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE CHAIRMAN AND DEPUTY CHAIRMAN—QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, may I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government if he would confirm the rumour that the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders at its meeting today appointed Senator Molson as chairman and Senator Langlois as deputy chairman?

Senator Langlois: It is not a rumour; it is a fact.

Senator Flynn: About time.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, as a supplementary: were notices of that meeting distributed?

Senator Benidickson: Yes, they were. I am not a member of the committee, but I received a copy.

Senator Grosart: I am a member, but I did not receive a copy.

Senator Perrault: Check your mail service.

Senator Langlois: Do you have a strike in your office?

Senator Walker: Honourable senators, I rise merely to state that a better choice of chairman could not have been made from the whole of the Senate. Senator Molson is one of the most distinguished men in Canada. We should feel proud to have him.

CRIMINAL CODE (COMMUTATION OF DEATH SENTENCE)

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Robichaud, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Eudes, for the second reading of the Bill S-21, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code (commutation of death sentence)".—(Honourable Senator Bélisle).

Senator Bélisle: Honourable senators, Senator Hicks has informed me that he would like to speak today, and I am pleased to give way to him. I shall adjourn the debate after he has spoken.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that the Honourable Senator Hicks speak now instead of the Honourable Senator Bélisle?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Thank you, honourable senators.

It is with some reluctance, but nevertheless a very sincere sense of duty and responsibility, that I rise to speak in support of Bill S-21, which, as you know, would have the effect of requiring a recommendation for clemency before it would be possible for the Governor in Council to commute a death sentence. I should like succinctly and briefly, I hope, to state some of the reasons why I feel this bill should be supported.

I start by saying that it has long seemed to me apparent that there are in our society some persons who by the monstrosity of their own actions forfeit their right to the protection of society, and I believe that society has the right to remove them. In early times, of course, the commission of murder brought forth acts of vengeance on the part of the relatives or dear ones of the person who was slain, and we have seen, in the evolution of human society, how public law has replaced private vengeance. That is as it should be. But I am not sure that it will continue to be so if the public law is not enforced strictly and if it does not, under some circumstances and in some instances, require the ultimate penalty of death to be exacted.

This is even more true today in the enormous complexity of modern society. With the rapidly increasing population, and particularly the agglomeration of people in large urban areas, the law must be firm and it must be respected.

I am more concerned with preserving the quality of life for the vast majority of citizens who are law abiding and who want to pursue their own interest, happiness and the good life without being involved in criminal activities. Unfortunately, crime has existed in every society which man has known, and it seems to have become increasingly more violent in the decades since World War II. I am more concerned, as I say, about the quality of human life than with the mere quantity of human life. I am also more concerned about the victims of criminal acts than with the criminals themselves.

It is a strange thing indeed, when we are almost through the third quarter of the twentieth century that society pays little attention to persons who suffer as a result of the criminal acts of other people. There is no compensation for a murdered man's wife and children, who may be left without opportunities for education or security, or the services to which they should be entitled from society, and which had been provided for them by the head of the family whose life was taken by some person's irresponsible and criminal act.

Some societies today are beginning to look at means of compensating the victims of criminal acts. We should increase our endeavours to find ways of compensating victims of crimes, but at the same time I do not think we can afford to neglect punishment, even the ultimate punishment of death, for the habitual murderer and the person who, as I say, by the monstrosity of his actions, forfeits his right to the protection of society.

I know that those who oppose the death penalty under any circumstances arrogate to themselves a very special virtue, and suggest that anyone who questions the virtuousness of their ideas is himself somehow or other lacking in feeling or sentiment, or is passionately concerned to see that the death penalty is exacted against someone else. I suggest that these people are themselves as highly emotional about their views as they accuse those who recognize the necessity of the death penalty under some circumstances of being.

Senator Flynn: Agreed.

Senator Hicks: I am certainly not passionate about this. I am saddened by the necessity of expressing the views I have expressed here, and by the fact that there are members of our society who require us to take such an extreme measure. Nevertheless, I submit that my views are responsible having regard to the necessity for an orderly society in the complexity of the late twentieth century.

Furthermore, I suggest that those people who are categorically opposed to the death penalty under any circumstances, even for those who have repeatedly, deliberately and viciously murdered—whether the victims be police officers, prison guards, or others—are persons who have had very little contact with the criminal element, particularly the habitual criminal. It may very well be that if they had a little more contact with such persons, they would find it necessary to alter their views.

It will be gathered from what I have said that I am one who believes—reluctantly but, nevertheless, responsibly—that there are circumstances when the exacting of the death penalty is not only justified in the name of society but is necessary in order to preserve the stable society which supports the quality of life to which all of us aspire.

I am not dealing with the question as to how the death penalty should be exacted, although I think in this day and age there ought to be a better method than the old-fashioned method of hanging. I think the law might very well be revised in that respect, and that some more humane method might be adopted in Canada for the taking of the life of the habitual criminal to whom I have been referring.

But there is another reason why I would support this bill even if I did not hold the general views I have just expressed. I believe it to be essential for an orderly society that there be respect for the law. I think the law must be respected by persons in all walks of life, whether private citizens, people of influence, and even by members of Her Majesty's Privy Council. I suggest that the way the Privy Council of Canada has been automatically commuting all death sentences in recent years is contrary to the spirit and intent of the law that is on our statute books today. If we believe that all death sentences should be commuted, then Parliament should face up to the subject squarely and amend the law so that the imposition of the death sentence is no longer possible in Canada. In the alternative, we should not allow members of Her Majesty's Privy Council to flout the law by automatically commuting all death sentences imposed by the courts.

Senator Sparrow: Would the honourable senator permit a question? Are you suggesting that such action is against the law? You are not really suggesting that, are you?

Senator Hicks: It is not against the law, but it is against the spirit and intent of the law. I am suggesting that if the Privy Council is automatically going to commute all death sentences, then we had better alter the law to eliminate the death penalty.

I have already made it clear that I would not favour the abolition of the death penalty, but if that is the way we are going to act then I think that is the way in which we should do it, instead of going through the process of having judges and juries try persons, sentence them to death without any recommendation for clemency, knowing full well that in every instance—and this has been the case for several years now in Canada—the death sentence will be commuted by the Privy Council to life imprisonment, which normally amounts to a much shorter term of incarceration than the natural life of the person concerned.

For those reasons, honourable senators, I regretfully believe that it is my duty to support Bill S-21, and I propose to do so.

Senator Godfrey: Would the honourable senator permit a question? What would happen under this measure if circumstances came to light after the trial—evidence which was not available at the trial, and not disclosed at the trial—which would have resulted in a recommendation for clemency by the jury? Would you go ahead and hang the convicted person anyway?

Senator Hicks: In that highly unlikely hypothetical case, it may very well be that there ought to be some other provision to enable the commutation of the death sentence. I think, however, that this is the same as the case of the innocent man who is actually found guilty and sentenced to death. That has only rarely happened in our history, as my honourable friend knows.

Senator Thompson: Honourable senators, the honourable senator has suggested in his remarks that those who are opposed to capital punishment really have very little knowledge of the criminal element. I think that is what he said. Surely he would not suggest that Arthur Maloney, one of our noted criminal lawyers, has less knowledge of the criminal element than honourable senators, and yet I understand that Arthur Maloney is one of the founders of the Canadian Society for the Abolition of the Death Penalty.

Senator Hicks: There must be exceptions to the general statement that I made. I do not know the person to whom my honourable colleague has referred. My comment was certainly very general, and I recognize that there must be specific exceptions to it.

Senator Walker: Honourable senators, that is a very good question. Knowing Arthur Maloney, one of the greatest of our criminal lawyers and a former colleague in the House of Commons, I know it is perfectly understandable why he should feel and think that way. Defending the alleged murderers, naturally he would feel the way he does, and so does any other criminal lawyer who is defending alleged murderers. As Crown prosecutor over forty years ago, I saw the other side of it. These people would murder in cold blood, and when you saw the victim's widow and children you got a different impression. That was the impression I got, the agony of a murder for those who are left behind. It is something that has always stayed with me, not to speak of course of losing the life of a good citizen as well.

How anybody can say with finality that the death penalty is not a deterrent is beyond me. How do they find out? Is it by asking the people who have been found guilty of murder whether it would have made any difference to them, whether they would have committed the murder no matter the result? You might suggest to me that it does not make any great difference. You put yourself in that position: if you contemplated committing a murder—something that is unthinkable—would it not make an immense difference in your thinking as to whether or not you would go ahead with it?

This bill has a very limited application, limited to police officers. Every time a person is sentenced to death and the death sentence is commuted by the Cabinet, it has a tremendously demoralizing effect on the police officers, not only on the contemporaries of the police officer who has been murdered but on police officers across Canada. How can one expect a police officer to put his whole heart and soul into apprehending murderers and bringing them to justice, with all the months of work that involves, with all the risks they take in bringing it about, and finally having the person convicted, and then having our government commuting the death sentence? To me, it is ridiculous. If there is not a recommendation for mercy, for clemency, why shouldn't the law of Canada be carried out?

Senator Benidickson: Hear, hear!

Senator Walker: Why shouldn't it be carried out? Let us get away from sentimentality for a moment and consider the effect of this. I am not going to review it. I know there are those who will say it does not make any difference at all, but I say this is one instance, and it is the one remaining instance, of a death sentence that should be left on the statute books. This should be so, particularly because of the enormous increase in the number of murders today in Canada. It is ever-increasing and ever-enlarging. Why? One of the chief reasons is that these murderers know that, come hell or high water, whether they kill or do not kill, they will be out of jail eventually, they will be out of penitentiary, and they can go on again to perform whatever other criminal acts they wish to perpetrate.

Honourable senators, this is something we should take a stand on, not mixed with sentimentality. If you ever faced the problems that a Crown prosecutor or Crown attorney has to face, you would realize what this means. Do not go back on this. Do not go back on this last attempt to bring law and order to murderers. Do not demoralize the police any more than they have been demoralized already. I say to you, aside from whatever party you are in—this is something that transcends parties—this is something that should remain. I say that with the greatest sincerity of which I am capable.

Senator Asselin: May I ask Senator Hicks a question?

Senator Hicks: Certainly.

Senator Asselin: This bill tends to limit the effect of the royal prerogative. Do you think this bill is legal constitutionally? I refer particularly to section 686 of the Criminal Code, which says:

Nothing in this Act in any manner limits or affects Her Majesty's royal prerogative of mercy.

Senator Hicks: That question could more properly be addressed to the sponsor of the bill. I do not think I am competent to judge that at this time. I suspect, however, that even the royal prerogative, in the kind of society we live in in Canada, has to be exercised within the statute law of the country, and that, if we amend the Criminal Code to this effect and thus limit the royal prerogative of mercy by a specific wording of the section of the Criminal Code being amended, probably this will take precedence over the general statement to which my honourable friend has just referred.

● (1430)

Senator Connolly: Honourable senators, I believe there is a difference between the royal prerogative of mercy, the source for which I believe is the Articles of Appointment of the Governor General, and what is dealt with here, which appears to be merely a statutory power to commute the death penalty under section 684 of the Criminal Code. Presumably, that is a matter of criminal law and is within the jurisdiction of the federal Parliament. I understand that it is that section under which the Cabinet today commutes those sentences.

As a matter of fact, I do not think the royal prerogative of mercy has been resorted to as such within this century. Senator Walker would know whether or not that is true, but I believe it to be the case. What is used today is the statutory power to commute under the Criminal Code, and for all practical purposes it does not really matter very much. It would not matter even if the statute were amended as proposed, because the royal prerogative would probably still apply. It would still exist.

Senator Flynn: But would the power of commuting under the Criminal Code still be used in the same way as it is used today?

Senator Connolly: I think it would depend entirely on the practice of the government of the day.

Senator Grosart: May I point out to the honourable senator that the bill before us specifically refers to the prerogative. It says, "notwithstanding the prerogative."

Senator Asselin: Yes, it does. That is the main purpose of the bill.

Senator Connolly: Then perhaps it is seeking to modify the prerogative as well.

Senator Grosart: Yes, that is the purpose.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I happen to be one who supported the bill that was passed at the end of 1973. At that time we had a long and sometimes acrimonious debate in which the death penalty was thoroughly discussed in every aspect. I am convinced that even if we were to hang every murderer, it would not make any substantial difference in the number of murders committed in the country. Certainly, the statistics are there to prove that, if statistics are to be used. On the other hand, there is no doubt that the present mood of the country is reflected in Bill S-21, sponsored by Senator Robichaud, and, personally, I am prepared to go as far as saying that I believe the time has come when, in general, the principles of the bill should be evoked; that it is time we asked the government to take a look at this whole situation. I have a feeling that this is what Senator Robichaud is really trying to accomplish.

I should like to say to Senator Hicks that unfortunately there are many times when innocent men have been convicted. I know that from my reading and from a recent discussion I had with a very good friend, although a colleague of my friends across the way, the former Prime Minister, the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker, who holds sincere and personal views on this matter. He indicated to me that it had happened that innocent men had been sent to the gallows, or otherwise executed, when evidence later proved that in fact they had not been guilty.

Indeed, Mr. Diefenbaker mentioned one particular case that he personally had lost. It was one of the few, by the way, in which this circumstance prevailed.

Senator Bélisle: Honourable senators, may I speak on a point of order? I am always quite liberal in my views, but I should like to point out that I gave my place to Senator Hicks. Obviously, if honourable senators wish to ask questions, that is their prerogative, but if they are going to make speeches, then I shall take my turn. I would remind the house that after Senator Hicks' speech and the questions put to him, I have adjourned the debate.

Senator Buckwold: In this respect I am in your hands, honourable senators. I had no intention of interfering with the right of Senator Bélisle to hold the floor. As a matter of fact, I did not realize he intended to adjourn the debate at that moment. If I may be permitted to continue, I shall not be too long.

Senator Walker: Continue.

Senator Asselin: Go ahead.

Senator Denis: You cannot adjourn a debate ahead of time. Carry on.

Senator Buckwold: If you will allow me, I will continue. However, I have so much respect for Senator Bélisle that I hesitate to take away any of the things he might wish to say.

Senator Bélisle: We shall no doubt be enriched by what you gentlemen may want to add.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, in my opinion we should let all those wishing to participate in the debate speak as they desire to, and if Senator Bélisle then wishes to move the adjournment of the debate he will be free to do so.

Senator Bélisle: I thought, Madam Speaker, that I had done so after Senator Hicks was through. I moved the motion that the debate be adjourned. However, if my voice was not loud enough then, I am willing to do it again, and if anyone wants to ask questions, I welcome them, but not a speech.

Senator Prowse: Honourable senators, with all due respect to the right of a senator to move the adjournment of a debate, I think the practice has always been that we are free to debate. Without intending to interfere with Senator Bélisle's right to move the adjournment of the debate, I should like to give notice now that as soon as Senator Buckwold is finished, with your permission I intend to discuss the matter myself for a few moments. It is a most important question.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, if I may continue, I had indicated that there have been times in the past when evidence has come to light, on the basis of which a very strict following of this particular bill would quite possibly result in an innocent man's going to the gallows—I repeat "possibly." I suggest that a hidebound following of this measure, even to the point, in my opinion, of eliminating the prerogative of mercy, would be to do something that is not in the British tradition of law, justice and mercy. In fact, the bill as we have it today dramatically draws to our attention the situation as it is developing, and I think that is a good thing in the sense that it will point out to the people of Canada the concern of this particular body with respect to this whole business of commutation of death sentences.

I should like to suggest that a more effective approach—an approach which might evoke a more direct response from the government—would be a resolution of the Senate to the following effect: We senators think that this should be the law, and we urge the Privy Council to carry out the terms of the present law within the limits of humanity and justice. I firmly believe a resolution of that nature would receive widespread support. It would be merely an address to the Privy Council suggesting that honourable senators feel it would be proper for the Privy Council to carry out the terms of the act, keeping in mind the bounds of justice and mercy that I suppose always have to be present in the administration of the Criminal Code.

● (1440)

Therefore, I say that I cannot support this bill, because I think it is too strict. In fact, I think it would probably do more harm than good. I support the spirit, or the principle, of the bill, but I would hope that in due course a resolution, or an address, will go forward to the Privy Council, suggesting that the terms of the law be carried out to the best of the ability of that body.

Senator Flynn: May I put a question to Senator Buckwold? Does he not believe that this warning to the government would have been more convincing if the Senate had voted down the last bill, to continue the five-year experiment, and returning thereby to the old distinction between capital and non-capital murder?

Senator Buckwold: I am not really prepared to accept that, because I think the people of Canada are not, at the present time, prepared to accept the complete abolition of capital punishment. I have said that I personally am now coming to the point at which I support the kind of things that Senator Robichaud is proposing in this bill, within the context of the limitations I have brought to the attention of the house.

Senator Flynn: You read my question tomorrow.

Hon. J. Harper Prowse: Honourable senators, first of all, I would like to get certain things clear. I have the Criminal Code in front of me. Section 684 is subject to section 686, which provides:

Nothing in this Act in any manner limits or affects Her Majesty's royal prerogative of mercy.

Section 684, therefore, is not talking about Her Majesty's prerogative of mercy at all. It is talking about a responsibility which is placed by the code on the Cabinet of this country.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Prowse: Yes. Just so we do not have to argue unnecessarily, let me read this damned code to you.

Senator Flynn: Which code?

Senator Prowse: The Criminal Code. Section 671 reads:

(1) A judge who sentences a person to death shall appoint a day for the execution of the sentence, and in appointing that day shall allow a period of time that, in his opinion is sufficient to enable the Governor General to signify his pleasure before that day, and shall forthwith make a report of the case to the Solicitor General of Canada for the information of the Governor General.

(2) Where a judge who sentences a person to death or any judge who might have held or sat in the same court considers

(a) that the person should be recommended for the royal mercy, or

(b) that, for any reason, it is necessary to delay the execution of the sentence, the judge may, at any time, reprieve the person for any period that is necessary for the purpose.

Then, before the sentence can be carried out, these certificates are sent. The Governor in Council then either gives permission for the execution of the sentence, or stops it.

I do not want to bore you with figures—they are of no use here at all—but in each of the past two years there have been three cases where people have been sentenced to death and where the sentence has been commuted. In each year in two out of those three cases there was a recommendation of mercy from either the judge or the jury, or both, so that in each year there was one person, and one person alone, who would have been affected by this bill.

The reason for this debate, and the reason this subject has been raised—it is an understandable one, it is a human one, and God forgive us all for our feelings—is that some heinous things have been happening. But nothing that we do here can undo what has been done. If you think the monsters who killed those policemen in Moncton would have been stopped, or deterred for a moment, by any kind of legislation, you are living in a dream world.

I do not for a moment claim for myself the ability to see truth. I see truth as best I am able to see it, and I grant to everyone else in this chamber the same capacity. I admit that I may be wrong, and I believe that you may be wrong. There is no way by which any of us can know if we are right. However, let me tell you of something that happened not so long ago.

At the end of the Second World War we had a series of trials at Nuremberg where we brought before the court men who were charged with ordering people to be killed for certain things done during the war. Person after person came forward and said, "I was a servant of my country, and I obeyed my country's laws." The principle was laid down at Nuremberg, for whatever it may be worth, that a soldier in battle—surely under greater stress than civilians in ordinary life—who gets an order from his commanding officer to do something to somebody, but whose conscience tells him, or ought to tell him, that the thing he is being ordered to do is wrong, cannot say, when he is brought before the courts, "I was the instrument of my government." He stands there as an individual to answer for his actions.

I happen to have had the responsibility twice in my life—and God knows that was often enough—of having on my back and in my hands the lives of two men, when I pleaded for them before the court. Neither of those men was hanged, but let me assure you that unless you have had that experience you just cannot know how difficult it is. Nor can you know how much more difficult it would be if you were the Solicitor General, and you believed with all your heart and soul that it is wrong to take a life under any circumstances, and because of an act like this you were forced to sign the papers. True, you could resign your post, but let me tell you something of our history.

There was a person called Thomas Scott, and there was another person called Louis Riel. Thomas Scott was tried by a court of the de facto government set up during the 1870 disturbances in Manitoba, and sentenced to death by that court. Louis Riel did not know whether to let the sentence be carried out or not, but among the people who supported him feeling was running so high in favour of the death of this person that he let the law take its course, and Thomas Scott was shot.

In 1885 Louis Riel was found guilty of treason, and sentenced to be hanged. There were voices that cried out for clemency; there were voices that cried out for vengeance. The government in the end yielded to pressure, as Louis Riel, ironically, had yielded to the political pressure exerted on him in his own day, and permitted the law to take its course. Louis Riel was hanged, and I do not think that any objective student of our history today will view that incident with any pride at all. It was a straight case of political pressure interfering with the actions of ministers of the Crown. How different are we today?

A juror who tried Louis Riel later said, "We tried Louis Riel for treason, but we sentenced him to hang for the murder of Thomas Scott." If that is something that we as Canadians should take pride in, then I don't know what we have to do to be ashamed.

I believe that it is completely wrong to take a life, and in that belief I am in good company. Clarence Darrow, who was possibly the greatest pleader we have had on this continent, talked of "judicial murder." You can talk about cold-blooded murder all you want, but what can be more cold-blooded than the judicial murder that takes place when a man is executed; where people sit quietly around a table and say, "Let it go," and where someone signs a document and somebody else hires someone to do the deed? Would any one of you be prepared to be the hangman or the executioner? What kind of people do they get? As I say, honourable senators, there is nothing more cold-blooded than judicial murder.

I have no brief for these people who are properly called monsters. But then I come to the one thing that concerns me, which is that unless the policemen feel they are doing a job which needs to be done, unless the policemen can feel that the public values them, and unless we can let the policemen do their job with peace of mind, they are not going to be as effective as they should be. And so I find myself now in the terrible position where I have to say, "Must I risk Nuremberg, must I risk my soul, must I outrage my conscience, in order to allow the police to do their job?" I do not believe that in a democracy we really have the right to give people what we are sure is good for them, whether they want it or not. I think we have the responsibility to try to get them to agree with us, and when it comes to the taking of a human life let us be sure we know what we are doing.

After all the court procedures have been completed, the law requires the Cabinet to study the whole record. Of course, it is done for them because the ministers do not have the time to do it themselves. They are not entitled legally to substitute their judgment for that of the judge, because the judge is not given any alternative but to sentence an accused to death if the jury finds him guilty.

Senator Robichaud: That is not so.

Senator Prowse: I beg your pardon, it is so. The judge has no alternative but to impose sentence of death if a jury brings in a verdict of guilty. The jury may add a recommendation for mercy or clemency, and if they do not the judge may ask them if they wish to do so. But once a verdict of guilty is returned, either with or without a recommendation for mercy, the judge can do one thing and one thing only under the statute, and that is sentence the man to be hanged, and set the date.

The documents have to go to the Governor in Council, and the Governor in Council has to have time to go over the whole case. Under our system of law, no reviewing court has the right to substitute its judgment for that of the court it is reviewing. It can find fault in the procedure or in the reasoning of the judge, and order a new trial, but it cannot simply substitute its own judgment. At the present time, unless there is something that appears to the Cabinet not to have been properly considered by those who have dealt with the case previously, or further information is brought forward, they cannot say, "You made the wrong decision; the guy was not guilty." They cannot do that; they are simply given the right, which the judge is not given, of varying the sentence.

So when you say they are breaking the law, you are publicly confessing that you do not know, and have not taken the trouble to find out, what the law is. In fact, all they are doing is carrying out the law—perhaps in a way that you do not agree with.

If you want to change this, you can change it. But I submit to you what has happened following Nuremberg. The Americans have had all the trouble they had with the Vietnam war because it was a war that was not important enough for their government to formally declare war. On the basis of the Nuremberg decision, thousands of young Americans said, "If it is not important enough for my country to declare war, then it is not important enough for me to go out and commit murder," and so they would not join their armed forces.

The question we have to consider is this: Just how upset are the police? How far are the law-enforcement agencies actually being interfered with? The point that worries me more than anything else is that if they feel they are being interfered with, we are almost inviting them to take the law into their own hands to bring us back bodies, and not people who are charged and accused, when they go looking for criminals. Let us not confuse vengeance with justice, honourable senators, because vengeance and justice are as opposed as the poles.

It is said that this will deter killers. If you look at the evidence in any one of these cases where there has been a murder, particularly those cases where there has been a killing that results in what we call capital murder, I warrant that you will not honestly say to yourself that the murderer for one moment considered the possibility of being hanged. That person either did not care, or more probably in his arrogance—because these people take to themselves the right to take life—he took it for granted that he was not going to be caught.

We are not moving into a more civilized world; we are not moving into a world of greater justice. So the one thing we have to do—and God help us, we do have to do it—is consider carefully how we do the greatest harm. If you were in the Cabinet now, would you hang this one person, who is now sitting in a prison cell, waiting, because every vengeful voice in the country is yelling for vengeance? Or would you coolly and dispassionately ask yourself, "How do I serve my conscience, my God and my country?"

That is our responsibility, honourable senators. And the way I must discharge my responsibility is to vote against this bill, which interferes far more than it appears to do with a right that has been exercised for more than 500 years, the constitutional right of the Governor in Council to exercise the prerogative of mercy. In any event, I do not think we have the right to pass this bill. I am not at all sure how we can change the Constitution and interfere with that royal prerogative which has always existed.

Honourable senators, I hope what I have said will help you to come to your own decision on this very serious and important matter.

Senator Bélisle: Honourable senators, before moving the adjournment of the debate I would like to make a correction. The sponsor of the bill was quite clear when he said that he wished this debate to be rational and unemotional. It is quite obvious that we are debating the whole spectrum of capital punishment, which you, Senator Prowse, said we should. I am already on record as saying that I am a liberal-minded person when it comes to assistance. I am also on record as saying that anything said today by honourable senators would enhance the debate, and we would be enriched by it. My correction is this. I must exclude from that statement the words of the honourable gentleman who just damned our Criminal Code. I feel that if we permit one of our colleagues in this house to use the word "damned," a word which is uncalled for in this chamber, then we permit disrespect for one of our most important statutes.

Senator Prowse asked what we have to do to be ashamed? We can be ashamed of the word he pronounced. I shall not repeat it.

Senator Prowse: If the honourable senator will permit, I apologize for an unfortunate slip of the tongue. That is all it was, a careless slip of the tongue, and I am sorry.

On motion of Senator Bélisle, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 25 at 8 p.m.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Wednesday, February 26, 1975, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, you have heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Senator Grosart: Explain.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, before the question is put I will ask the chairman of this committee to explain the reason for this motion.

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has a large amount of work to do, and insofar as the committee is concerned we do not want any suggestion made that we are losing time in dealing with the legislation referred to us. In order to expedite it we should sit tomorrow afternoon as well as tomorrow morning.

Motion agreed to.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE ARTHUR MEIGHEN

PORTRAIT—QUESTION

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I am sorry to rise again to ask a question which I have asked of the Leader of the Government before and to which I got an answer at the time which seemed satisfactory but which seems less satisfactory now. It has to do with the missing portrait of the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen outside the Commons chamber. That portrait was defaced or damaged on or about June 21, 1973, and I asked a question about it on March 26, 1974 and was informed that the people who did the restoring or repairing of such defaced portraits were very scarce and very, very busy and that they had a long backlog and so had not been able to get at it. But the then Leader of the Government hoped that something would be done about it within a reasonable length of time, or words to that effect.

I drew attention to the matter again in the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne early in this session. I might have allowed the thing to rest there except that I notice now outside here that the portrait of Queen Charlotte has been removed from the wall, and there is a very appropriate and loyal explanation that it has been taken away for the purpose of being restored. I cannot help asking why, if the government has now got round to dealing with Queen Charlotte, it has not managed in the course of nearly two years to get round to dealing with the portrait of Arthur Meighen. If it makes haste as slowly over poor Queen Charlotte as it has over Mr. Meighen, nobody in this place will live to see the portrait of Queen Charlotte restored. The last time I referred to this—and I am coming to my question in a moment; I am sorry to delay, I am afraid I will be called to order—but the last time I referred to this I said that I cherished what was perhaps an unworthy suspicion that if the eccentric character who damaged the portrait of Mr. Meighen had damaged the portrait of Mr. Mackenzie King instead, the portrait of Mr. Mackenzie King would long since have been restored and replaced in all its glory. That suspicion has now, I am afraid, deepened to a certainty. I don't know whether there is some dyed-in-the-wool Grit roosting in the Department of Public Works or the Art Gallery, or wherever it is, who is determined to do this and to see that the portrait is not restored within a reasonable length of time. But I should really like to ask the Leader of the Government to look into this and to find out whether there is any prospect of this situation being dealt with within any measurable length of time. I have only four more years in this chamber and I should like to see that picture back before I go. I cannot help feeling that if it turns out to be impossible to restore it an appeal to the Meighen family would produce a fresh copy of the original portrait, which I know exists in Toronto.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I wish to assure you that nothing improper should be read into the disappearance of Queen Charlotte and the former Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen. The disappearances are readily explicable in logical, defensible technical terms. Queen Charlotte, of course, is in the process of being restored.

Some hon. Senators: Her portrait.

Senator Flynn: Yes. You don't need to do that with Arthur Meighen, but you do need to do it with Mackenzie King.

Senator Perrault: The portrait of Queen Charlotte is in the process of being restored, and I understand that a particularly painstaking restoration is under way with respect to the portrait of the former Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen.

TELEVISION

COMMERCIAL ADVERTISING MESSAGE—USE OF PICTURE OF PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS—STATEMENT

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, before I resume my seat may I make reference to two questions which were directed in the chamber on Thursday last, February 20. It will be recalled that Senator Davey made reference to an alleged commercial advertising message by Guaranty Trust, the commercial allegedly beginning with a picture of the Parliament Buildings and later purporting to feature a member of the Department of National Revenue inside the buildings with a part of the commercial apparently filmed within the precincts of Parliament Hill. I undertook to provide honourable senators an early answer to this question. I have determined that it may be impossible to obtain any kind of definitive ruling or opinion before this time next week. Apparently adequate precedents do not exist for alleged incidents of the kind cited by Senator Davey. Thus I must ask the indulgence of the house for a few more days.

WELFARE MINISTERS CONFERENCE

STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a question was directed by the Honourable Senator Benidickson, who requested that a copy of the statement of the Minister of National Health and Welfare made in the other place regarding the social security system in Canada—

Senator Flynn: Is it the 45-minute speech that cost $2,000?

Senator Perrault: Whatever amount was paid, if any, it is a very fine speech, I say in a very non-partisan way.

Senator Flynn: That is quite obvious.

Senator Perrault: But may I say that the suggestion was directed to this side that copies of the statement, which outlines up-to-date federal policy in the social welfare field, be made available to members of the Senate. I have since ascertained that a copy of the statement was to have been sent to every member of this chamber and every member of the other place. I would appreciate it if any member who has not received a copy of the statement would inform me at the earliest convenience, whereupon I will ensure that copies are provided.

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 20, the debate on the motion of Senator Robichaud for second reading of Bill S-21, to amend the Criminal Code (commutation of death sentence).

[Translation]

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, first of all allow me to express my sincerest thanks to Senator Robichaud for having, in introducing Bill S-21 to the Senate, stirred the conscience of the Senate to a matter which is certainly foremost in current interest across Canada today. Those of my honourable colleagues who have spoken before me in this debate certainly have, through their remarks, brought a wealth of opinion to the deliberations of the Senate which professes to have the maturity and the seriousness required to study, at greater leisure and with more wisdom, the bills passed by the other place which can also, on various occasions, claim to reflect the conscience of the Canadian people.

Allow me also to express my wholehearted agreement with the deep concern of the Senate about capital punishment and, above all, about the high rate of crime and repeated murders in Canada in the last few years as well as today.

[English]

The honourable senators who have preceded me in this debate have underlined the seriousness of the problems that confront us in Canada today. While not wanting to duplicate or repeat what my honourable colleagues have said, I would like to place in perspective the questions which we are asked to ponder and analyze today.

First, it has been expressed by one of my honourable colleagues that the widow and children of the victim have not been compensated in the past for such atrocious crimes. If the federal Parliament is to be the legislative body with respect to the criminal law, and if the criminal law has visited the consequences of a crime upon a Canadian citizen, should it not be equally true that the criminal law should make compensation to the victims of crimes which deprive a widow or children of the livelihood to which they are entitled? Schemes have evolved in some provinces, but such schemes can never replace the concern of the federal Parliament and the federal government in this regard. As long as the inequities of such injustice are repeated across Canada, it shall be the purpose of this house to express concern for the victims of such grave and serious circumstances that follow the murder of a loved one.

Another colleague has expressed his concern in another area. It is the possibility that a person might be hanged and subsequently found to be innocent after new evidence has been discovered. To suggest that my concern does not extend to such circumstances would be incorrect. In fact, I am deeply concerned about the question, and would suggest that certain steps be taken to avoid such consequences, should this bill ever be implemented. I am of the opinion, however, that the entire debate should not be curtailed by the insertion of a grave and serious detail but, nonetheless, a detail which would obscure the real purpose of this bill.

May I respectfully suggest to my honourable colleagues that if there is a danger of such incidents occurring, then that danger could perhaps be foreseen and alleviated by providing a further amendment to the Criminal Code to the effect that a conviction of murder should immediately be the subject of an appeal without the necessity of the accused having to file the appeal himself. If necessary, an accused who has been convicted of the crime of murder should be provided, at the state's expense, with counsel to enable an appeal to the provincial court of appeal in the jurisdiction where the conviction occurs, and subsequently to the Supreme Court of Canada.

This would avoid the tragedy which has been alluded to by my honourable colleague, and which I am sure he raised dutifully in conscience, as I would too. Nevertheless, I believe that the avenue of appeal should be completely exhausted before the matters of sentence and commutation of sentence arise. Perhaps there should be that further assurance and satisfaction that society will not exact the punishment when it is not fit or necessary.

A previous speaker in this debate alluded vaguely to the point that justice is not always perfect and impartial and, accordingly, in order to prevent the imperfection or the defect resulting in the death of an innocent person, perhaps the death penalty ought not to exist in this country. May I suggest to my honourable colleague who raised this matter, which is also a concern of mine, that because judges are independent, have security of tenure, and, in this country, have won a reputation equal to none across the world, perhaps we ought to entrust to them our system of criminal justice with greater faith than we have.

Who in this house would impeach the impartiality of 12 men and/or women, and judges who have been chosen by merit, whose sagacity is applied to a set of circumstances with impartiality? I doubt that anyone in this house would, for one moment, suggest that 12 men and/or women who have been called to decide whether or not an odious crime has been committed do not apply themselves properly to the case presented to them. Indeed, they give the accused every possible safeguard in the trial, and it is perhaps because such a safeguard is built into our system of criminal justice that we cannot afford to disregard the verdict of 12 men and/or women, good and honest, when they do not, themselves, suggest clemency or leniency for the convicted person.

It can be said, of course, that there is no alternative on conviction but for the judge to impose a sentence of life imprisonment without necessarily accepting that an eye for an eye is the proper principle. One has to wonder whether or not 12 men and/or women in their wisdom cannot convict an individual who has taken a life, and then leave it to the judge to pass sentence. Is that not democracy? I must ask you to consider, in your true conscience, whether there is a better system to determine guilt or innocence in such a serious matter.

There is another serious matter which I should like to consider, that being the duration of a life sentence. Our system of criminal justice has to provide for jail and parole to prevent the repetition of crime. The emotion which now runs high in this country, particularly among police officers, prison guards, and innocent citizens, would be substantially reduced if we knew that a life sentence meant imprisonment for life, or at least 25 years, and not a short-lived vacation at the expense of the Canadian taxpayer.

Several times, honourable senators, we have heard in this house the issue of deterrence, and whether or not deterrence prevents the commission of further similar crimes. However, no one has placed in perspective the fact that this house has the responsibility of the protection of all citizens. While deterrence is certainly our concern, protection of the people of this country is paramount. If we cannot assure protection to the public who use our streets, then we cannot proudly say that we have assisted in protecting them. Deterrence is certainly paramount, but to suggest that deterrence alone is the sole purpose of capital punishment, one would have to forget and completely ignore the responsibility with which this house is charged and, indeed, sworn to uphold, that being the protection of the public at all costs. We should give both factors, deterrence and the protection of the public, equal status in this debate. It is not at the cost of ignoring one that we will do justice to the other.

Having addressed myself to the question of the protection of the public and having discussed the matter of deterrence, I feel duty bound to look at the possibility of rehabilitation of those who have been convicted of committing a cold and calculated act of murder. Can these persons be rehabilitated? That is the question I put to honourable senators, and which Senator Robichaud has so eloquently discussed in this debate. Senator Robichaud suggested that there have been many instances of suicide by persons convicted of capital murder and sentenced to life imprisonment.

Suppose we look at the question of rehabilitation and conclude that rehabilitation is so impossible, even in the minds of those who have committed these cold, calculated murders, that they would rather not live with their consciences. That is at least one conclusion that could be reached. It certainly leads me to suggest that the maturity of our thinking could be brought to bear on this question, and perhaps we should re-examine the question of rehabilitation for these people.

The government is deliberately flouting the will of Parliament. In 1967, and again in 1973, Parliament voted to suspend the death penalty for a period of five years. But—

and this was at the request of the government which presented the bill—it made an exception in the case of prison guards and police officers. We are informed by Senator Robichaud—and I have the material to prove it—that as many as 25 police officers and two prison guards have been murdered while on duty since 1967. Yet the same government which asked that the death penalty be retained for the murderers of police officers and prison guards has been automatically commuting with undue haste all sentences of death in those cases.

If in 1967 and 1973 it was the intention of the government never again to hang anyone for capital murder, then why did they not make that very clear so that Parliament might have known exactly what it was voting for? Parliament was misled by the government on this question, and it continues to be misled.

The government has, in effect, without the benefit of statute, altered Canadian law as regards capital punishment, and that is dangerous business. If the Government of Canada can disregard the spirit of the law, so may we all, and the sort of chaotic situation that an attitude like that might lead to, were it to become widespread, is frightening to contemplate.

So, I fully agree with Senator Robichaud when he sets out to insure against the federal government's abuse of its statutory power in the matter of commuting death sentences. I am, however, not at all convinced that his bill will really solve the problem which we face—the problem of a government determined not to be bound by an act of Parliament which that government itself sought.

This bill, as I read it, would only limit the government's statutory power to commute death sentences. But what would happen in those cases where there was no recommendation of clemency by judge or jury, or where the jury could not agree on whether or not clemency should be recommended? What would happen in those cases? Senator Robichaud, since he has not sought to amend any other part of the code, obviously thinks those people would be put to death. I do not think that is so. The statutory power of the government will be limited by his amendment, but the royal prerogative of mercy will remain intact.

Section 686 of the Criminal Code reads:

Nothing in this Act in any manner limits or affects Her Majesty's royal prerogative of mercy.

So, if the government could not commute a death sentence on account of the restrictions placed upon it by Senator Robichaud's amendment to the code, it could petition the Crown and use the royal prerogative to commute the death sentence.

The bill before us now does not in any way, as much as it may have been the sponsor's intention to do so, ensure that murderers of police officers and prison guards, for whom no clemency has been recommended by judge or jury, will be executed. The royal prerogative can still be used. Section 686 of the Criminal Code is still there. The bill does not seek to amend the code by striking out section 686.

To place restrictions on the Governor in Council is not to place restrictions on the Crown in the right of Canada. But even if that were the case, the sponsor would still have to move an amendment to the code by striking out section 686. I say that because section 686, which follows section 684, would govern, and the prerogative of mercy would remain untouched. The accepted rules of statutory interpretation dictate that. It would make no difference if Senator Robichaud had commenced his amendment with the words "Notwithstanding anything in this Act..." The royal prerogative of mercy would still be there. Nothing but an act expressing such desire in clear and calculated language could accomplish that.

The situation is that if Senator Robichaud is to achieve his ultimate purpose, he must seek to limit the royal prerogative of mercy—that is, the natural, inherent prerogative of mercy.

Section 16 of the Interpretation Act states:

No enactment is binding on Her Majesty or affects Her Majesty or Her Majesty's rights or prerogatives in any manner, except only as therein mentioned or referred to.

To me, this means that if this house intends to limit the natural prerogative of the Crown in any way, then it will be compelled to be very clear and explicit in the way it approaches the problem. Any attempt to limit the inherent prerogative of the Crown must be a conscious, deliberate and explicit act.

This bill, in other words, would have to amend the code further by repealing section 686 and further amending section 684(1) to read "Governor General" instead of "Governor in Council." It would then be clear that the intention is to limit the royal prerogative of mercy.

But, even if all this is done, there is still a problem. Parliament cannot restrict a natural prerogative of the Crown without consent. So consent would have to be sought, and that, in my opinion, would have to be done by the Prime Minister, because the privilege of dealing with the Crown in matters as sensitive as that is a privilege reserved to the Prime Minister.

In the 17th Edition of May's Parliamentary Practice at page 615, under the heading "Queen's consent to bills," one can read the following passage:

In the case of bills which affect the royal prerogatives a more complicated formula is employed, varying slightly to suit the circumstances of each case, and including the statement that the Queen places her interests at the disposal of Parliament. The Queen's consent is signified by a Privy Councillor, but the communication of the fact that the Queen has placed her interests at the disposal of Parliament is made orally, generally by a Minister of the Crown.

This, May tells us, can be done at any stage of a bill's progress.

A bill to limit the royal prerogative of mercy would more appropriately be a government bill initiated in the other place. Thus, if we intend to protect against the government's flouting the law as regards capital punishment, this bill will have to be reworded and consent will have to be sought and granted.

The limiting of a royal prerogative is a serious matter. The course to be followed is a very complicated one. There are formalities which must be rigorously adhered to. The reason we make the process so difficult and involved is that we do not want lightly to limit inherent royal prerogatives. It is the Crown, with its prerogatives, which ultimately protects some of our most basic freedoms and privileges. For example, and as all of you know, it is the fact that the Crown has the prerogative of dissolving Parliament that assures us of elections once every five years, thus protecting us against "long Parliaments" and dictatorships.

The royal prerogative is part of our Constitution. To ignore it could lead to grave constitutional abuses. We are not, therefore, to treat the matter of limiting the royal prerogative of mercy, so as to forbid commutation of death sentences where clemency has not been recommended by judge or jury, or where there has been no agreement among the jury on whether or not to recommend clemency, as a light matter.

This is a serious constitutional matter. While I am in agreement with Senator Robichaud's goal, and am of the opinion that we would be justified in seeking to limit the royal prerogative of mercy in the matter of commuting death sentences, I want to see this bill sent to committee where our constitutional experts can discuss fully: 1. Whether or not I am correct when I say that this bill would only limit the statutory prerogative of the Governor in Council and leave intact the royal prerogative of mercy. 2. How we should go about seeking to limit the inherent royal prerogative of mercy, if this is what we must do to make sure that the government respects, in future, the spirit of our law with regard to the commutation of death sentences.

[Translation]

Honourables senators, I suggest that when this bill is returned to us, following serious and thorough study by the committee, we should have another look at it. I feel very strongly that it should be read the third time, so that once it has been sent to and adopted by the House of Commons, it may hopefully become an act which will reflect the aspirations of the Canadian people and bear witness to the serious climate of uncertainty which prevails throughout this country as to whether the legislation will apply to some people only and not to others. If our Upper Chamber wishes to deserve the confidence of the Canadian people, its conscience must reflect the climate of uncertainty which we have been made aware of and which you, honourable senators, have been the interpreters over the past few days of debate.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, February 18, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Deschatelets, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the claim made by the Minister of Justice of the Province of Quebec for financial compensation from the federal government with respect to the Quebec Provincial Police Force and to the ever-increasing costs of maintaining the various police forces in Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, I shall not be long. I feel, however, that the matter on which I intend to speak is important.

Last week Senator Jean-Paul Deschatelets dealt very intelligently with an important issue arising from the application for compensation for the services of provincial police forces which the federal government received first from the Quebec government and later from the Ontario government.

Thanks to Senator Deschatelets' clear and precise remarks, we are now in a position to see the problem in its proper perspective. Senator Asselin's exposition has also been highly appreciated.

I do not wish to go over again such a well presented exposition or the "ad rem" remarks made to date. These are events which are beyond dispute in the minds of Quebecers. Tonight, I shall deal briefly with one or two points which will serve me as a base for my own position.

[English]

The federal law enforcement facilities and the federal police services are used by eight participating provinces under an agreement that provides for the partial payment of its costs by the participating and agreeing provinces.

In the Yukon Territory and Northwest Territories, this law enforcement service is also provided under contracts to these territorial governments. The force is still called the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, a federal civic force responsible for enforcing federal laws throughout Canada. This 14,000 strong central police force is organized in three groups: The federal force, which is the Royal Canadian Mounted Police; the provincial police forces in all provinces except Quebec and Ontario; a number of municipal police forces.

As we know, the force celebrated its centennial in 1973, but since its inception it has expanded, in 1918 to assume law enforcement throughout the Canadian West, and in 1920 to absorb the Dominion Police and transfer its headquarters from Regina to Ottawa, from where it now serves eight provinces and territories and over 170 municipalities. It has liaison offices in Hong Kong, Paris, London and Washington, and it represents Canada in the International Criminal Police Organization. Its directorate of laboratories and identifications has been a focal point of criminal investigation work. Its five crime detection laboratories, and its remarkable duplexed computer system, connected by remote terminals with many other police forces, are also made available to all police forces in Canada. It is recognized as one of the world's best and most efficient law enforcement organizations.

Historically, arrangements with provinces and territories have been made since 1905 for full law enforcement services. The last contracted arrangement, made in 1966, will expire in 1976. It was made under the provisions of section 20 of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, chapter R-9 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970. This section pertains to the use of the services of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police of Canada in the provinces. It authorizes the Solicitor General of Canada to conclude arrangements with the government of any province or municipality for the total use of the RCMP in their provinces and municipalities to help the administration of justice and to assume the responsibility for the enforcement of the Criminal Code, the federal laws, the provincial laws and even the municipal bylaws.

The Quebec and Ontario governments, for a number of reasons, abstained in the past, as allowed, from any agreement with the federal government for the use of the federal law enforcement services. Since 1905, because it abstained, Quebec has had to pay in excess of $360 million for its police services, and Ontario has had to pay much more. In 1975, 52 per cent of the cost of the service will be paid for by our central government for the eight participating provinces. In 1976, the yearly cost to the participants will be 50 per cent.

● (2040)

As they are now drafted, these arrangements result in an unequal treatment of the non-participating provinces. Quebec and Ontario object to paying the total cost of their own law enforcement services and at the same time, indirectly, because of the agreement, a good part of the cost of the law enforcement services in eight of the other provinces. In 1973, Quebec decided to put in a claim against the federal government for compensation for that share of the extra costs they had to fork out because they had not joined the club and because they had not signed a participating agreement.

It is to be noted that the law itself allows the opting out of any province. It is contractual and constitutional but non-obligatory. Hence the present problem of inequality of treatment in the field of shared costs.

Early last year we became alerted to this problem when the question of the cost of civic protection services in cases of emergency was being reconsidered as between Ottawa and Quebec. Arrangements between member provinces should not involve unequal or unfair treatment in the sharing of the costs of any federal law enforcement services by the provinces. In our case the pertinent facts do point to an actual unequal sharing of costs for services. The federal authorities argue that the opted-out provinces can join in to take advantage of the formula of equal sharing of the costs of these services.

The study of a new agreement with the provinces who want to participate from 1976 on is, I believe, a good opportunity to rectify our federal law enforcement services policy and to establish more equitable rules for all provinces, rules that will not cause dissension because of the opting out of some, and rules that will not twist the arms, so to speak, of those opting out since that is allowed under our system.

We have a federal government, a central government, to help in the development of all member provinces. Each province is a federated member which benefits from a great many centralized services and takes advantage of the central government's excellent protective facilities and assistance. This, in the final analysis, contributes to strengthening both the members and the central or federal government.

Although the federal law enforcement services in Canada were reviewed and expanded in 1918 and 1920, the system needs to be reviewed again and, where the situation demands, to be overhauled and strengthened. It should now be made operative with power, authority and efficiency equally applied everywhere at any time and under any conditions.

[Translation]

Although remarkably efficient, the present system of federal-provincial arrangements, with or without inter-government consultation at the provincial level, and with participation on a partial cost compensation basis by the central government, is not in my opinion the fair and ideal arrangement doing justice to Canada, by reason especially of important regional developments, international ramifications of tracking illegal domestic and international trafficking of all kinds, and opportunities for fast travel between each of the different areas of Canada and abroad.

Surely each developed province—and they are all developed in Canada—must or should have an adequate police system of its own, as indeed every federated state in this modern world. I also believe in the transcendence, the priority and major importance to be given a national police system recognized by everyone, an unfragmented system operating in the same way and with the same impact, without territorial weaknesses.

Since the federal-provincial arrangements for the participating provinces will terminate in 1976, we should, in my opinion, restate the framework of rented assistance services, to ensure efficiency in meeting every modern Canadian requirement, in order that they truly reflect a spirit of fairness in our well developed and well established federal state.

Surely a Senate committee could examine the situation in this area, not only to correct differences now existing between the federal government and a few provincial governments that do not participate in the program, but also to initiate new expansion concepts for our federal police services and also to increase their cooperative actions.

[English]

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I did not have the opportunity of hearing all the debate on this inquiry. It is possible that the two or three points that I should like to draw to your attention have already been referred to, and if that is the case I hope you will pardon the repetition. I should like to point to one particular aspect of the current agreement between the participating provinces and the Government of Canada whereby the RCMP carry out police work which otherwise would be undertaken by a provincial police force.

● (2050)

In the early days of those arrangements it is true that the provinces paid little more than a token payment toward the cost of the services of the RCMP, and this situation is one that has changed gradually over the years. There was a time when both British Columbia and Alberta had their own police forces, but later they felt it was advantageous to disband the provincial forces and enter into an agreement with the federal government to use the services of the RCMP.

In the early days of this type of agreement, the provinces which did not participate could argue with validity that they were contributing substantially toward the cost of police services in those provinces that were served by the federal force. However, with the revision of the contracts which took place some years ago—and this is really the point to which I wish to draw your attention—that situation underwent a fundamental change.

I happen to have had the opportunity to participate in a series of conferences between the provinces and the federal government. The provinces that initially were using RCMP were quite perturbed when the federal government announced that they had decided there should be a substantial increase in the amount paid toward the cost of those police services by the participating provinces. However, when the basis of the federal government's argument was understood, I think it was eminently fair. They pointed out that because the RCMP was a national force and had to be preserved, whether the provinces used its services or not, there were fixed costs, such as the training of men, administration, recruitment, and all the other aspects of the mobilization and maintenance of a strong national force, which would continue whether the provinces chose to use the services of the RCMP or to have their own forces.

The federal government was asking the participating provinces in the revised agreement to pay enough based upon so much per man. The number of personnel was fixed by agreement between each province and the RCMP, but the provinces were asked to pay a sufficient amount per man that would, if not entirely, largely offset the additional cost that would be incurred by the federal treasury by reason of the necessity of having a number of additional men to serve in those provinces that were participants to the agreements.

I submit that if you look at the data that was produced at the time of the discussions, that proposition can be understood. If that is a correct premise, then it is not correct to say that the non-participating provinces today are paying any significant amount toward the cost of the police services provided those provinces which are under an agreement.

At the same time as these revisions were made in the arrangements between the federal government and the governments of the participating provinces, another feature was introduced under which a municipality that had its own force could enter into a specific contract with the RCMP for so many police personnel to carry out police work for that municipality. Here was an additional amount paid by the municipality over and above that contained in the agreement between a participating province and the federal government. Many municipalities in the West—I cannot speak for the other parts of Canada—took advantage of that offer, because it enabled them in most instances to obtain more highly trained men, members of a national force who had the advantages of liaison with the national crime detection agencies, exchange of information, and so on, at a lower cost than that for which they could have recruited and trained those men themselves.

I mention the second feature because it came in at the same time as the revised federal-provincial arrangements with the RCMP and became another source of revenue to offset to some degree the cost of the additional personnel recruited by the RCMP to provide not only the national service but services for the participating provinces, plus additional service where there was a specific contract between the municipality and the RCMP.

I am not discussing the merits of the various points raised in this debate. I think they are understandable and proper. My purpose in making these comments is to draw attention to what is really a matter of history. An interesting series of conferences led to a substantial increase in the charge per man that was levied against the participating provinces on the basis that the amount would be approximately sufficient to offset the difference in cost incurred by the federal treasury by reason of taking on that provincial service.

If that premise is correct, there is really not much argument for saying that the non-participating provinces are being discriminated against and paying for the services of police forces in other provinces. I submit that if you examine the financial facts of the existing agreements you will find that that is not the case.

Senator Buckwold: Would the honourable senator allow a question? Do the provinces pay the RCMP for personnel who carry out their national duties? Is that included in the overall provincial payments?

Senator Manning: No. I say this subject to any change which has taken place in the last few years, because I have not been in touch. It is still the same, my colleague says. Each participating province requisitioned a specific number of RCMP personnel. These personnel included not only the men carrying out the actual police work, but also whatever administrative personnel were required in that province by the RCMP because they were serving the province as a police force of that province. However, it had nothing to do with the members of the force stationed in that province to carry out their regular duties.

Senator Prowse: That included the cost of vehicles and equipment, in addition to the men.

Senator Manning: Yes, that is right. There was a whole formula. The price of the equipment and cars they needed, and everything else, was all included.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

INDIAN AND NORTHERN AFFAIRS

INDIAN AND ESKIMO RECRUITMENT DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM—INQUIRY ANSWERED

Senator Fergusson inquired of the government pursuant to notice:

Under the Indian and Eskimo Recruitment Development Program

(a) How many native students were employed in the summer of 1974;

(b) How many were male; and

(c) How many were female?

Senator Perrault: Answered.

There were 96 native students employed in the Indian and Eskimo Affairs program during the summer of 1974.

As information about the sex of an applicant is not shown on the application form, it is not possible to provide the exact breakdown. It is estimated, however, that 44 of the students were male and 52 were female.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

EMPLOYER-EMPLOYEE RELATIONS IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS
MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Fraser has been substituted for that of Mr. Dinsdale on the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service.

EXCISE TAX ACT AND EXCISE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, to which was referred Bill C-40, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act, presented the following report.

WEDNESDAY, February 26, 1975.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, to which was referred Bill C-40, intituled: "An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act", has in obedience to the order of reference of Wednesday, February 12, 1975, examined the said bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Your committee, however, considers it important that the following observations be made.

It appears that some unlicensed wholesalers of construction type equipment have been refused sales tax refunds although the government has seen fit to grant such refunds for the distributors of transportation equipment who are in an identical position. As well, such wholesalers are unlicensed for sales tax purposes, which means they must pay sales tax on the importation or purchase of such construction type equipment whereas competitors who are licensed for sales tax purposes pay such tax only at the time of the sale of such equipment. This situation arises in the administration of the sales tax by reason of the fact that competitors who can show that at least 50 per cent of their business over a specified period has been with tax exempt end users have an advantage.

The result of being in the position of unlicensed wholesalers because they cannot meet the above test is that on budget night, November 18, 1974, these unlicensed wholesalers had substantial tax-paid inventories for which the sales tax could not be recovered from customers when on that night such construction type equipment became exempt from sales tax. Their competition, namely, licensed wholesalers, had little or no tax-paid inventory on hand. To be competitive, these licensed wholesalers must absorb the amount of tax or lose substantial sales.

Your committee considered that it did not have clear authority to amend the Bill being reported on to correct this situation. However, your committee considered that this situation should be called to the attention of the Senate.

Your committee further considers that the same relief should be granted to those unlicensed wholesalers as was extended to the distributors of transportation equipment.

Respectfully submitted,
Salter A. Hayden,
Chairman.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Macnaughton: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1) (b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Macnaughton, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière), that this bill be now read the third time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I do not object to third reading being moved now, if some senators would rather speak on third reading today than tomorrow. The report tabled by the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce speaks for itself. Honourable senators may recall that when I spoke on second reading of this bill I raised the matter of the plight faced by unlicensed distributors of construction equipment who were caught with tax-paid inventories on budget night, November 18. They were in a rather difficult position, because they had paid the sales tax and had to face the competition of the licensed dealers, who had not been obliged, because of the system, to pay that tax in advance and had inventories on which no sales tax had been paid.

If I may explain further, these dealers sell pieces of equipment which are frequently valued at well in excess of $75,000, and the tax of 12 per cent on such an amount represents a significant sum. Dealers who have to sell in competition with others who have not paid the sales tax find themselves in a very difficult situation. The same problem was encountered by dealers in transportation equipment. The minister has seen fit, as was mentioned by the sponsor of the bill, Senator Macnaughton, to grant relief to these dealers, making use of certain provisions of the Financial Administration Act to achieve their end. The question was whether the same relief should be granted the dealers in construction equipment. That question was raised on second reading, and we in committee examined the position. The minister appeared before us and announced that he was not prepared to grant the same treatment to these unlicensed dealers in construction equipment. His reason, generally speaking, was that when the sales tax increases the dealers are left with tax-paid inventories at a lower sales-tax rate and, hence, benefit. Consequently they should be prepared to absorb the burden when the situation is reversed and the tax is lowered. But this argument was not very convincing and the committee failed to see why the same remedy should not apply to the group I have mentioned. Of course, there were other groups similar to dealers in building materials who were caught with tax-paid inventories on budget night, but their problem is not as easily solved.

So, in these circumstances the committee felt that if some remedy were to be granted, it would have to be either by way of amendment to the bill or by the minister's using the provisions of the Financial Administration Act.

The question of an amendment was difficult, because we were not sure whether the Senate, or even the House of Commons, had the power to adopt a provision which would have the effect of providing a refund in taxes, which is something different from providing a decrease in tax. Were we to provide for a refund, we would be interfering with ways and means. Were we to decrease the tax, we would be doing something which has been accepted as being within the competence of the House of Commons and certainly of the Senate.

Because of this doubt, the committee felt that the bill should be reported without amendment, but that it should be mentioned that in the committee's opinion the minister should grant to the distributors of construction equipment, who were unlicensed and had tax-paid inventories on budget night, November 18, the same remedy as that provided for dealers in transportation equipment.

That is the meaning of the report before the Senate. It does not, of course, affect the bill in itself, but these facts should be drawn to the attention of the Senate, as its attention had been drawn to the recommendation contained in the report. I for one would certainly urge the Minister of Finance to accept the recommendation of the committee, which I trust will become the recommendation of the Senate.

Hon. Eric Cook: Honourable senators, I should like to make a few remarks in support of the recommendation made in the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on Bill C-40.

I attended all meetings of the committee during which Bill C-40 was considered, and I have carefully reviewed all the correspondence and supporting data. As a result, I have no hesitation in respectfully urging the minister to review this application. I feel sure that if the minister and his officials permit these taxpayers a fresh opportunity to outline the facts surrounding their case, the minister will find himself able to grant the relief suggested by the committee. Otherwise, I fear a grave injustice will be done, and a small number of taxpayers will suffer hardship while other taxpayers in exactly the same line of business will escape all liability in respect of this 12 per cent tax reduction.

I do not wish in any way to say anything provocative, because I am sure the minister is a fair-minded man, as are his officials, and if this matter is reconsidered, making a fresh start and bringing a completely open mind to bear on the problem, the merits of the request will be apparent and the prayer for relief will be granted.

Let me briefly outline the situation as I see it. The equipment distributors request a refund of the 12 per cent excise tax they paid to the government on inventory they had on hand unsold on the date of the budget, November 18, 1974. The main merit of this application rests on the fact that there are two classes of equipment distributors doing business in Canada, both classes handling exactly the same equipment. One class is the licensed equipment dealer, and the other is the unlicensed dealer. The licensed dealer sells over 51 per cent of his turnover to users in Canada who are exempt from having to pay the 12 per cent tax, examples being provinces or municipalities. Therefore, rather than the licensed dealer paying the tax at the time he imports the equipment, he only pays it at the time he sells the equipment to consumers who are not exempt, such consumers as contractors in the ordinary course of business.

On the other hand, the unlicensed distributor sells over 50 per cent to non-exempt consumers, and he pays the tax in respect of most of his sales or turnover at the time he buys the equipment. In the event that he sells equipment to an exempt consumer, he claims a refund.

The licensed distributor and the unlicensed distributor are in direct competition, one with the other. They sell the same type of equipment to, if possible, the same consumer. However, the inventory of the licensed distributor is tax-free—that is, the licensed distributor has paid no tax on his inventory—whereas the unlicensed distributor paid 12 per cent tax on the inventory he had on hand as of November 18, 1974. The unlicensed wholesaler or distributor could not escape having some tax-paid inventory on hand as at that date. In order not to have had tax-paid inventory on hand as at November 18, 1974, he would have had to voluntarily cease to do business after July 8, 1974, until after the budget date, whenever that might have been. By doing that, he would have surrendered his customers to the licensed wholesalers during this undetermined period.

Unless the department intends to benefit the licensed wholesaler at the expense of the unlicensed wholesaler, clearly refunds should be made for the following and, no doubt, other reasons:

(1) The application has great merit, and there has been no bad faith whatsoever.

(2) It is quite feasible to make refunds, taking into consideration the number of distributors and the nature and value of the separate pieces of equipment. There are no insurmountable difficulties. There are only 60 distributors involved, and the total amount of the refunds would be $3,500,000, which is not a large sum as far as the government is concerned. Indeed, a similar application was granted in the case of distributors of transportation equipment.

(3) Making the refunds asked for would not create a precedent, because the refunds in this case are necessary to put two classes of taxpayers in the same line of business on an equal tax footing. In all other cases, clothing dealers and dealers in that class of goods are already on an equal footing, and will continue to be so, irrespective of an increase or decrease in taxes. Therefore, there is no inequity as between taxpayers in the same class.

(4) The argument that the distributor receives the benefit when the tax is increased is true, but it carries little weight in this particular case. The distributors are being asked now to absorb a reduction in the tax of the full 12 per cent. On the other hand, in the last 25 years the tax was increased by only 2 per cent in 1951, by only 1 per cent in 1959, and by only 1 per cent in 1967.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I was one member of the committee who had some doubts about the recommendations that have been made in the report of the committee. I am not in any way trying to deny the construction equipment dealers what they feel is their right in having a very substantial amount of money, $3.5 million, returned to them. One of my major points was that they are in the same position as literally thousands of other businesses of very substantial value that will get no refunds. The sales tax was dropped on building equipment to the extent of 6 per cent, involving inventories of literally millions of dollars. The sales tax was dropped on footwear to the extent of 12 per cent, and the wholesalers and retail distributors who had very large inventories and stocks on hand on which tax was paid took that loss. The tax was dropped on all clothing, and again those who had substantial investments in those lines found themselves taking the loss.

My point is that I do not know where we can draw the line. Is it fair to say, "We are going to give back to the construction equipment dealers the loss they have taken in the decline of inventory value because of the drop in tax," and let all the other people who have taken a similar kind of loss bear the entire burden? To me this seems blatantly unfair.

I know the argument has been put forward that there is competition between licensed and unlicensed wholesalers or distributors, but this is also true of other lines. There are licensed distributors of a variety of commodities where the same situation applies. There might also be some argument about whether the relationship of transportation equipment to construction equipment is quite as similar as has been indicated.

I only pass on this information to show that, while it is true these people have taken a loss and there may have been unfair competition in some way or another, there are, on the other hand, I suppose, hundreds of occasions involving larger amounts with respect to a wide variety of items that have had tax removed from them, and the loss has been borne by those who owned those inventories, yet there is no recommendation for relief. I just draw this to the attention of the house.

[Senator Cook.]

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, I do not propose to go over the ground that has already been developed. I rise only to correct one statement made by my friend Senator Buckwold in referring to the clothing and shoe industries. Those industries had these problems immediately the May budget was defeated, and they made representations to the government, as a result of which an order in council was passed, under the authority of the Financial Administration Act, remitting those duties, on the basis that at some time, if the government were returned, the budget of May 8 would be reinstated in these respects. Therefore, Senator Buckwold was in error in his reference to the unfortunate position of the clothing and shoe industries.

In addition, the revision of the Financial Administration Act for remission of duties, which can be done by the Governor in Council, has been applied in the case of the transportation equipment industry. This means that, notwithstanding the fact that they had accumulated tax-paid inventories by the time the budget became effective on November 18, 1974, after which date, of course, they were tax exempt, there was an order in council for remission of those duties on tax-paid inventories that had accumulated at that time.

These three instances, quite apart from what Senator Cook said, indicate that recognition has been given to the situation in respect of certain taxpayers. I am not questioning the motive or the reason for it. I think in the case of clothing and shoes the reason was a good one, that there are many people employed in the clothing industry and there are seasonal changes in the preparation of clothing and materials and getting it into the market. The clothing people in the state of their industry were not prepared to carry on in an if-as-and-when basis and be subject to a 12 per cent tax added to the price at which they might try to sell their merchandise.

That was the position of the shoe people as well. But so far as the transportation equipment people are concerned, they have come more lately into the picture and their position has been recognized on the basis that their equipment was of large structure and involved substantial cost, with a selling price up to $150,000 per unit. But the order in council on the minimum side provides for remission of duty on transportation equipment, which includes three-ton trucks in which case the cost factor might be between $5,000 and $10,000. On the other hand, with respect to the construction type of equipment, which involves steam shovels and equipment of that kind, there are units which have a cost in excess of $150,000. So, you have a paralleling of position there. In one instance the situation has been recognized, and remission has been granted; in the other, it has not. To say that there are other people in the same situation adds little to the argument; undoubtedly, there are.

There is to be a reduction in duty from 12 to 6 per cent in the sales tax on construction material, but the problem there was indicated to be a difficult administrative one. With such quantities of construction materials held in so many different places, the department felt it presented too large an administrative problem.

In this case we were told by the witnesses that there is not that difficulty in administration. There is a record of every sale, and therefore there is the identity of the person; moreover, the number of persons involved is not substantial. The administrative problem is of much simpler proportions.

This was the view of the committee. When a motion was made to amend the bill, I felt as chairman that there was not any authority in the committee, or at least it was doubtful whether there was, to amend the bill in this regard. I therefore refused to accept the amendment and it was not pressed. I also reinforced myself by getting the opinion of our law clerk. On that basis we took the next best course and included in our report a statement of the situation.

I must say that this has been described here by several of the speakers as being a recommendation. If it were a recommendation, we would not be engaged on third reading at this time. We would be debating the report. This is not a recommendation. We are calling to your attention a situation which was disclosed in the course of the hearing. We are then suggesting that the government should give serious thought to these representations with a view to improving the position of these people.

Hon. Ernest Manning: Honourable senators, I am not going to repeat the points which already have been well made. I wholeheartedly endorse the hope that has been expressed that the minister will give favourable consideration to the relief sought by the distributors of construction equipment.

On the occasion when the minister was before the committee he emphasized quite strongly, as one of his reasons for maintaining that this relief was not warranted, the fact that ample notice had been given to these people by virtue of a press release following the first budget. During the past weekend I took the opportunity to discuss this problem with some of these construction equipment dealers. They pointed out that there is a very long lead time between the time they place orders and the time that this equipment can be delivered. They said if they cancelled orders and started over again they would not only be faced with quite severe penalties but also with the probability of not being able to get the inventory equipment in time to keep their operation going. For this reason they say this notice factor, on which a lot of emphasis was placed by the minister, is in fact not realistic as far as this type of equipment is concerned.

I agree fully that there is a close parallel between heavy construction equipment and the trucking vehicles for which provision has already been made by order in council. In fairness to the construction equipment dealers, I do not think that it should stand that they had ample time to make the adjustments which would have protected them from the taxes in question. I wholeheartedly endorse the idea that the minister give favourable consideration to their request for tax relief.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I am not speaking twice in the debate. I rise on a question of privilege to correct the distinguished chairman of the committee. He said I was in error in my reference to the clothing and footwear inventories not being relieved of tax because of the order in council, and that arrangements had been made, because of the type of industry, for the remission of the tax. The Leader of the Opposition shakes his head, but this is what I got from what the chairman said.

Senator Flynn: I am shaking my head because I think you are using the word "privilege" for providing a debating point.

Senator Grosart: It is not a privilege, and you are speaking twice.

Senator Flynn: You cannot speak twice on the motion. You may feel somewhat frustrated by what has been said, but that is something else.

Senator Buckwold: I wanted to correct the error. I can only speak from personal experience, because I happen to be involved in the same kind of operations, and I know that for the period from May 8 to July 8 full sales taxes were paid on those items by the company I represent. I am very glad to hear that there may be a way of getting some of that back. Therefore, I would also say that I do not really feel that my statement was in error.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

THE HONOURABLE JEAN MARCHAND, P.C.

RUMOUR OF RESIGNATION OF MINISTER OF TRANSPORT— QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I want to ask the Leader of the Government if there is any truth to the rumour that the Honourable Jean Marchand has resigned as Minister of Transport. If this is true, could the leader tell us why Mr. Marchand resigned?

• (1430)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there is no validity to that rumour. The minister in the other place is going to remain an active member of Her Majesty's Privy Council.

Senator Flynn: But has he resigned his office as Minister of Transport? You say he is remaining in the Cabinet, but that is a different matter.

Senator Perrault: No.

Senator Flynn: You have said that he is remaining in the Cabinet, but has he resigned as Minister of Transport? Has there been any change at all? I would like the honourable leader to state bluntly if Mr. Marchand is still the Minister of Transport or if he has resigned that office.

Senator Perrault: I think that question should be more properly directed in the other place. However, I want to assure all honourable senators that Canada will continue to be served superbly well by the minister in his present portfolio.

Senator Flynn: I certainly wasn't trying to suggest that he is doing anything less than a superb job.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

REFERENCE OF GREEN PAPER TO COMMONS COMMITTEE— FURTHER QUESTION

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, on December 11, 1974, I asked a question. I take the liberty of reading the following from page 373 of Hansard of that day:

SENATOR CROLL: Honourable senators, the House of Commons endorsed the following resolution and passed it, and I quote:

That the Green Paper entitled "Members of Parliament and Conflict of Interest" tabled on November 27, 1974, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections; and

That, after the Committee has concluded its deliberations and submitted its report on the aforementioned matter, it be authorized to consider and make recommendations upon the subject-matter of Ministers and conflict of interest and Public Servants and conflict of interest.

My question is, what provision is being made, or has been made, for our participation in a matter which affects senators equally with members of the House of Commons?

SENATOR LANGLOIS: The only thing I can say at this stage is that consideration is being given to this subject, and that the matter will be referred to this house in due course.

By my calculation 77 days have passed since December 11, so nobody can say that I have not been patient. As a matter of fact, I think I must now say that my patience is wearing a little thin. I am told that a statement made by Mr. Reid in the other place is to the effect that all questions on matters of policy should be answered within a week. In that case my question should have been answered a long time ago, because it was evident that the Commons was not going to join with us in the consideration of any such question as conflict of interest. They feel—and surely it must have been known on this side—that questions of conflict of interest in that house can be settled by guidelines sufficiently strong to apply to ministers as well as members, and they have indicated that they want no part of us in connection with any inquiry; that our situation is a different one; and that what is needed here is some deep, serious, political surgery.

Senator Grosart: Is this a question?

Senator Croll: This is leading up to the question I want to ask. I had a hard enough time getting an answer to my other question, so I thought that perhaps I should make this one plainer.

Senator Argue: You are quite in order.

Senator Croll: It appears to me that the leader must have known some time ago what the answer would be. I have made inquiries from time to time, and I would have thought that he would have told me, because it would have been the courteous thing to do when he first knew about it. But what do we find now? We find that the Green Paper, "Members of Parliament and Conflict of Interest," is being considered by the House of Commons. I read from the Globe and Mail of this date where it says:

He was commenting during committee debate on a Government green paper setting out proposed conflict of interest legislation for MPs and senators.

Are they going to deal with it insofar as it affects us as well as themselves, honourable senators? I ask that because nothing, to my knowledge, has been done on this side. Do we have to wait for the answers from the House of Commons?

But there is something here more serious than that. It had been rumoured on the other side for a long time that they would not join with us. Another rumour to be heard on the other side is that there are ten vacancies in the Senate, and they will not be filled until such time as we make some reasonable and meaningful reforms, particularly where conflict of interest is concerned. Whether that rumour is true or not, I do not know, but it may be just as true as the first one which, in fact, is turning out to be quite true.

The question I want to ask now—and I am sure every senator understands what it should be—is this: What is being done, or what is going to be done? I think I have a right to ask that question again after 77 days.

Senator Perrault: I should like to remind honourable senators that if rumours on Parliament Hill could be converted into power, we would see a very power-rich country indeed. I do not think it serves much purpose to cite rumours—some of which I have not encountered—regarding appointments to the Senate.

As far as the other question is concerned, the Deputy Leader of the Government in this house indicated approximately two weeks ago that we have yet to receive a response from the other place with respect to a matter which, of course, touches on the rights and privileges of members of the Senate. I shall undertake personally to see if we can achieve a comprehension of the attitude of the other place towards the idea of conflict of interest as it affects both the House of Commons and the Senate. It seems to me that this might indeed be a useful area for joint committee activity.

Senator Desruisseaux: May I ask the government leader a question? Will he define "conflict of interest"?

Senator Perrault: That is one of the tasks of the committee, but if the honourable senator has a useful definition that might assist all of us, then I hope he will be good enough to tell us.

Senator Desruisseaux: If I had one I would have given it.

CRIMINAL CODE (COMMUTATION OF DEATH SENTENCE)

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Robichaud for second reading of Bill S-21, to amend the Criminal Code (commutation of death sentence).

Hon. A. E. Haddon Heath: Honourable senators, I read my horoscope in the Montreal Gazette this morning, and it said to keep a low profile. I am here to speak to Bill S-21, to amend the Criminal Code, and so you will see that I shall have some difficulty in keeping a low profile. However, it seems we do not believe all we read in the papers—even in the Montreal Gazette.

Perhaps an important thing to keep in mind in dealing with Bill S-21 is that it is not legislation where it matters whether one is an abolitionist or a retentionist as far as capital punishment is concerned. We debated this in 1973 and, previously, in 1968.

It may be important to note that we passed an amendment to the Criminal Code in 1973, in all good faith that its provisions would be carried out; but apparently they have not been. The modest amendment we are discussing today is surely not unreasonable. We are simply being asked to amend the code to the extent of ensuring that the wishes of Parliament are carried out.

It is perhaps good to dust off some first principles at this time. Legislators define crime and prescribe certain consequences, as we did in 1968 and again in 1973. Courts decide whether or not crime has occurred, and impose suitable sanctions within the law. In the matter of punishing those convicted, we might take an historical approach. It is a broad problem and, as legislators, we probably should take a long approach—which, with respect, should be the way of the legislator. Crimes and offences were originally breaches of the King's peace. At least, that has been so since Saxon times. The sovereign was, and still is, the father and protector of the people and the fountain of justice. It was his duty to see that his people were free to go about their business unhindered by the activities of the anti-social. We now have the citizen and the state, but the same principles apply. A crime is a matter of public interest, an offence of such gravity as to require the application of public justice.

We come, therefore, to the object of criminal law, which is simply to preserve the public peace. How to do it? By ascertaining the culpability of suspected offenders and then punishing them, the cardinal object of punishment being the protection of the public.

The basics of criminal justice are simple enough, but their application is infinitely difficult. So we return to the initial hypothesis, that legislators define crime and prescribe certain consequences. Courts decide whether it has occurred, and impose suitable sanctions within the law. We might well ask who is charged with the duty of imposing suitable sanctions under the Constitution, and better equipped to carry out this sovereign duty? Wicked old judges, that's who!

Have the judges and juries since 1968 been one hundred per cent wrong? If the executive—that is, the Governor in Council—can literally dismember the orders and judgments of the courts, the impression that the courts do not know what they are doing is fortified in the mind of the public. The danger is that the impeachment of the credibility of the courts may well result in massive disobedience of judicial orders. How then will government govern? By means of troops and bayonets?

The result of interference with the judicial function will be much more serious than those who have encouraged or permitted it ever imagined.

Parliament, the executive and the courts have their respective powers, which we attempt to keep in balance. On this solid base rests all our hope of good governance. If two of these three elements are being emasculated, this bill is a modest step in restoring the necessary balance. It seems reasonable that Bill S-21 will be a constructive element in restoring both the effectiveness of Parliament and of our judicial system.

Hon. John Morrow Godfrey: Honourable senators, as everyone is probably well aware, I am unalterably opposed to capital punishment in any form, and was one of eight senators who voted against capital punishment with respect to the murder of police officers. The reason, very simply, is that it appeared to me to be illogical that if someone murdered the Prime Minister of Canada, his wife, or his child, he would be sent to jail for life, or for a certain number of years. On the other hand, if he murdered the RCMP officer guarding the Prime Minister, he would be executed.

The public have the idea, in my opinion, that this problem is greater than it actually is. In Toronto last week I was being attacked by several of my friends with respect to the action of the government in commuting these death sentences. I therefore asked one of them for his estimate as to the average number of policemen murdered in Canada each year, and he replied 25. We have had the figures from Senator Robichaud, and I will just remind you of them. In 1968 the number was five; in 1969 it was five; then it dropped for three years in a row to only three each year, and increased to five in 1973. Therefore, the problem is actually not as great as it is considered to be by the public.

We also heard from Senator Prowse, who pointed out that in the last two years there has been only one murder of a policeman in each year with respect to which there was no recommendation for mercy by the judge or jury, and the Cabinet commuted the death sentence. However, I am sympathetic to the viewpoint that the Cabinet should not automatically commute all death sentences. It is wrong if they are allowing their personal opposition to capital punishment to influence their decisions.

As far as I am concerned, there is no way I could support Senator Robichaud's bill. This could result in a person being executed because evidence that would have resulted in a recommendation for mercy by the judge or jury came to light after the trial rather than before it. Also, there may be relevant evidence that would not be placed before the judge and jury, although available, because it would not be the type of evidence adduced at a murder trial, although it might be pertinent to this question of commutation.

Senator Hicks asserts that this is a highly unlikely hypothetical case. I can simply say that I do not agree. I am sure that there have been many cases in which commutation has been granted based upon information and evidence not available to either the judge or jury.

However, as I say, I sympathize with the view that the government should obey the spirit as well as the letter of the law. Might I suggest that this object to a certain extent might be accomplished by requiring the government, when there have not been recommendations for mercy by the judge or jury, to give detailed reasons for their decision if they decide to commute the death penalty.

On motion of Senator Petten, for Senator Michaud, debate adjourned.

SENATE (INTERSESSIONAL AUTHORITY) BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jacques Flynn moved the second reading of Bill S-22, to provide for the internal economy and administration of the Senate between sessions of Parliament and between Parliaments.

[Translation]

He said: Honourable senators, I have been waiting for an opportunity when our program would not be too heavy to introduce this bill which is in no way dramatic and which I bring to you very simply.

It represents the result of the experience I have acquired since I came to the Senate over 12 years ago, and especially since I have become Leader of the Opposition in the Senate. I am in the process of establishing a record here. It is not my fault but that of the Canadian electorate.

Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière): And you will keep it up.

Senator Flynn: I beg your pardon? Is the interpretation system not working?

[English]

Senator Croll: Madam Speaker, the interpretation system is not working, and we would like to hear the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Flynn: If it is not working I shall speak in English.

This bill is not one which is necessarily endorsed by the party to which I belong. It merely comes as a result of some of the experience I have acquired since I entered the Senate some 12 years ago, but more particularly since I became Leader of the Opposition over seven years ago. I may very well establish a record in this post of Leader of the Opposition, not because I wish to do so but because of various decisions made by the electorate of Canada. Senator Fournier suggests that the situation is not about to change. He has been here for such a long time that he should know what he is talking about.

I am not so lacking in humility as to suggest that it is necessarily in the interests of Canada that I should remain in this post. Nor am I suggesting that I should take over the responsibilities of the Leader of the Government. I do not envy him, I can assure you.

The bill I am proposing for your consideration hopefully will give rise to a debate as to what we should do concerning certain problems. Some of these are minor, while others are becoming more important because of the evolution of responsibilities taken over by the Senate in recent years, particularly in the investigations conducted by our committees. This bill is an attempt at a solution to these problems.

As honourable senators know, when there is a dissolution, the Senate is in no way changed as a result. We all remain members of the Senate. The same does not obtain in the other place. Dissolution there means that those people are no longer members of the House of Commons. But, because of the legislation which provided that their indemnity should be paid on a monthly basis and until the date of the election following a dissolution, this concept of ceasing to be a member of the House of Commons upon the day of dissolution has become clouded.

The same situation is not to be found in the Senate. We remain senators, but, as has been said by legal experts, we are discharged from our duties. Therefore there is a sort of hiatus created.

Could we not allow for senators to undertake some work during the period of dissolution—that is, from the date of dissolution until the date when Parliament reconvenes? Sometimes that period is quite lengthy. That is one question, and the most important one with regard to the duties that might be undertaken during such periods.

I shall deal with the minor matters in a moment. I wish to place on record the various periods during which Parliament did not sit following a dissolution. The periods vary from 100 to 150 days, which is over five months.

In the House of Commons, the only problem between Parliaments is that of internal economy, which is solved by the House of Commons Act, giving authority to the Speaker to deal with problems of staff, and so on.

There are no other problems in the other place, at least from the date of dissolution until the date of the election, because following the date of election the new members, or re-elected members, are sworn in and arrangements are made for their travelling expenses, the hiring of staff, and so on, which are confirmed when the house reconvenes for the first session.

The following are the number of days involved in the periods of dissolution between the Twenty-fifth and Thirtieth Parliaments: between the Twenty-fifth and Twenty-sixth Parliaments, February 6, 1963 to May 16, 1963, 99 days; between the Twenty-sixth and Twenty-seventh Parliaments, September 18, 1965 to January 18, 1966, 132 days; between the Twenty-seventh and Twenty-eighth Parliaments, April 23, 1968 to September 9, 1968, 138 days; between the Twenty-eighth and Twenty-ninth Parliaments, September 1, 1972 to January 4, 1973, 125 days; and, finally, between the Twenty-ninth and Thirtieth Parliaments, May 18, 1974 to September 30, 1974, 143 days.

In the Senate, the problem of hiring staff, of providing travelling expenses, and so on, during a dissolution, is dealt with by adopting the following resolution after each Parliament has reconvened for the first session:

That during any period between sessions of Parliament or between Parliaments, the Leader of the Government in the Senate and a senator to be named by him from time to time and the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, or a senator to be named by him from time to time, be authorized to act for and on behalf of the Senate in all matters relating to the internal economy of the Senate; and

That within fifteen days of the commencement of the next ensuing session there shall be laid on the Table by or on behalf of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, a report covering in reasonable detail all matters relating to the internal economy of the Senate arising during any such period.

● (1500)

This problem is theoretical with respect to the period between sessions of Parliament, because the custom over the last ten years has been to prorogue the session on the day prior to the commencement of the new session. Therefore, the Senate is merely adjourned. There is no problem in that respect. If there were, I suggest we would have been able to deal with it by a resolution of the Senate giving the necessary authority.

This authority has not been challenged either for the period between sessions of Parliament or between Parliaments. Yet it covers, as I mentioned, only trivial matters. I have a lot of the minutes of this committee that we appoint from time to time to deal with problems between Parliaments, and these indicate that the matters dealt with were such things as travelling expenses for members attending parliamentary association meetings, use of credit cards for making telephone calls from outside Ottawa, temporary staff during the period between Parliaments, and things of that nature.

I think it would be useful to have the proposals embodied in Bill S-22 to deal with these matters in a more comprehensive and certainly a more standard way than has been the case in the past. My main concern, however, is not so much with such matters as I have outlined, but rather the problems encountered by Senate committees which are investigating certain matters that have been referred to them by the Senate. The moment Parliament is dissolved, investigations by Senate committees come to an immediate standstill. Yet the fact is that these committees could continue to hold hearings for at least a month, and perhaps even a month and a half after dissolution of Parliament. Also, they could reconvene shortly after the election, and sit from that time up to the beginning of the first session of the new Parliament.

When it is not a question of legislation, it seems to me that the Senate should provide authority for its committees, to which have been referred certain matters for investigation, to continue their hearings. I am quite sure Senator Croll will agree with me on that point.

The most striking example of what I am dealing with here concerns the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy which encountered delays amounting to at least three months in completing its study because of dissolutions of Parliament. In May of 1974 the Foreign Affairs Committee had arranged for five or six sittings with very important witnesses which, again, could not be held because of the dissolution of Parliament. Had we had the provisions which are embodied in Bill S-22 at that time, the Foreign Affairs Committee would have been able to continue for at least a month and would have been able to reconvene right after the election. As a result, it would probably be much further advanced than it now is in its study of relations between Canada and the United States.

Honourable senators, I am sure, are not always busy during the entire period between Parliaments. Not too many senators are heavily involved in the entire election campaign, and there are not too many who could not come back fairly soon after the election itself to resume their duties as members of such committees.

For those reasons, honourable senators, I suggest that Bill S-22 would solve our problems in this respect. The only objective I have in presenting it is to correct this unfortunate situation and, at the same time, provide for a solution for the other minor problems which I have outlined.

Perhaps I could take a moment to draw to your attention the main clause of the bill, that being clause 3. Clause 2 deals with the committee that would be appointed to deal with these problems, and it would be much the same as the one which is presently established by resolution; that is, one made up of the Leader of the Government in the Senate or a senator acting for him, and a senator to be named by the leader or, in his absence, by the Acting Leader of the Government; and the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate or a senator acting for him, or a senator to be named by the Leader of the Opposition or, in his absence, by the Acting Leader of the Opposition. That committee would cover all the situations which might arise and may act for and on behalf of the Senate in all matters relating to the internal economy or administration of the Senate, and would report to the Senate within 15 days of the commencement of the next session.

The main point of this bill is to be found in clause 3, which states:

(1) Notwithstanding anything in the Rules of the Senate or in any other law or authority, any Senate committee in existence immediately prior to the termination of a session, and the members thereof, may be authorized by the Senate prior to dissolution or prorogation, or by the Senate Interseasonal Authority between sessions of Parliament and between Parliaments, to sit and continue any investigation previously entrusted to it by the Senate, for the duration or any part of any such period, and shall be deemed to have been reconstituted accordingly.

And subclause (2) is:

Notwithstanding subsection (1), the powers of a Senate committee authorized to function between sessions of Parliament or between Parliaments are limited to the taking of evidence unless otherwise authorized by the Senate Interseasonal Authority on the recommendation of the committee.

The "unless" clause provides for the situation where the Senate might authorize a committee to proceed with the preparation of a report, and this has been the case on previous occasions.

Subclause (3) provides:

The evidence given before any such committee between sessions of Parliament or between Parliaments shall form part of the records of its successor committee, if any, when it is established following the commencement of the next ensuing session of Parliament.

Whether the formula embodied in this bill will provide the ideal solution to the problems I have in mind, I do not know. I think it is a good solution. My main objective, as I said, is to draw the attention of the Senate to the necessity of providing a solution to these problems, and I hope that the debate on this bill will bring about either the endorsement of the bill I am presenting or the introduction of a bill by the Leader of the Government, or any other honourable senator, which might more effectively solve the problems I have described.

On motion of Senator Perrault, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

ALASKA BOUNDARY TREATY OF 1825

150TH ANNIVERSARY OF ESTABLISHMENT OF CANADA'S WESTERN BOUNDARIES

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, with leave, I should like to impart to the house what I consider to be some important and worthwhile information.

Tomorrow, February 28, 1975, marks the 150th anniversary of the establishment of Canada's western borders, accomplished by the signing of the Alaska Boundary Treaty of 1825, by which Great Britain and the Russian Empire demarcated their boundaries on the northwest coast of North America. Territories assigned by this treaty to Great Britain later became the Province of British Columbia, the Yukon Territory, and part of the Northwest Territories of Canada. Alaska was purchased by the United States in 1867. Thus were established Canada's western boundaries, which have remained to the present day, thereby extending her territories from the Atlantic to the Pacific and to the Arctic in the North.

Signing for Great Britain was her plenipotentiary, Stratford Canning. The co-signatories for the Russian Empire were Count Charles Nesselrode and Pierre de Poletica, former Ambassador to the United States. In 1923, by resolution of the Government of the United States and the Government of Canada, mountains on the Alaska-British Columbia boundary were named in honour of Nesselrode and Poletica, as well as the British negotiators George Canning and Sir Charles Bagot, and the American negotiators Henry Middleton and John Quincy Adams.

Since the negotiators of the Alaska Boundary Treaty of 1825 on the Russian side are considered to have been quite fair and even generous, I am drawing attention to Pierre de (Petro) Poletica, who was a Ukrainian. This should be of interest to Canadians, because over 600,000 citizens of Ukrainian ancestry live in this country and have made significant contributions in all walks of Canadian life. A prominent diplomat in the Tsar Alexander I's service, Poletica, after the treaty, was appointed Privy Councillor and senator. The role of Poletica is fully presented in a well-documented book by Mykhaylo Huculak, entitled When Russia was in America, published in 1971 by Mitchell Press Limited, Vancouver.

A Committee for the 150th Anniversary of the Demarcation of Canada's Western Boundary was established last year. The Right Honourable John G. Diefenbaker is the Honorary President. Among the honorary members are Premier Robert Bourassa of Quebec, Premier Peter Lougheed of Alberta, Premier Richard Hatfield of New Brunswick, Premier Alexander Campbell of Prince Edward Island, Commissioner S. M. Hodgson of the Northwest Territories, Commissioner J. Smith of the Yukon, and others. Dr. M. Huculak, the author of the aforementioned book, is president of the Executive.

This committee has achieved the following. Mayor Arthur Phillips of Vancouver has undertaken to designate three streets of that city as Canning, Nesselrode and Poletica; Mayor Peter Pollen of Victoria has offered a site in the Inner Harbour Park for the erection of a commemorative obelisk. A commemorative plaque is planned to be erected in the Parliament Buildings or the National Library in Ottawa.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE
OTTAWA

February 27, 1975

Madam,

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable Bora Laskin, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity of Deputy Governor General of Canada, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 27th day of February at 5.45 p.m. for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Madam,
Your obedient servant,
André Garneau
Brigadier General
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Reports respecting receipts and expenditures under Part V (Sick Mariners) of the Canada Shipping Act for the fiscal years ended March 31, 1973 and 1974, pursuant to section 306 of the said Act, Chapter S-9, R.S.C., 1970. Nil Return.

TERRITORIAL LANDS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Senator Goldenberg, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-20, to amend the Territorial Lands Act, and had directed that the bill be reported with the following amendment:

Page 1: In the French version strike out lines 7 and 8 and substitute therefor the following:

"24. (1) Un fonctionnaire ou employé du gouvernement du Canada, ou en relevant, ne peut, directe—"

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Goldenberg: With leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators have heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, perhaps I should explain the amendment. It is a very simple correction in the French text so that both the English and French texts say the same thing.

Senator Flynn: That is a very laudable purpose.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Goldenberg: With leave, now.

Senator Flynn: I have no objection.

Senator Denis: For once. Congratulations. You are improving.

[Translation]

Senator Côté: I do not recognize Senator Flynn since he is so agreeable today. He has changed a lot.

● (1410)

[English]

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, Senator Denis says that for once I have given consent. Perhaps I should explain, since I would not want his remark to stand unanswered on the record. This bill is not a simple one, but I am afraid it is a very trivial one and I do not want to keep it here any longer.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Wednesday next, March 5, 1975, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, you have heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, March 4, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before the question is put, I should like to give a brief outline of what we can expect for next week. When we return on Tuesday evening we should have before us Bill C-49, an act to amend the statute law relating to income tax. This is an important bill and one that will require careful consideration, both in the Senate and in the committee. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce was authorized on November 21 last to examine any bill based on the budget resolutions relating to income tax in advance of any such bill coming before the Senate. That committee has already done a great deal of work on this bill, but in view of the substantial amendments made in the other place, the legislation will require further careful study by the committee.

On Tuesday, the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will meet at 9.30 a.m. The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will meet at 11 a.m. and again at 2.30 p.m. to hear witnesses on Bill S-19, and arrangements have been made to televise the proceedings both in the morning and afternoon. The Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs will continue its study of Canada's relations with the United States at 2.30 p.m., and the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will meet at 8 p.m.

On Wednesday, the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will continue its examination of Bill C-29, an act respecting Canadian business corporations, and the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee will hold a meeting at 2 p.m. to continue its examination of Bill S-19.

On Thursday at 9.00 a.m., the Foreign Affairs Committee will hold another meeting on Canadian relations with the United States. The Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will meet at 9.30 a.m., and the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will meet at the same time. Also at 9.30, the National Finance Committee will continue with its examination of the Manpower Division of the Department of Manpower and Immigration. At 11.30 a.m., the Special Committee on Science Policy will hold an in camera meeting.

Motion agreed to.

EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY

CANADA'S CLAIM FOR COMPENSATION—QUESTION

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I wish to direct a question to the Leader of the Government.

In view of the impending deadline and the possibility of a failure of negotiations resulting in retaliatory trade measures between Canada and the European Community, would he inform the Senate as soon as possible of the status of the negotiations being carried on between Canada and the European Community in respect of the compensation demanded by Canada, under article 26.4 of GATT, in the matter of the loss of preferential access of certain Canadian commodities to the British market under the former British Preferential Tariff as it applied prior to the entry of Britain into the community. Particularly, would he inform the Senate as to the amount, in dollar terms, claimed by Canada in compensation.

I ask the question because the negotiations, understandably, are being carried on without very much information being given to Parliament, and it seems to me that it is time we had some information because of the serious results which would come about if a trade war were started between Canada and the European Community.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question is most appropriate, indeed. The matter to which Senator Grosart has referred has been the subject of intensive discussion and negotiation, as the senator pointed out, over many weeks and, indeed, months.

I shall undertake to obtain a report for the Senate. I hope to be able to present that report next week. Honourable senators are aware, of course, of the current visit to Europe of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister of Canada, and some of the matters to which the senator has referred are items which most probably will be on the agenda.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

REFERENCE OF GREEN PAPER TO COMMONS COMMITTEE— QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I should like to make reference to an inquiry directed to me by Senator Croll yesterday with respect to the matter of conflict of interest among parliamentarians. In his remarks Senator Croll made reference to the fact that the subject of conflict of interest is now under consideration by a committee of the other place. I undertook to obtain further information with respect to the attitude of that place toward this subject and toward the participation of members of this place in any kind of joint committee.

It is the opinion of the house leader in the other place that the Commons committee is dealing with the question of conflict of interest only as it applies to members of the House of Commons. Because it is not the intention of the Commons committee to consider the matter of possible conflict of interest in this chamber, they feel a joint committee on this particular subject is inappropriate at this time. I think it remains, then, for the Senate, when our schedule permits, to strike a committee to examine the question as it affects the Senate.

● (1420)

There is no inclination on the part of members of the other place to enter into any kind of joint committee arrangement to discuss the question. I am advised that it is felt on the other side that it would be inappropriate for members of this place to discuss possible conflicts of interest in the Commons, just as it would be inappropriate for members of that house to discuss alleged conflict of interest in the Senate.

CRIMINAL CODE (COMMUTATION OF DEATH SENTENCE)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Robichaud for second reading of Bill S-21, to amend the Criminal Code (commutation of death sentence).

[Translation]

Hon. Hervé J. Michaud: Honourable senators, because the deliberations now in progress in the Senate could have serious consequences, it is imperative, according to those who have until now taken part in the debate, that the discussion take place with the greatest objectivity, and consequently be devoid of any political consideration or partisanship, and that it should reflect the dictates of individual consciences.

To eliminate all glaring manifestations of violence in society, or so they claim, some have seen fit to suggest that we do away, straight off, with those who are found guilty of violent criminal acts, thus, we are told, ensuring a lasting peace to our even otherwise troubled world. Were we to give credence to such a merciless concept, then perhaps we should extend it to its extreme limits in order to finally achieve the perfect society that would guarantee each one of us a life free of burdens and useless worries.

To do away with the hardships of poverty, why not get rid of all the poor, who have become far too cumbersome? To do away with the burdens and troubles of sickness, why not get rid of all the sick whose needs seem too onerous? To do away with the many obligations the old and the lame impose upon society, why not get rid of those who cannot be self-sufficient? Obviously, to do so is repulsive to the conscience of a society such as ours and, rightly so, all its citizens would reprove such measures. Yet are not a great number of those violent individuals who live among us above all a product of our own unbalanced society?

Therefore, it would not be without failing in its serious duties that society could deny its responsibilities towards those of its members who are affected by the confusion in which we are all caught. It is everybody's responsibility to look for the causes of this new outbreak of violence. Degrading living conditions, social alienation and dismemberment, exploitation of the underprivileged by the privileged, oppression, restraint, all these form the breeding ground for the frustration which often leads to the outburst of violent tragedies for which each one of us, together with society, is responsible.

If there is physical violence, there is also moral violence. Is it not everybody's duty to be more merciful, more compassionate toward the victims of social injustice? Moreover, how could we excuse any kind of intransigence toward the authors of these violent actions when we know that very often it is on the screen of our public television corporation that they have learned their trade. We are aware of the horrors of the films that are shown, apparently with the consent of responsible authorities, before the eyes of both young and adults. They show in the tiniest detail the most horrible crimes, despite, for that matter, the repeated protests of numerous citizens whose consciences are offended. Do we want to curb excessive violence in our society? Let us then begin by fighting its causes.

Those who believe in capital punishment, and quite sincerely so I agree, will try to convince the rest of us that such a brutal measure will have a deterrent effect on those who might be tempted to commit murder.

And yet, we have under our eyes a perfect example of a society in which the death penalty is a rule that applies to all its members. It is the organized crime society. Woe to those who interfere with the progress or counteract the efforts of the underworld in carrying out its harmful schemes: police officers, unwilling witnesses, rivals of today who no later than yesterday were partners—every one of them will be mercilessly slaughtered. He who kills today will be shot tomorrow. Such is the death penalty rule in its broadest sense. But the number of criminals keeps growing in spite of those dangers which they constantly have to face. There is no need reminding them of those dangers; their insensitive minds will not listen to any warning. They will give up their lives rather than their schemes, as we can learn everyday from their accomplishments. Such is the deterrent effect of the death penalty, as applied in their own personal way, on crime addicts.

When introducing this bill, the mover said, as reported in the Senate Hansard of February 13, and I quote:

Honourable senators will have noticed the number of suicides.

He was speaking of suspects arrested for murder.

When society refused to play its role, some of the accused committed suicide because they had accepted the consequences of their act at the time they committed the murder.

Then what about the deterrent effect of the death penalty on those who committed suicide in those circumstances if they did not fear to take their own lives by their own hands and of their own volition?

According to the figures supplied by the mover of this bill, eight suspects arrested for the murder of policemen since 1967 in Canada were convicted by the courts and given the death sentence—eight people, over a period of eight years, whose sentences were later commuted.

Honourable senators, I ask—how many murders were committed within the framework of organized crime where, as we have seen, the law of capital punishment is the only valid one? How many murders were committed, not in the last eight years but in the last eight weeks, in Canada?

For all those reasons, honourable senators, I am convinced that capital punishment does not have the deterrent effect that some of us, as well as people in other parts of this country, would like to think. The Government of Canada, for its part, has taken on that issue a position that is based on clemency rather than merely punitive grounds. The rehabilitation of inmates becomes the priority of the government. The government may want to take a harder stand towards paroles for inmates; that is one thing, but I cannot accept that the royal prerogative as specifically set out in the Statutes of Canada should be impaired.

PUBLISHING INDUSTRY

NEWSPAPER ARTICLE AND CORRESPONDENCE—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Senator Davey: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. Recently I wrote a letter to the editor of the Toronto Globe and Mail in response to an editorial which appeared in that newspaper on Monday, February 24, entitled "Whittling Down a Freedom." Most but not all—I repeat, most but not all—of my letter appeared in the Globe and Mail on Saturday, March 1. It may be helpful if I took a moment to read my letter to the editor, which is more or less self-explanatory. The following is part of the letter which I sent to the editor:

Because The Globe and Mail has well earned its reputation of having the best written and most perceptive editorial page in the country, I was more than a little surprised to read your recent editorial "Whittling Down a Freedom" (Feb. 24). You accuse the government of censorship because after more than 30 years of inactivity it has had the courage to tackle head-on the unfair competition of the so-called Canadian editions of Time and Reader's Digest with the Canadian periodical industry.

Although the Canadian managers of both these publications have tried hard to foster the impression that their Canadian readers will be deprived of their magazines, in fact, they will be no more excluded than are Newsweek, Playboy or Sexology Today. Time will still be able to carry as much Canadian news as it thinks worth printing.

The only restriction proposed is directed against a form of commercial dumping which both the O'Leary Commission and the Senate Committee I headed found to be unique in all the world. This is the dumping of costly editorial material, virtually free of charge, as a means of selling advertising space and depriving Canadian magazines of about half their potential revenues.

To compare this, as you do, to the government moving in to regulate how much New York Times wire service copy should be carried in the pages of the Globe is simply absurd. The two situations have nothing in common. A truer comparison would be if The Wall Street Journal had decided to launch a daily to compete with your Report on Business, threw in four or five Canadian stories, but took away half your advertising. I wonder if your editorial would have taken a different line in such circumstances.

When our Senate Report on the Mass Media was published, you supported our recommendation that Time and the Digest be deprived of their special privileges. Now, you have made a 180-degree switch.

Curiously, honourable senators, that version of my letter, which appeared in last Saturday's edition of the Globe and Mail, was followed by an editorial note in italics which was, in fact, longer than my letter to the Globe and Mail. The final sentence of my letter was omitted completely.

Incidentally, it might be worth pointing out that by some coincidence the editorial cartoon which appeared in the Globe and Mail of the same date depicted two citizens standing in front of the Peace Tower with, apparently, some dirty laundry hanging out to dry, and the caption was: "We seem to be in a period of letting it all hang out."

I share that exact sentiment, and I propose, for just a moment or two, to let it all hang out. The final sentence of my letter which the Globe and Mail omitted is as follows:

Perhaps your about-face on the issue may have some connection with the arrival of Globe publisher Brigadier Richard Malone, who announced earlier this week that FP Publications had abandoned its attempt to negotiate a deal with Time.

Honourable senators, my authority for that assertion is impeccable. It is the Globe and Mail's own Report on Business. That story appeared in the Globe and Mail's Report on Business on Wednesday, February 26, the editorial having appeared on February 24 and my letter having been published on Saturday, March 1.

It is an Ottawa by-line by Jeff Carruthers, the headline of which is: "FP abandons plans for Time share." Let me read it in part:

FP Publications Ltd. of Toronto has abandoned any plan to acquire an interest in the Canadian edition of Time magazine and perhaps use Time as the basis for a new weekly news magazine with greater Canadian content.

R. S. Malone, president of FP Publications, said the federal government's latest proposals concerning the content required for Time to remain classified as a Canadian publication under the Income Tax Act has killed FP's interest in the news magazine.

"It's a dead issue as far as we are concerned," said Mr. Malone, who is also publisher of the Globe and Mail.

FP had preliminary discussions with Time officials last year on the subject, but no such negotiations or discussions are under way or contemplated, Mr. Malone said.

"The terms just aren't acceptable. The government would be controlling the news content and telling people what they can read in the magazine, something that would not bode well for the Canadian publishing industry generally," he said.

The latest government proposals, which would be in addition to the previously proposed 75 per cent Canadian ownership, "will destroy the magazine (Time Canada)" he said.

Honourable senators, let me make it clear that I have no quarrel with either Time or the Globe and Mail negotiating a deal. That, of course, is their respective business. But surely the Globe and Mail, unwilling or unable in its editorial to declare its own conflict of interest on this proposed magazine legislation, should have published my letter in its entirety. There are perhaps two conclusions. A senator who is aggrieved is indeed fortunate. He can rise in this place and air his complaint. But what of ordinary Canadian citizens in comparable situations? In the case of the Globe and Mail they cannot even appeal to the Ontario Press Council because, of course, the Globe and Mail does not belong to the Press Council. The Globe and Mail has opposed, from the beginning, the very concept of a press council.

Finally, it may be time in this country for us to require most newspapers to publish on their editorial page or masthead the names of their real owners. The Globe and Mail is, of course, an FP publication, whose publisher, R. S. Malone, is also president of FP Publications. But neither this fact nor, indeed, the fact that the Globe and Mail is an FP publication is even mentioned on the Globe and Mail editorial page masthead.

FEEDS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Senator Argue, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, to which was referred Bill S-10, to amend the Feeds Act, presented the following report:

Tuesday, March 4, 1975.

The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture to which was referred Bill S-10, intituled: "An Act to amend the Feeds Act" has, in obedience to the order of reference of Wednesday, October 23, 1974, examined the said bill and now reports the same with the following amendment:

1. (a) Page 3: Strike out line 1 and substitute therefor the following:

"10. (1) Every natural person who contravenes"

"(1.1) Every corporation that contravenes any provision of this Act or the Regulations is guilty of an indictable offence.

(1.2) Where a corporation has been convicted of an offence under this Act, the chief executive officer of the corporation shall be presumed to be guilty of an offence under subsection 10(1) unless he establishes that the offence was committed without his knowledge or consent and that he exercised all due diligence to prevent its commission."

In addition, your committee desires to make three recommendations arising out of its discussion of the bill and the briefs presented to it.

First, the question of whether dogs and cats should be defined as livestock for the purpose of regulating the manufacture of pet foods was raised by witnesses appearing before the committee. The Canadian Feed Manufacturers' Association, which represents many pet food manufacturers, requested that the manufacture of pet foods be regulated under the Feeds Act. The Pet Food Manufacturers Association of Canada expressed the opposite in its written brief.

Two groups not associated with the manufacturing of pet foods, the Consumers' Association of Canada and the Canadian Veterinary Medical Association, expressed their concern about the quality of the product. It was brought to the committee's attention that there are no required nutritional standards for pet food in Canada and that these products can contain dead or diseased animals or protein and other nutrients in non-digestible form. These products are only required to be correctly packaged, labelled, weighed and to be free of bacteria.

The pet food industry is of considerable size; gross sales in 1974 were over one hundred and twenty million dollars and growing at 10-20 per cent per annum. Pet owners are spending considerable sums on products, the nutritional quality of which your committee believes to be irregular.

After considering the evidence presented to it, your committee concluded that the problem of the nutritional quality of pet foods warranted further study. Your committee therefore recommends:

That the government give serious consideration to regulation of the nutritional quality of pet foods for the protection of the consumers of these products, their owners, and the health of the population in general.

Second, your committee investigated the question of whether the additional responsibilities that the Department of Agriculture will have as a result of Bill S-10 would decrease the capability of that department to carry out its current responsibilities under the Feeds Act. These additional duties include the inspection of "integrated feed manufacturing-livestock production" enterprises and of "customer formulae" mobile feed mills. The department could not supply information on the number of units of each type but they are significant. The mobile feed mills will be a special problem for inspectors simply because they are mobile.

The ability of the department to fulfill its current responsibilities appears to be stretched to the limit, with the result that inspections of manufacturers are infrequent. Each feed manufacturing location is inspected on an average of only ten times per annum. However, these infrequent inspections uncover a significant number of violations of the Act and regulations—4,650 in 1972-73 and 4,438 in 1973-74.

Your committee is concerned that the purchasers of livestock feeds are not now receiving the protection they expect from the Act and that with the increase in duties the level of protection will decline. Your committee has decided that the resolution of this problem can be initiated by two actions on its part. It has amended clause 3 of the bill to encourage corporations to be more concerned about their manufacturing processes and your committee, as a second step, recommends:

That the government review the effectiveness of the feed inspection program and give serious consideration to increasing the inspection and technical staff in light of the new and more difficult responsibilities being given the Department of Agriculture.

Third, as the legislation extends the provisions of the Feeds Act to cover all feed manufactured in Canada, it will include many more manufacturers under the regulations. These newly regulated manufacturers will be, for the most part, farmers of both large and small scale. Your committee and some of the witnesses that appeared before it, particularly the Consumers' Association of Canada, are concerned about the control of ingredients, especially medicaments, that are added to livestock feed, at both the farm and commercial levels.

These ingredients, which can have a considerable impact on animal and human health and on the environment, are regulated by both the Feeds Act and the Food and Drugs Act. However, your committee is concerned that the technical information about these ingredients may not be reaching the farmer. Your committee therefore recommends:

That the government, through the Department of Agriculture and in cooperation with the provincial departments of agriculture, undertake a campaign to disseminate in a suitable form the technical information concerning the use of these ingredients, especially medicaments.

Your committee believes that such a campaign would benefit producers and consumers.

Your committee met seven times to consider this bill and heard the following witnesses:

Mr. C. R. Phillips,
Director General,
Production and Marketing Branch,
Department of Agriculture.
Mr. C. H. Jefferson,
Director, Plant Products Division,
Department of Agriculture.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

CONNAUGHT LABORATORIES LTD.—QUESTION

Senator Sullivan: Honourable senators, I have three related questions for the Acting Leader of the Government arising out of the extraordinary statement by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, Mr. Lalonde, last Friday, indicating that he was satisfied with the performance and policies of the Connaught Laboratories of Toronto since they were taken over by the Canadian Development Corporation. I ask them as one who was for some years prior to that the medical member of the Connaught Committee of the Board of Governors of the University of Toronto, and who has for some time shared with others great concern about the laboratories under this management.

I ask, therefore, the following questions:

1. Does the government approve of the proposed sale of land by Connaught Laboratories Ltd. for a housing development?

2. Is the government aware that the proposed residential development would be close to isolation areas where many dangerous micro-organisms and infected animals are kept for the production and testing of vaccines and antisera?

3. Does the government realize that natural fears of local residents, even if not entirely justified, could embarrass the laboratories and might even force them to close?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, considering the complex nature of those questions and the necessity for obtaining information from outside the precincts of this house, may I take this question as notice and endeavour to obtain the information as soon as possible?

Senator Sullivan: Thank you.

CRIMINAL CODE (COMMUTATION OF DEATH SENTENCE)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 27, the debate on the motion of Senator Robichaud for second reading of Bill S-21, to amend the Criminal Code (commutation of death sentence).

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I shall take only a few minutes to express my views on the bill on the commuting of the death penalty by the Governor in Council which was introduced by Senator Robichaud. I have followed with interest the speeches which have been made on this subject. I understand that Senator Robichaud introduced his bill dispassionately and I am convinced of it because at that time we were aware of the terrible tragedy which had occurred in Moncton when two policemen were shot while on duty. But Senator Robichaud told us that this was not why he wanted to introduce this bill and, as a parliamentarian, I must accept his statement. I must say that the purpose of his bill is certainly to call the attention of Parliament to an extremely important problem, that of commuting the death penalty, but it may aim at satisfying also the Canadian public who, in general, is starting to worry about the countless number of crimes committed throughout the country. I believe that this is not the time to start all over again the debate on the death penalty. In my opinion, that debate is closed.

First of all, in 1967, if my memory serves me right, the Canadian Parliament voted a five-year moratorium on the death penalty. According to this moratorium, the capital penalty was reserved for the killers of policemen and prison guards.

In 1972, this moratorium was extended for another five years, which will bring us to 1977.

In my opinion, then, although we may make speeches for or against capital punishment, I think it would be a sterile debate, because in itself this bill does not intend to change the present legislation, which was adopted by Parliament in 1972, but has only one purpose: to limit the royal prerogative of the Governor General in Council. Therefore, I shall not linger on the pros and cons of capital punishment. I repeat that this question has been settled. We could make long speeches saying that we are opposed to capital punishment or that all murderers and all those convicted of capital murder should be put to death.

● (2040)

Again, I think that such is not basically the point of this debate. The point of this discussion and of this bill is whether we can reduce through legislation the royal prerogative of the Governor General in Council.

I submit, honourable senators, that this is a legal and constitutional matter of extreme importance. We know that historically Parliament wished and very often attempted to reduce the power of pardon and the prerogatives of the Governor General in Council. The main reason given then for the control by the legislator over the prerogative of the executive was that Parliament is the supreme authority and is above all other institutions.

So, it is true then—and I am not telling you anything new—that, in the course of our Canadian history, we have sometimes seen prerogatives of the executive limited and withdrawn by Parliament, by the legislative authority. With this argument, I am referring directly to the bill before us, and I have serious doubts about the constitutionality and legality of this bill, considering its terms.

Looking at the bill, here is what clause 1 says:

1. The Criminal Code is amended by repealing subsection 684(1) of the said Act and substituting therefor:

"684. (1) Notwithstanding anything in this Act or in any other law or prerogative,—

And I repeat.

—or in any other law or prerogative, the Governor in Council may commute a sentence of death to imprisonment in the penitentiary for life, or for any term of years not less than two years, or to imprisonment in a prison other than a penitentiary for a period of less than two years, where, but only where,

(a) the jury or the judge, if so authorized by law, has made a recommendation that the accused be granted clemency, or

(b) the jury has reported to the judge that it was unable to agree upon a recommendation either in favour of clemency or against it."

This, in fact, is the purpose of the bill. The bill is to limit the royal prerogative of the Governor in Council empowering him to commute a death sentence into imprisonment for life. But, in order to follow this argument, I think we should look at section 684 of the Criminal Code, the section to which the sponsor of the bill referred and which amends subsection 684(1). That subsection presently reads as follows:

The Governor in Council may commute a sentence of death to imprisonment in the penitentiary for life, or for any term of years not less than two years, or to imprisonment in a prison other than a penitentiary for a period of less than two years.

Section 684 of the Criminal Code is the section which the sponsor of the bill claims the Governor in Council must refer to when he decides to commute a death sentence to imprisonment for life. The mover of the bill refers only to one section of the act. He states that section 684 of the Criminal Code, which I have just quoted, is abrogated on two occasions: when the jury or the judge, who are legally authorized to do so, recommend clemency, or when the jury reports to the judge that it could not agree on a recommendation for or against clemency.

So, according to him—and I do not say this to oppose the bill but because I have doubts as to its constitutionality, its legality—the Governor in Council commutes the death penalty to life imprisonment pursuant to section 684 only. There is also section 686 of the Criminal Code.

This is where I find it difficult to follow the mover of the bill in his presentation. I brought up this question when Senator Hicks made his speech on the matter, last week, I believe. Senator Prowse as well as Senator Bélisle spoke about it in their presentations to the Senate; still, to my mind, the matter is not clear enough. That is why, tonight, I take the liberty to quote section 686 of the Criminal Code, which says:

Nothing in this Act in any manner limits or affects Her Majesty's royal prerogative of mercy.

Thus, if the sponsor of the bill, in proposing it, suggests—and it might be his point—that the Governor in Council, when he commutes a death sentence to imprisonment for life, does so pursuant to section 684—if this is true, then section 686 should also be amended. If section 684 remains as amended under this bill, and if section 686 is maintained in the statute books, I think section 686 should also be amended in this bill, because—if I am not mistaken, since I am not an expert in constitutional law—reference should also be made to the effect that it abrogates section 684 and 686. Now, the sponsor of the bill might say, as Senator Connolly did, that there was a difference between the royal prerogative on the appeal of mercy, given by letters of appointment from the Governor General, and the one of commutation of the death penalty, given by the Governor in Council under section 684. I do not see any difference. I know that the royal prerogative is given by letters of appointment from the Governor in Council; I know that, but there is no distinction in the code.

In his desire to amend section 684, is the sponsor of the bill pursuing the aim of the bill he introduced?

Would it not have been better to amend also section 684, as well as section 686, since I think that section 686 is extremely clear:

Nothing in this Act in any manner limits or affects Her Majesty's royal prerogative of mercy.

The royal prerogative still appears in this section. Senator Connolly maintains that this is not the section dealing with the royal prerogative but that it is section 686 that defines the royal prerogative. However, in his bill, Senator Robichaud deals precisely with the royal prerogative. He did not realise that the royal prerogative was included in section 686 of the code, when he said:

Notwithstanding anything in this Act or in any other law or prerogative.

Taking the word "prerogative" in its context, I believe the prerogative has to do with the royal prerogative. If it is the royal prerogative that is to be limited, we should amend section 686, because I believe section 686 precisely grants the Governor in Council the royal prerogative, as provided for in section 686, which reads as follows:

Nothing in this Act in any manner limits or affects Her Majesty's royal prerogative of mercy.

Well, obviously, I have doubts, as I said, about the constitutional and legal aspects. Knowing whether I am right or not is no concern of mine, I may be completely wrong. Therefore, I think it would be extremely important, once the debate on second reading of this bill is over, to refer this bill to the Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to get legal advice from Department of Justice officials, who might explain some apparent inconsistencies which I suggest can be found in this bill, as I just mentioned.

● (2050)

Finally, from a practical point of view, is it a good thing to introduce a bill to restrict the royal prerogative of the Governor General in Council? And more specifically, with respect to commuting death sentences to life imprisonment when dealing with the murders of prison guards and police officers, would these be the only two cases involved? With respect to every other kind of capital murder mentioned in the Criminal Code, our legislators have already decided that the sentence would be life imprisonment. The only exception is for police officers and prison wardens; and I still wonder: is Parliament right in restricting now the prerogative of the Governor in Council through legislation?

Let me say, honourable senators, that I do not think so. Here is why: I have frequently acted in the past on behalf of the accused in a criminal case. I have acted on behalf of alleged capital murderers. Fortunately, we were lucky with the outcome of those trials.

Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière): Did you act on behalf of the Crown or did you put the case for the defence?

Senator Asselin: I was the defence lawyer, senator.

Senator Langlois: Your clients were lucky.

Senator Asselin: Thank you. Now, I said I had doubts because what always worried me when I was a counsel for the defence, for I was almost always a counsel for the defence when I used to practise law—what always worried me was the possibility of a miscarriage of justice. People who have had the experience of criminal courts, who have been defence counsel for people who were accused of such heinous crimes as murder, capital murder, knew that there was no remission, that the judge had to hand down a death sentence if the accused was found guilty, and that is what always haunted defence counsel—and if you read speeches made in the House of Commons and the Senate in 1967 and 1972, you will find that the possibility of a miscarriage of justice was always suggested.

It is my contention that the royal prerogative prevents a miscarriage of justice in the last resort.

Some will say that the accused was tried before his twelve peers, and then appealed to the Court of Appeal in his province; that he also went to the Supreme Court. That is all very well, but so many things happen in a trial that everything cannot be controlled. Miscarriages of justice can happen, not voluntarily but rather indirectly.

If, for instance, the defence counsel is not very experienced, either a young lawyer or one who never argued before a criminal court, he might let objectionable evidence go before the jury, resulting in the accused being found guilty.

This also applies in the case where a counsel is not able to fully test the credibility of witnesses giving evidence in a trial by jury, which I submit is not possible in 1975. Sometimes it comes out several years after the trial that someone did not tell the truth, and that had he done so possibly the outcome of the trial might have been quite different.

The judge in a trial by jury does not interfere in the case put either for the Crown or for the accused. He has no role in the presentation of evidence by the Crown or the defence. He has, however, the right to inform the jury, in his address, of his interpretation of the facts brought forward by the Crown or by the defence.

Let us imagine, honourable senators, the consequences of an important point being forgotten by the defence. It may be fatal to the accused's case and lead to his being found guilty.

I submit there are so many intangibles that it would not be wise, in my view, to remove the royal prerogative from the Governor General in Council, especially when we realize that after all appeals by the accused, up to the Court of Appeals and the Supreme Court, there remain people who had no part in the trial process but who will be called upon to render judgment, since a file will be sent to the Solicitor General, with copies going to each minister of the Crown.

Each minister is then briefed—as they say in English—by the legal advisers of the Department of Justice. In addition, an inter-ministerial committee is set up to study the trial, to review the whole thing. It is only after that review that the Governor in Council reaches a decision. I could say, without being mistaken—

Senator Lamontagne: Is the procedure the senator has just described fairly recent?

Senator Asselin: No; when I was in the cabinet, that was the procedure. I do not know whether it was used in your time; perhaps not. It may be that you were not a member of the inter-ministerial committee which had to present the case to the cabinet. But, as far as I know, that is how things were done. I am not revealing cabinet secrets, but that is how it must be done. I do not know whether you were a member of the interministerial committee which made the recommendation to the cabinet, but that is what I know about the matter and I have no more to add. However, I do feel that there is some solace for the condemned to death in having as objective a review of his case by people who took no part in the trial. Those people and the legal advisers of the Department of Justice must make an objective study of the case before making their recommendations to the cabinet. I feel this is a protection against miscarriages of justice. Such is my view. Of course, I am not saying that I will vote against the bill, but before its third reading I hope it will be referred to the proper Senate committee where my doubts as to its constitutionality and its legality will be cleared up. Also on third reading, perhaps we could consider more thoroughly the case of a miscarriage of justice which in my opinion is well protected whenever the royal prerogative of the Governor in Council, who can commute a death penalty to life imprisonment, is maintained.

Senator Choquette: I would like to ask a question. In the bill under consideration, there is a reference to the recommendation of clemency made by the jury when the accused is found guilty. Is there a clause in the Criminal Code which provides that in his charge or instructions to the jury the judge must say that if the accused is found guilty they can return with a recommendation of clemency, but such recommendation must be unanimous. I have never heard of such an instruction which a judge must give to a jury, and if there is no such provision we would have to draw up another amendment.

Senator Asselin: Is the question directed to me? I think the jury must come back before the judge after having considered its verdict and must have agreed unanimously on the sentence; but as far as clemency is concerned, I do not know of any pertinent provision in the law.

• (2100)

[English]

Senator Prowse: Honourable senators, if I may be permitted to interject, I believe I can answer the question.

Senator Choquette: Go ahead.

Senator Prowse: The answer is, if the jury comes into court with no recommendation, the judge must then ask them if they have considered it. If the jury has not considered it, then the judge instructs them to retire and consider it and then return and let him know what their opinion, if any, is.

Senator Choquette: Consider what?

Senator Prowse: Whether they recommend clemency or mercy.

Senator Choquette: I have never heard of it.

Senator Prowse: Well, there is a provision in the code for it.

Senator Choquette: And I am asking where that provision is in the code?

Senator Prowse: There is a provision in the code under which the judge may ask the jury to consider the question of clemency, if they have brought in a verdict without having done so.

Senator Choquette: Well, I hope you can tell us tomorrow what that section is.

Senator Prowse: I can get it for you tonight, if you want it.

[Translation]

Hon. Sarto Fournier: Honourable senators, I had not intended to speak on this matter tonight, but the honourable senator who preceded me sort of inspired me and I feel compelled to say a few words.

He told us about the obsession of a lawyer acting as counsel for someone accused of murder. In all the time I practised law, I did not have the privilege of defending many persons accused of murder, but I had one such case. I must admit that the obsession of the lawyer acting as counsel for a person accused of murder is the miscarriage of justice. The honourable senator and myself have never talked about our cases. We have never exchanged views on the subject. He has practised law in the area of Quebec City and I in another area for awhile, and the obsession he described as his own and that of other lawyers is exactly what I felt. I was afraid. I was afraid the members of the jury would make a mistake that would leave no choice to the judge. However, the situation today is entirely different. Even if the accused is poor, destitute, not only is an appeal possible but it is automatically heard by five judges. From one appeal to the next, the case can reach the Cabinet.

If I may, honourable senators, I should like to relate the experience of a Solicitor General who had to decide on a case of miscarriage of justice. The former Solicitor General concerned is the Honourable Joseph Jean.

We were both practising in the same lawyers' office in Montreal. He told me that while he was Solicitor General, he had to report once to the Cabinet on a case of a death sentence. The defendant had killed somebody with an axe. He explained that he had used the axe to defend himself and that he had made the axe turn in the air and, at some moment, the sharp part—I do not know if that is the right word, but in my region, the Beauce, we called it the sharp part of the axe—

Senator Langlois: The head.

Senator Fournier: The head of the axe broke loose from the handle and hit the victim on the forehead and killed him.

So, during the hearing of the case, the head of the axe—thank you for correcting me—was brought in, with the same handle and it did not work. The head would not come off the handle. So, the death sentence was maintained. But, when the case came to the Cabinet, the Solicitor General, the Honourable Joseph Jean, had the axe, the head and the handle, brought to his office, and it worked, because when the instrument was kept in the basement of the Court, where it was humid, the wooden part had enlarged and could not come off. But after the trial it had been placed in a dry room and it worked, I could not say perfectly, but according to the story of the defendant. His sentence was then not only commuted, but he was released immediately because his defence made sense.

So, there are things like that which, by themselves, may not tell the truth, reflect the truth, just as there are people who, when speaking, when bearing witness, even with the greatest honesty in the world, may be wrong and poles apart from the truth, while believing they are telling it. They are honest. It is not a lie, but it is not the truth either. So, there is a way out. When the death penalty is to be enforced, there must not subsist any possible doubt. That is theory. But, in practice, it is not so easy, and that is why miscarriages of justice might have taken place.

As the honourable senator pointed out, the bill before us does not deal precisely with capital punishment. Should we or should we not enforce capital punishment? However, I hope I will not be out of order expressing my views on capital punishment. With all the necessary precautions, justice can only be made by reason of the rights and powers of everyone. I am against capital punishment, beginning with the one murderers inflict upon their victims. I am against it. In order that justice be fair, punishment must be in proportion to the offence and when someone kills someone else, in a ruthless, unlawful, cold-blooded and premeditated way by committing a crime and foreseeing he could kill, using a firearm or any other weapon, when he is seen, caught, when the crime is ascertained de visu, there is absolutely no doubt.

● (2110)

Justice then calls for the penalty to be proportionate to the crime. Otherwise, there is no justice. Therefore, he who kills must know in advance that, in these circumstances, he will himself lose his right to live. He will not be taken by surprise, he will know it in advance, knowing that he was killing to commit a theft or something else. This does not include accidental crimes, but premeditated crimes, crimes of jealousy. For instance, two men are fighting in a tavern and one of them punches one of his friends on the jaw. His friend falls on the cement floor, fractures his skull and dies an hour later; there is no murder involved, but involuntary homicide. An accident in a hospital or on the road is not murder. But we should not have to live with murderers. Society should not be penalized by allowing murderers to live until they can escape from prison to kill two, three, four, five, six or a dozen more people.

These people are not needed. They are professional killers. If we have to protect them and treat them fairly, we must also treat society fairly. But once again, we can never be too careful. We must take every precaution. A human being is involved. The capital penalty is involved, and before ordering it we must be absolutely sure that it is justified. And when a man deserves it, when he has become an undesirable element in society, when he is a threat to someone else, I think we should take away his life. In any case, he is doomed to die. It is a question of protecting other people by having him die a little sooner. That is the only difference.

In my mind—I would not like to repeat myself and I apologize as I had not intended to speak so long—I still think that the obsession of a miscarriage of justice really exists as you have said, honourable senators. It exists and I did realize it when once I had to defend a man charged with murder. I was obsessed.

Senator Bourget: Did you save him?

Senator Fournier: He did not even need me, being so innocent. I was just there to watch over the members of the jury and the court in order to prevent any judicial error. I thank you for your question. When a speaker is asked a question at the end of his speech it is because the questioner has listened to him from the beginning to the end and because he has shown interest.

● (2120)

[English]

Senator Choquette: Honourable senators, to the credit of Senator Prowse, I must say that he has found the section in question, and he was right. It is section 670(1)—a new section, apparently—and this is why the sponsor has worded his bill the way he has.

I should like to put section 670(1) of the Criminal Code on the record, because I think it should be there:

Where a jury finds an accused guilty of an offence punishable by death, the judge who presides at the trial shall, before discharging the jury, put to them the following question:

You have found the accused guilty and the law requires that I now pronounce sentence of death against him (or "the law provides that he may be sentenced to death", as the case may be). Do you wish to make any recommendation as to whether or not he should be granted clemency? You are not required to make any recommendation but if you do make a recommendation either in favour of clemency or against it, your recommendation will be included in the report that I am required to make of this case to the Solicitor General of Canada and will be given due consideration.

With regard to the question of unanimity, there is subsection (2):

If the jury reports to the judge that it is unable to agree upon a recommendation, either in favour of clemency or against it, and the judge is satisfied that further retention of the jury would not lead to agreement, he shall ascertain the number of jurors who are in favour of making a recommendation for clemency and the number of jurors who are against making such a recommendation and shall include such information in the report required by subsection 671(1).

So, it can be seen that there is no mention of unanimity.

Senator Langlois: Does it say it should be done by polling the jurors?

Senator Choquette: No.

Senator Langlois: But I imagine the judge would have to poll the jurors.

Senator Choquette: That would seem to be the only way to ascertain the situation. In my view, the bill should go to a committee on the strength of this.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, if no other honourable senator wishes to speak at this time, I move, on behalf of Senator McElman, that the debate be adjourned.

On motion of Senator Langlois, for Senator McElman, debate adjourned.

AGRICULTURE

COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of Senator Duggan be added to the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I find it difficult to say what I should say at this time, namely, that the contents of this motion were discussed between the Whip and myself a few days ago and I am surprised that this particular motion is being put forward. In private conversations, Senator McDonald expressed a wish to be on this committee. Furthermore, Senator Joe Greene, a former federal Minister of Agriculture, has been active in committee but not as a member. I have no objection to Senator Duggan, obviously. I am sure that he would play a useful role, but because of these conversations I think the motion should have been presented after agreement and not in this way.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, normally the Whip moves such motions. I am doing this under his instructions.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, you have heard the motion, which cannot be proceeded with without unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, if the motion requires unanimous consent, I do not give it at this time, and it will be subject to further discussion.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: There being no unanimous consent, the question cannot be put.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I move that the report be adopted now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Argue, seconded by the Honourable Senator O'Leary, that this report be now adopted. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion? Senator Argue?

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the message from the House of Commons requesting that a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons be appointed to consider the Green Paper on immigration policy.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bourget, P.C.:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament to consider the Green Paper on immigration policy tabled by the Leader of the Government in the Senate on February 4, 1975; and to invite the views of the public on the issues raised therein;

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, before the question is put, may I say that the Deputy Leader of the Government should have mentioned it was by agreement that we dispensed with most of the items on the Orders of the Day. It was to allow two committees to sit this afternoon.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I was about to make that announcement. The two committees scheduled to sit are the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee and the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, March 6, 1975

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Langlois tabled:

Report of operations under the Export and Import Permits Act for the year ended December 31, 1974, pursuant to section 26 of the said Act, Chapter E-17, R.S.C., 1970.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday, March 10, 1975, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before the question is put, I should like to say that in moving that we adjourn until Monday next at 8 o'clock in the evening, I have taken into consideration the number of bills now on the Order Paper for second reading and, in particular, Bill C-49, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, as well as the large number of committee meetings already scheduled for next week.

On Monday night we will first deal with second reading of Bill C-49, and then with such other items on the Order Paper as time permits. I think it will be necessary, although it is not quite settled at present, for the Senate to sit on Friday of next week to deal with legislation now before us, as well as with bills that come to us from the other place.

On Tuesday, the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will meet at 11 a.m. to hear witnesses on Bill S-19, to amend the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Criminal Code. The Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will meet at the same hour. The Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will hold a meeting at 8 p.m. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has a meeting scheduled for 9:30 a.m. on the same day.

On Wednesday, the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee has a meeting set down for 9:30 a.m., when it will commence its consideration of Bill C-49—

Senator Flynn: Oh!

Senator Langlois: —should the bill have been referred to it. I said that in time.

The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications will meet at 9:30 a.m. to hear witnesses on Bill S-5, the Aircraft Registry Act. Also at 9:30 a.m. the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance will examine supplementary estimates (D) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1975.

On Thursday, the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee has a meeting set down for 9:30 a.m., and at the same time the National Finance Committee will meet to continue its examination of the Manpower Division of the Department of Manpower and Immigration. The Regulations and other Statutory Instruments Committee will meet at 11 a.m., and the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will meet at 3:30 p.m.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I would suggest that next time Senator Langlois has a problem like the one he had with regard to Bill C-49, he should start the phrase, "If the Senate passes the bill, the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will be ready to start consideration thereof," rather than say that the committee will consider the bill—

Senator Langlois: If.

Senator Flynn: Yes. I would assert that "if" is too suggestive and perhaps even imperative.

Senator Langlois: I just wanted to give my friend a chance to say something.

Senator Flynn: You always do and I am always most obliged.

Senator Quart: You never miss.

Motion agreed to.

FEEDS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator Argue moved the third reading of Bill S-10, to amend the Feeds Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES REPRESENTATION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. J. Harper Prowse moved the second reading of Bill C-51, to increase the representation of the Northwest Territories in the House of Commons and to establish a commission to readjust the electoral boundaries of the Northwest Territories.

He said: Honourable senators, my remarks with respect to this bill will be brief. I believe you are aware that at the present time there is only one member of Parliament in the House of Commons representing the Northwest Territories. That one man represents a territory of one and a third million square miles, a territory comprising approximately one third of the area occupied by the Dominion of Canada. Naturally, because of the distances which have to be travelled by this representative, and often because of the complete difference in interest as between those who live in the eastern Arctic region and those who live in the western Arctic region, this single representation is tantamount to a farcical tokenism. How could any one member be expected to give, or to be able to give, the kind of representation which is necessary to such a vast and diversified area, the interests of the population of which are also diverse? Because of proposals to develop what are apparently substantial natural resources in that area, it is considered desirable that there should be two electoral districts established and that provision should be made for two members of Parliament to represent that area which is now represented, with great difficulty, by one member.

● (1410)

In brief, that is the purpose of the bill. But once you accept the principle of having two members and two electoral districts, it then becomes necessary to delineate the boundaries of those electoral districts. Here it is proposed that we adopt the procedure followed by the rest of the country and establish an independent commission. In this case, the Chief Justice of the Court of Appeal for the Northwest Territories, who in practice is the Chief Justice of the Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of Alberta, will appoint the chairman of the commission responsible for the establishment of those boundaries, and the commission will proceed to function in exactly the same way as the other electoral boundaries commissions in Canada.

I do not think it is necessary to discuss all the points raised in the past when attempts have been made to do this. The population of the Northwest Territories, as of the 1971 census, was estimated to be in excess of 38,000. Today it would be between 40,000 to 50,000, and before we get around to another election, particularly if some of the things that are forecast take place, the population may be in excess of 50,000.

Following the principle of giving to these areas greater control over their local government, and consequently a better opportunity of seeing to it that they are properly represented in the central government, which has so much to do with their affairs at the present time, it is the purpose of the bill to provide the kind of legislation that will achieve this result.

Honourable senators, I think that is all I need say by way of explanation at this time. If any senator has any questions, I am not sure that I have all the answers but I have a black book here which purports to have a large number of answers. An attempt has been made to provide me with information, and I would be happy to attempt to answer any questions.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the sponsor of the bill a question? Would he be prepared to lend the black book?

Senator Prowse: I would be prepared even to lend you the black book. Having read it carefully I am sure there is nothing in it that would cause any of us, or anyone associated with the preparation of the book, any embarrassment not even those in the government who seem to be particularly prone to being embarrassed.

Senator Grosart: Unless there are any questions, honourable senators, I move that the debate be adjourned.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald moved the second reading of Bill C-10, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

He said: Honourable senators, before dealing with the purpose of this bill, I should like to take a moment to review the Prairie Grain Advance Payments legislation, which was placed on the statute books in November of 1957, some 18 years ago. It came into being after many years of agitation on the part of Prairie farmers for some system of advance payments in those years when sales of grain were limited in their total, and when quotas on which they could deliver grain were very, very small, especially in the fall. This problem began shortly after the last World War. Up until then Prairie farmers had virtually been able to deliver all the grain they could produce almost any time they wanted to, but not too long after the war a surplus of grain products was built up in the Prairie region of Canada, and the Canadian Wheat Board brought in a system of rationing the sales of grain that the farmers could make. This was done to give each Prairie farmer an opportunity to deliver his fair share of the total deliveries that could be purchased by the Canadian Wheat Board for sale either domestically or abroad.

Unfortunately, as we all know, foreign markets became restricted and in some years the total volume of sales in relation to the amount of grain produced was limited indeed. In some instances farmers found that, despite the fact they had harvested their crop in September, they might have had to go until Christmas and only have a two-bushel quota per seeded acre to sell their grain on. Because of this they were desperately short of cash, although they had huge quantities of grain stored on their farms. So the system of cash advances was brought in, as I mentioned a moment ago, in 1957.

Senator Grosart: That was a good year.

Senator McDonald: It was a good year for the western grain producer in that this legislation was beneficial to him, and it is beneficial to him today. But because of changed conditions since 1957, it has been found that the legislation is not adequate today.

The original legislation made provision for a maximum advance payment of $3,000 per farm. Several years later—I do not remember when—the maximum advance payment was increased to $6,000 per farm. The first amendment in Bill C-10 increases the maximum advance payments to $15,000 per permit holder. The need for this increase is obvious. The price of grain on the world market is much higher today than it was when the ceiling was set at $6,000. The cost of producing a bushel of wheat, or of any grain, is much greater today than it was when the ceiling was set at $6,000.

The second reason for the increase to $15,000 is that the western producer has the option to deliver his grain through the Canadian Wheat Board on a quota system or to offboard sales without the quota system. If he delivers his grain to the country elevator and sells it to the Canadian Wheat Board, he receives an initial payment, and the initial payment varies in its amount. But it is a long way from what the Canadian Wheat Board hopes to realize as a final price when that grain is disposed of either on the domestic or on the world market. In some instances a further payment, known as an interim payment, is made during the year. This happens when the initial payment has been very low and the demand on the world market has been high and at a much better price than was anticipated when the initial payment was set. In those cases there is often an interim payment of from 10 cents to 50 cents per bushel, paid some time between August 1 and July 31 of the crop year.

● (1420)

This final payment is made when the books have been closed on the different grades and varieties of grain which have been handled by the Canadian Wheat Board. The difference between the initial payment, together with the interim payment and the final realized price that the board has received on closing its pool for that year on wheat or barley, whatever the case may be, is paid in the final payment.

I notice that sometimes when these final payments are made, references in the press and media generally would lead one to think that this money, which sometimes is in the hundreds of millions of dollars, paid to our Prairie producers, is a subsidy from the Government of Canada. I wish to point out that the final payment contains not one nickel that is not the farmers' to begin with.

Senator Flynn: Who would be interested in leading the farmers to believe it was coming from the government?

Senator McDonald: It escapes me, as many items I read or view on the television screen today escape me. In my opinion, it is unfair. It is wise for all Canadians to recognize that this is the farmers' own money.

Senator Flynn: Agreed.

Senator McDonald: The second proposal in Bill C-10 makes provision for corporate farms, partnerships, cooperatives, or any farming enterprise in which there is more than one individual making his chief source of income out of a farm. Up until this year and the introduction of Bill C-10, it has been possible for a cooperative in which, for instance, there may be three, four, five or six members involved, to receive only one cash advance. Under the present legislation they can receive a maximum of only $6,000. If they are a corporate farm or partnership, they have only one permit book and can only obtain a cash advance payment up to $6,000. This bill makes provision for situations in which there is an association—whether a partnership, corporation or cooperative—to obtain two or three cash advances. In other words, it is possible under this legislation for a corporation, partnership or cooperative to obtain a cash advance up to $45,000. This is a step in the right direction. Undoubtedly there are companies with more than three shareholders, and cooperatives with more than three members. However, $45,000 is a considerable amount of money and will meet the needs of the majority of corporate or cooperative farms in the Prairie region.

[Senator McDonald.]

I note that the elevator companies on the Prairies who are involved in administering the cash advance payment system—incidentally, they are responsible for part of the losses that may accrue—feel that they should be paid some commission for carrying out this work. There is no provision in the bill for this. I simply draw this fact to your attention. There has been some representation made, I presume on behalf of the elevator companies, bringing this to the attention of Parliament. I pass it on to you for what it is worth.

I also note that with some people, who are perhaps not as aware of this program, how it is administered, and the need for it, as are most of us who come from the Prairies, there seems to be some misunderstanding of how an individual can get an interest-free loan of up to $15,000, or a group of individuals can get loans up to a maximum of $45,000. There are considerable restrictions.

One will see from the repayment of these loans that they have an excellent record. I want to point out why I think that the repayment of the loans has been as high as it has been over the years, and the reason for it. Over the years farmers, on the average, have paid about 99.9 per cent of their loans, which is an excellent record.

When one looks at the security which the government has in advancing these loans, we can dispel any worry from our minds that the loans will not be repaid in the future, even when they are increased, as I hope they will be when this legislation is passed. For instance, the quantity of grain per quota acre on which a cash advance can be made appears in the regulations under the present act, and similarly will be in the regulations under Bill C-10 when it is passed.

The quantity of wheat on which one can get a cash advance is 10 bushels per quota acre. That is not a very big profit. The quantity of oats and barley for which one can obtain a loan is 20 bushels per quota acre. I suggest that is a small portion of the total average crop.

In the year 1974, the amount of money, as a cash advance, that one can get per quota acre for wheat is $1.50 per bushel. For barley it is $1 a bushel, and for oats it is 70 cents a bushel. This means that the maximum payment per quota acre for wheat is $15; for barley, $20; and for oats, $20.

If we look at the various sizes of farms on the Prairies, we see how much an individual farmer will receive under this legislation. Some people think that every farmer in the West will receive $15,000. That is not so. If a farmer on the Prairies has an excellent half section of land, of which 300 acres are cultivated—that is nowhere near the average, which would be much less; however, I shall take the best land—he will have 100 acres in summer fallow, 100 acres in wheat and 100 acres in barley. His land will have disappeared and he will have qualified for a $3,500 maximum cash advance.

Using the same arithmetic, a farmer having one section of land would qualify for a cash advance of approximately $7,000; a farmer having a section and a half of land—that is, 960 acres—would qualify for $10,500; and a farmer with two sections of land—that is, 1,280 acres—would qualify for the maximum cash advance.

But how much has been invested by a farmer who has a two-section operation? I suggest that his land today is worth about $250,000. He probably has buildings valued at $100,000, he has at least $100,000 invested in equipment, and a total investment of at least $500,000. He can get a cash advance of $15,000, which is 3 per cent of his total investment. Is it any wonder that there is an excellent record of repayment?

This legislation has been good legislation in the past, and it is good legislation today. I believe the amendment for which we are asking meets the needs and the times in 1975, and I recommend it for the approval of honourable senators. If the bill receives second reading, it is my intention to refer it to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I wish to say a few words at this time. Senator Yuzyk has suggested that I go ahead, and afterwards he will adjourn the debate.

Senator McDonald has certainly covered this subject very well and has given us an accurate history of the program and its accomplishments.

In introducing this bill in the other place, the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, the Honourable Otto Lang, not only explained the benefits of this legislation but went somewhat farther afield and put on record some of the other programs and accomplishments of the government in relation to the general grain industry. Bill C-10, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, is a further indication that the Honourable Otto Lang is putting forward programs that are definitely in the economic interests of Western Canada, and this bill in itself is an important advance in that direction.

When it comes to a stabilization program, Mr. Lang has made marked progress. The bill before us fits in with a stabilization program. We have seen the development of special care for the hauling of grain, hopper cars, and that, too, is a good development. When one is considering innovation in the grain business, one should look at the system as it exists today to determine what is valuable in that system and what has been accomplished.

Senator McNamara was Chairman of the Canadian Wheat Board for many years. He was Chief Commissioner of the Canadian Wheat Board when it implemented the system of providing and administering cash advances, and it is my view that the general pattern of administering those cash advances that he developed in those days should be continued. Some people may say the elevator companies are doing a lot of paperwork in providing cash advances without being paid for it, but it is my opinion that this is a service they are very well able to render to the producers in the normal course of business, and for which they should not look for an additional fee.

Senator McDonald knows, as other honourable senators who have knowledge of the grain business know, that when farmers are lining up for cash advances, grain is not being moved, and neither the elevator companies nor the farmers are busy hauling grain. In those circumstances, it is no hardship for the elevator companies to take a few minutes in order to provide the cash advances. I should think the paperwork involved at the time of application would probably take 15 minutes. I am sure there is much more paperwork involved at other stages, but the initial paperwork of getting the information from the farmer as to the number of bins, and so forth, is a matter of simple multiplication, filling out the cash ticket for the grain and handing it to the farmer. That, surely, is a service that elevator companies can well afford to provide without the necessity of imposing a fixed cost in relation to it.

We have in Canada something of a mixed system for the handling of grain. We have the Canadian Wheat Board itself, the farmer-owned local elevators, and the privately owned system in the grain gathering business. Farmer-owned producer systems are becoming more and more powerful. The Canadian Wheat Board is supported by the producers. On any occasion when there has been a vote on the question of handling wheat, it has been demonstrated that 90 per cent of the farmers vote in favour of the Canadian Wheat Board system, with not more than 10 per cent opposing it.

I think we are very fortunate in Canada in having been able to develop this kind of system. I have in my hand today's Montreal Gazette which shows the Canadian Wheat Board export price for No. 1 Canadian wheat, 13.5 per cent protein, is $5.13 a bushel; in the United States, the price for No. 2 soft red wheat at Chicago is $3.49 a bushel.

I had occasion to meet with the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States about a year ago in Washington, at which time we discussed the prices of wheat in the United States. At about that time, or shortly after, the price of wheat in the United States was approximately $6 a bushel. The Canadian Wheat Board export price compared favourably at around $5.60 or $5.70 a bushel. But since that time the speculative market, the open exchange market in the United States, which is the only market they have, has had a speculative field day. Some of the speculative field days resulted in the commodity market going up; others resulted in it going down.

I should think that while supply and demand is obviously a very important factor, one of the most important factors in the huge increase in commodity prices a year or two ago was that speculative money, not finding it possible to realize a profit in the general stock market, was directed into the commodity markets. Such speculators had a wonderful time while the prices went up. I do not know whether they had as good a time when prices began to go down, but for those who were knowledgeable enough and knew what they were doing, there was just as much money to be made on the way down. The grain producer, however, is in a very difficult position. If he is lucky enough to haul his grain at $6 a bushel, obviously he will do very well; if, on the other hand, he holds it back or is unable to move it, and the price drops to $3 or $3.50 a bushel, then he will obviously lose a lot of money.

So, I am confident that the system we now have, supported by the majority of producers, will continue to be supported by the Canadian government in the interests of Canadian grain producers. It has been built up by some effort and much care. Today it is proving its worth.

I seeded flax last spring. I was able to get my seed flax at a fairly reasonable price in relation to the market at the time. I paid $14 a bushel for it, and today the price of flax is around $7 a bushel. There is simply no way any farmer can stay in business with that kind of wild fluctuation in prices. If we have a Canadian Wheat Board that is able to continue to get good prices for our grains in the export market in relation to prevailing conditions, as well as providing a system of cash advances and some stability, I think that is a good system and one which we should continue.

Honourable senators, there is much afoot in the grain business in Canada today. Much has been accomplished with the building of our elevator system, the establishment of railway branch lines, a network on the Prairies, the establishment of the Canadian Wheat Board system, terminal elevators and so on. But there are those around who say that system is antiquated, that it is out of date, that we should scrap it.

There are those who say that we should get rid of the Crowsnest Pass agreement. I want to say from my position in the Senate that I am 100 per cent in favour of the Crowsnest Pass rates on grain, and 100 per cent in favour of keeping them. I hope that no farmer in Western Canada, and that none of the so-called farm organizations in Western Canada, will ever suggest that these rates should be removed. They argue that it may help the cattle producers. I do not know how it will help the cattle producer in my part of the country, who sells perhaps 5,000 bushels of wheat and 100 head of cattle in a year, if you take $1 a bushel off his price for wheat and tell him, "You can make money from your cattle; you can feed your wheat to your cattle." What would happen would be that he would lose $5,000; that would be the total result. I think the first thing to support is the Crowsnest Pass rates on grain.

Senator Flynn: How do you relate that to the bill?

Senator Argue: It is not too directly related to the bill.

Senator Grosart: Let us keep to the rules.

Senator Argue: I know Senator Grosart gets very worried about the rules, but I have watched him operate in this house and he is not always strictly in order. He may say he is, but I have heard him refer to things that have gone on in the other place; I have heard him say that something has been happening in the government lobby. I think, therefore, that on an important bill such as this, on which the debate in the other place was completely wide-ranging, it is a service to the Senate to bring out some of the important problems that affect the grain business.

Senator McDonald: Keep on going.

Senator Argue: The second thing a lot of people are out to do is to remove the branch lines, the branch lines on which elevators are situated, and where managers operate and pay cash advances to the farmers. They want to abandon them. They say, "We are going to allow so many to remain, but we are not going to protect them on another 4,000 miles." So everybody gets excited, and they should get excited, along these lines, and they start putting pressure on the government to keep the lines. Then the government says, "We really do not intend to have that many abandoned and we are going to protect them all for a year."

[Senator Argue.]

Senator Sparrow: Could I ask the honourable senator a question?

Senator Argue: Surely.

Senator Sparrow: When you refer to "a lot of people", to whom are you referring? You say a lot of people are interested in tearing up branch lines. Would you mind being specific and name these organizations or people?

Senator Argue: The railways would like to get the branch lines torn up. There is a group in Western Canada called the Palliser Wheat Growers' Association who say there should be centralization, and they have come out in favour of terminals, which means that branch lines obviously are coming up.

Senator Langlois: They are producers, are they not?

Senator Argue: Oh, yes. They are a group of producers, some 2,000 to 3,000 members out of a total of 160,000 producers on the Prairies. However, if a vote were taken I am sure that 90 or 95 per cent of the farmers would be opposed to any wholesale branch line abandonment, as I am opposed to it.

Senator Sparrow: Are you talking about government policy or federal government representatives who may be interested in doing that? Are you talking of specific government representatives who may be interested in doing away with the Crowsnest Pass rates? This is, I think, a very important discussion, and I appreciate what you are saying. I think it is a very crucial issue in Western Canada. However, if criticism is due, then I think we should know the positions of those who are interested in doing away with those branch lines to which you refer and the Crowsnest Pass rates.

Senator Argue: That is what I am trying to do.

Senator Flynn: Are you coming back to the bill now?

Senator Argue: I thank the honourable senator for his interruption, but I make no apology for what I am doing.

Senator Langlois: You have been side-tracked.

Senator Flynn: You are really branching.

Senator Argue: I am branching, but I am trying to protect these branches.

There are organizations, the railway companies and others, who would like to get rid of all the branch lines. There are many organizations, including the wheat pools, that would like to reduce the number of branch lines. What I am saying is that a very substantial number of those branch lines that appear on the map for removal should not be removed, and my forecast is that history will show in the coming years that they are not going to be removed.

They want to remove all branch lines from where I farm to the United States border, a distance of 54 miles. It makes no sense whatsoever. The member of Parliament for that constituency, Mr. Ralph Goodale, has said that it makes no sense, so the people who want to get rid of those branch lines will, I think, fail. We should be careful, too, that we do not blindly follow the road of centralization—and big centralization.

There is a group that wants to put together a terminal in the city of Weyburn. They have gotten quite a bit of support, and they have travelled around. They got a grant from the federal government of $42,000.

Senator Flynn: Is that a point in favour of the bill, or are you intending to move an amendment?

Senator Argue: Perhaps we should move an amendment at some time. This organization has received a grant from the government.

Senator Benidickson: From what department of government?

Senator Argue: I think the first grant came from the Grains Council—from a department of the federal government in any case. There were two grants; there was a second grant that was given.

Senator Sparrow: I would suggest that perhaps the honourable senator is talking about a loan through DREE, not a grant. Are you talking about the Weyburn terminal loan, which any industry would be entitled to receive and which is not specifically a grant? They are entitled to it under the DREE program and it happens to be a loan, not a grant. Would you agree with that?

Senator Argue: No, I do not agree with that. It was a subsidy of $42,000. That was a grant, a gift. That is the way it was.

Senator Sparrow: A loan?

Senator Argue: Not a loan, a gift; a free gift without any strings attached and without any repayment being due or called to be made.

Senator Benidickson: Under what legislation?

Senator Argue: I am not an authority on that. I did not bring in all the statutes. I am just telling you it is a fact that these grants and subsidies have been made. I am willing to take that question as notice, and bring the name of the precise department to my honourable friend. Nevertheless, it is still a fact. Senator Sparrow infers that they want something from DREE. As I understand it, they want a guarantee from DREE, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

Senator Flynn: If the honourable senator is going to conclude his speech soon I will let him go on. But I do not like the idea of dealing with all the problems of Western Canada, having Senator Sparrow and Senator Benidickson jump in, too, discussing rail transportation, branch lines and everything else imaginable under the guise of a debate on this bill. I think it is unfair to the Senate as a whole to exaggerate in the way Senator Argue has in this particular instance. He has wandered very far from the subject matter of the bill, and it is unfair. Generally we are not too strict about our rules, but I think in this particular instance he is going a little too far, and I suggest that he closes his speech pretty soon.

Senator Langlois: Or get back to the subject.

● (1450)

Senator Argue: I like my honourable friend Senator Flynn. I think he is one of the best senators we have. He is most logical. He is nearly always right. When he spoke just now he was almost entirely right, but not entirely, because I do not think anything I have said is, in fact, exaggerated.

Senator Flynn: I meant that you were going far beyond the scope of the bill, not that you were exaggerating the facts.

Senator Argue: The facts are not exaggerated. In making this kind of statement, which I hope I will draw to a conclusion soon, I am on the side of the evolutionist and I am opposed to the revolutionist in the grain business.

I believe we have a good, sound grain business now. It will evolve. It is evolving. There will be some consolidation. There will be some abandonment of certain branch lines. But my plea is that these things be done gradually, that they be done in consultation with the existing farm organizations. I suggest that a guarantee by DREE to put forward a terminal elevator sponsored by a minority group—an elevator which, if it is successful, will do untold damage to surrounding communities within 50 or 60 miles—would not be economic expansion, which DREE and its guarantees are designed to accomplish. I suggest with sincerity that for each job produced in Weyburn by the establishment of this elevator, four jobs within the surrounding area will be removed. If this elevator is built and is successful, it will be on the basis of government money, which will cause economic contraction in that area and will help bring about a withering away of the communities within the area. That would be nothing more than a misappropriation of government effort.

I certainly hope that DREE does not take sides, because that terminal will not be there—will never be there as I see it—without the initial grant and gift of $42,000 and without a DREE guarantee with which they can go to the bank and get millions of dollars.

I am hopeful that in evolving today's grain policy and in bringing about this important, necessary and unanimously supported increase in cash advances, those in authority will consult with those who have been established in the grain business for many years. I suggest that the best people to work with are the cooperatives, the wheat producers' own organizations, the wheat pools, United Grain Growers, and others in the grain business. In my opinion, the concern of government should be to evolve, in consultation with these people, a policy that will result in efficient and improved elevator facilities and improved transportation facilities. But that will not be brought about by undoing the accomplishments of the past, or by tearing down the many things which producers have for two generations struggled to build.

Senator Flynn: Shades of Paul Martin's irrelevancies in the House of Commons.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, this afternoon would seem to be Saskatchewan's afternoon. It is almost like the MacDonald Brier in curling—the Saskatchewan rink usually ends up on top.

Senator Flynn: Are you speaking to the bill?

Senator Buckwold: I hope the Leader of the Opposition will allow me to speak briefly on the importance of the bill.

Senator Flynn: If it is on the bill, I have no objection. However, if you wish to follow along the lines of the speech just made by Senator Argue, you will be completely out of order.

Senator Buckwold: The honourable Leader of the Opposition can tell me if I am out of order, but I should like to draw to the attention of the Senate that the importance of this bill, and the reason for my support of it, is that it relates to the current labour problems in Vancouver and their effect on the wheat industry and the farm industry. I believe my remarks will be relevant to the importance of improving these farm advances, because we will need them in that part of the world as a result of what is going on in the labour front there.

Am I being denied the right to speak?

Senator Flynn: I will not object, but I should point out that you are doing exactly what Senator Argue was doing.

Senator Buckwold: Well—

Senator Flynn: Let me finish and then you can reply. I remember when I was in the other place—and I alluded to this a moment ago—that Mr. Paul Martin's remarks used to be exactly like those of Senator Argue—irrelevant. One can always say, "Well, what I am saying is related to the bill because, as I see it, it's related." With that kind of logic, you can speak of the moon when you are dealing with an arithmetic problem and there is an obvious relationship. That is what Senator Argue has been doing, and I see that you intend to emulate him by talking about the strike at the Vancouver Harbour, a subject entirely outside the scope of this bill. If I heard the sponsor correctly, the real purpose of this bill is to increase the amount of the advance payments from $6,000 to $15,000. It is quite an accomplishment, if you can relate that to the strike at Vancouver Harbour.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, may I add just one remark?

Senator Grosart: No. You have said quite enough.

Senator Buckwold: May I be allowed to speak, honourable senators? If we cannot move grain, then we certainly need these advances. That is why I am supporting this bill. We are faced with a particular crisis right now which is a dramatic illustration of the plight of western farmers owing to the vagaries of the market and, in this particular case, to the labour position on the West Coast. I feel it is important that this body should have these facts drawn to its attention, not only in relation to this bill but in relation to the entire farm economy.

Senator Flynn: If it is the wish of the Senate to allow you to speak on that subject, I shall not object.

Senator Buckwold: But I should like to have your approval. I should like to have the approval of the Leader of the Opposition, because I know that he is such a friend of the western farmers.

Senator Flynn: I am probably more of a friend to these people than some of you are. I am suggesting that senators should deal with the subject before us, and stop dealing in irrelevancies so we can get on with the bill and pass it if it deserves being passed.

Senator Buckwold: I would not doubt for one minute that you are a friend of the western farmers, in spite of the opposition which you seem to be putting up. In any event, I should like to draw to the attention of the Senate the problems created by the unrest, the strikes, and the turmoil in the labour front on the West Coast. There are over 30 vessels—

Senator Flynn: What has that to do with this bill?

Senator Buckwold: I suggest it does have something to do with it, because it is an indication of why we need this bill. There is a major crisis in Western Canada in the farm economy today. I do think the people who sit here enjoying the prosperity of Eastern Canada are able to appreciate fully what is going on in the farm front today. The problems they are having are, as I have said, related directly to this bill.

I just want to express on behalf of the people in the areas which I represent, my home, that as soon as possible the government will, if necessary, move in and settle this strike. I want to stress that some order must be brought out of the present chaos. At the moment it is an impossible situation. The farmers are now unable to sell grain through their elevator companies. They are unable to dispose of their product. The whole system is backing up. There are tens of thousands of boxcars uselessly tied up. There are dozens of ocean-going vessels standing idly by in Vancouver Harbour. Because the grain weighers—just a handful of people, relatively speaking—are out on strike, the entire waterfront of Vancouver is closed. And I say that we cannot sit idly by heedless of this situation, especially as it relates to this bill. I draw this to the attention of honourable senators because it is a major Canadian crisis.

Just this past year alone the Saskatchewan farmers produced $2 billion worth of wealth from their agricultural products. That was not from a depleting resource. They did not take out of the ground oil, which is consumed; they did not take out of the ground minerals, which disappear; and they did not chop down trees. They produced new wealth, which went into the economy of this country, and it is a very important contribution to the prosperity of Canada.

I suggest it is important that all of us, in every way we can, should do whatever is possible to get these strikes settled and get some kind of peace on the labour front, or we will be losing our markets. The prices that Senator Argue mentioned, and which, thanks to the Wheat Board, are being easily maintained—although they are dropping, too, because of the problems of the world economy—will in fact disappear at the high levels if we lose our best customers because we cannot deliver the goods as, traditionally, we have been able to do.

I say that this is of prime importance. I urge the members of this house to support this bill, and to do whatever they can to get the people involved in these disputes, which have played havoc with the agricultural economy, back to work.

Senator Argue: On the point of order that has been raised—

Senator Flynn: It is not disposed of.

Senator Argue: I think one can speak on the whole question of procedure. Another senator could also speak on the question of procedure.

Senator Flynn: It was abandoned.

Senator Argue: I want to point out to honourable senators that the rules that govern the Senate are the rules that are in the Senate rule book, plus the usages and practices of the other place and the parliamentary system. I noticed that when this very bill was debated in the other place, where the rules are quite similar to ours, the debate was far more wide-ranging than it has been here today. They talked about the Crowsnest Pass rates; they talked about stabilization; they talked about the two price system; they talked about farm machinery prices; they talked about the federal budget; and they talked about the new hopper cars. They went, in fact, very far afield. I think Senator Buckwold did a service this afternoon in pointing out to the Senate and to the country one of our big problems, namely, that of moving our grain now so that we may keep our customers, and so that the farmers may get some money rather than having to use the provisions of this bill to the extent that they might otherwise have to do.

All I am pointing out is that in the other place prominent members of each of the political parties, including the Hamiltons of the Conservative Party, ranged widely in the debate, and I think wisely, so that they made a contribution to their constituencies and to the country. As far as I can tell—and Senator McDonald, I know, has the record in front of him—no point of order was raised in the other place.

Senator Choquette: They have to be re-elected.

Senator Yuzyk: Honourable senators, following this battery of agricultural experts from Saskatchewan—and we still have to hear from Senator Sparrow—as is expected now on both sides of the house, I move that the debate on Bill C-10 be adjourned. I will try to keep on the main track.

On motion of Senator Yuzyk, debate adjourned.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

BILL C-228 (BRUCE)—SECOND READING

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald moved the second reading of Bill C-228, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I do not know whether I should do this again or not.

Senator Flynn: Oh, yes. You were relevant before, and I know you are going to be so again.

Senator McDonald: I can certainly be relevant as far as Bill C-228 is concerned. I think it would be safe to call it a simple bill, since all it does is change the name of a federal electoral constituency in the province of Ontario from Bruce to Bruce-Grey.

The reason for this change, as I understand it, is that 50 per cent of the constituency is located in the county of Bruce, and the other 50 per cent in the county of Grey. It is the feeling of the sitting member, Mr. C. Douglas, and also, I understand, of his constituents, that they would like the name to be double-barrelled in the future, and for the constituency to be known as Bruce-Grey rather than Bruce.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, with all due respect to the mover and seconder of this bill and the others that follow, I shall not speak at length on this matter.

It seems to me these bills are becoming increasingly frivolous the closer we get to the readjustment of electoral boundaries. In fact, the commissions assigned this readjustment are now at work so that the purpose of these bills is totally useless, inefficient—the commissions are in no way bound to take them into account, nor will they, in all probability. Therefore, if the Senate deems it advisable to pass this bill, let it do so, but on division.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Senator Lafond has just expressed my own views on the matter. However, there is one point he made when similar bills were brought before us: he pointed out that we are going against the rule adopted by the commissions whereby single names should be adopted instead of hyphenated ones such as “Bruce-Grey” and others. This seems absolutely pointless, to my mind, seen from here. But if the House of Commons has deemed it proper to pass these bills, I feel all we can do is protest and say that they are in bad taste.

[English]

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator McDonald moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BILL C-229 (LAFONTAINE)—SECOND READING

Hon. Azellus Denis moved the second reading of Bill C-229, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

He said:

[Translation]

Honourable senators, it is a nice opportunity for us to pay tribute and please an important group in this country; I am talking about people in the ward of Rosemont in the beautiful city of Montreal.

Senator Langlois: In la belle province!

Senator Denis: The ward of Rosemont includes about half the ward of Lafontaine, and being proud of their name and their identity I think it would please them if we added the name of Rosemont to that of Lafontaine, which is the name of the riding.

With all due respect to the honourable Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, I think it is a nice thing to please those who are proud of their place and want its name to appear in the title.

As to my honourable friend, Senator Lafond, I think that whatever happens or if by chance there should be an election we would always be prepared to proceed under the new name. I think it is a very good thing, and on behalf of the people of Rosemont I submit it to honourable senators.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I want the record to show that the remarks made by Senator Lafond as well as mine on the previous bill also apply to this one.

Senator Denis: Honourable senators, it is as nice and interesting to bear the name "Lafontaine-Rosemont" as the name "Progressive Conservative".

Senator Langlois: I would like to know from the sponsor of this bill which Lafontaine he is talking about? Is he talking about the former Prime Minister, or the current member of the other place?

Senator Denis: It is not the fountain of youth, Senator Langlois!

Senator Langlois: Thank you very much for the compliment.

BILL C-365 (BERTHIER)—SECOND READING

Hon. Sarto Fournier moved the second reading of Bill C-365, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

He said:

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I feel there is very little to say on such a trivial matter. However, I think it is the wish of the people of Quebec in this area known as "Maskinongé", as expressed to their member of Parliament, that the geographic expression be included in the definition of this electoral body. In order to comply with the wishes of the people and the law, the law being as it is and as long as it is the law, so be it.

However, I feel that the Senate should be pleased to comply, not with the will, but with the wishes of the people of one of the most beautiful areas of the province of Quebec.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, the comments I made also apply to this bill, but I should like to add something.

Senator Fournier suggested that this bill results from the will of the people of the county of Berthier.

I dispute this statement for, unless I am mistaken, there has not been any referendum or request in that county. It is only a habit of old to try and describe every area of a constituency, habit which the last review of electoral boundaries tried, apparently in vain, to get rid of.

I understand the reaction of members in the other place who want to please every little community. The practice detracts in no way from the present names, and to those whose names they wish to see appear, they say. "We will mention your county as well as the other."

However, I would like to make another comment on this bill.

Formerly, that riding was named "Berthier-Maskinongé", as they are now proposing to do. At a given time, the very nice name of "de Lanaudière" was added, which is the name of the area represented here by our great friend, Senator Sarto Fournier, the co-dean of Parliament and co-dean of the Senate, with Senator Denis.

Senator Langlois: Both in the same corner!

Senator Flynn: So, this is small-scale history; we are told that it was the representative at that time who, to get rid of the returning officer, proposed this bill, replacing the name of "Berthier" by "Berthier-Maskinongé"; when "de Lanaudière" was added, we got the longest name of all ridings in Canada. At the last review of electoral boundaries, the nice name "de Lanaudière" and the name "Maskinongé" were dropped to leave only "Berthier".

If I had had my say in the matter, I would have suggested to simply keep the name "de Lanaudière", which covers more or less the district represented by our excellent friend Senator Fournier. The name "Berthier" was preferred.

However, here we are doing the same thing again; we are lapsing back into the same mistake, by adding "Maskinongé". Perhaps next year, or after the next election, we shall revert to the previous choice and say that because the people in a part of the constituency like the name "de Lanaudière", it will be better to add "de Lanaudière", with the result that we shall have the longest description of a constituency in all Canada, "Berthier-Maskinongé-de Lanaudière", and perhaps shall we add "Fournier"!

Senator Lafond: Honourable senators, Senator Flynn brought to our attention the fact that at some time the name "de Lanaudière" had been added to the name of the constituency, probably because they wanted to change the returning officer, as the act requires.

Senator Flynn: At that time.

Senator Lafond: That may be so, but I must point out that changing the name of an electoral district should not necessarily mean changing the returning officer of that constituency.

So, if that is the purpose of the bill, as I said earlier, it is still inefficient, useless and has no effect whatsoever.

Senator Flynn: Agreed.

Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière): If you allow me, honourable senators, I do not wish to miss this opportunity.

Senator Langlois: Is the honourable senator closing the debate?

Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière): I hope so.

I do not wish to let the opportunity pass without gratefully thanking my honourable friend, the Leader of the Opposition, for his almost affectionate and very flattering remarks about me.

In connection with the change of name, the following occurred: the member for Berthier informed me that he had received representations from distinguished persons and citizens of that area of his constituency called Mas-kinongé who would like to have that name appear in the traditional definition. He has complied with their request. He cannot be blamed; he has to do it. We do not need a referendum as suggested by the Leader of the Opposition. We do not have to consult everybody when we are sure that those who made the representations are making a reasonable and sensible request about something to which they are entitled. It rests with Parliament and especially the Senate—we so seldom have the opportunity—to be agreeable to the people. We should not miss this opportunity of satisfying a legitimate need of a very large group of Canadians.

Senator Denis: Very well.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, February 25, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Deschatelets, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the claim made by the Minister of Justice of the Province of Quebec for financial compensation from the federal government with respect to the Quebec Provincial Police Force and to the ever-increasing costs of maintaining the various police forces in Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, when I spoke today it was not for very long. I might have spoken often, but not to any length and I have no intention of doing so now either.

I simply want to say that I have found this debate on financial compensation for maintaining a police force in Quebec interesting and that, in a way and to a degree, I have found it useful. I therefore congratulate Senator Deschatelets and those who have taken part in this debate, especially Senator Asselin and Senator Desruisseaux, who supported the views of Senator Deschatelets. I also congratulate Senator Manning and Senator Hicks, two former provincial premiers, who expressed their doubts about the validity of the claim made by Quebec and even of that made by Ontario, which was not directly involved in the debate but is concerned with this issue.

I certainly do not take the floor in an effort to take a stand between the opposing viewpoints which have been expressed. I simply want to indicate that if this debate were to end as debates of this nature often do, it would not be of much use. It seems to me that if the Senate must really study this issue, it must do so a bit more realistically. For this reason, at the first opportunity, once the debate is over and when Madam Speaker has stated that the issue is deemed to have been discussed, I intend to suggest that this same issue, as well as the problem of the claim of Ontario, be referred to the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. Without looking at him, I know that Senator Goldenberg is happy at the thought that he will have something else to do.

Senator Lamontagne: On French television.

Senator Flynn: On French television. Such debate might be televised and might perhaps stir up a bit more interest than the sittings of the committee on cannabis seem to do. They don't seem to work out so well. I think that it is a subject which is a bit too complex for television. It is said generally that television viewers are interested in programs suitable for the eleven-year-old age group on the average. We would think that at that age cannabis is not yet a problem, and that later on, once on it, the complexity of the problem is of no interest anymore.

[English]

So, for the reasons I have just explained, I submit, when the discussion is terminated, that this matter should not be simply left as a subject that has been debated. If we are to do something useful with respect to this problem, the matter should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. I have been informed that the Minister of Justice for the Province of Quebec, Mr. Jérôme Choquette, would be willing to appear before the committee headed by Senator Goldenberg. I have received the same sort of information with regard to the Honourable John T. Clement, the Attorney General for the Province of Ontario. I do not doubt for a moment that the Solicitor General, the Honourable Warren Allmand, would similarly be extremely pleased to appear before this committee of the Senate to express his viewpoint. We would also have the advantage of the experience and knowledge of Senator Hicks and Senator Manning, two former premiers of provinces which were parties to the agreement—which the provinces of Quebec and Ontario were not—with regard to the maintenance of police forces.

For that reason, I give notice that when this debate is concluded I will move that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to consider the question of financial compensation by the federal government for the maintenance by the provinces of Ontario and Quebec of their own police forces. I hope that in due course that motion will receive the favourable consideration of the Senate.

[Translation]

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I have just one question for Senator Flynn. Would he be prepared to become deputy chairman of a subcommittee of my committee which could study this question?

Senator Flynn: If it is the only problem faced by the chairman of the committee, I would be pleased to accept and I would find someone to preside over such a subcommittee.

Senator Goldenberg: No, I offered you the position.

On motion of Senator Langlois, debate adjourned.

ENERGY

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE OF OIL-PRODUCING AND OIL-CONSUMING COUNTRIES—QUESTION

Senator Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, I have read with some concern an item of news that appeared in the Financial Times of March 10. Before I go into this and put my questions, I want to say that I have had no opportunity to speak to the Leader of the Government about these questions that I wish to put, nor do I feel that there is any urgency in answering them.

The article is written by Peter Cook and it is entitled, "Canada left out—Crucial oil meeting next month." It reads as follows:

In a major political rebuff, Canada has been excluded from crucial world meetings between the oil-producing and oil-consuming countries to open in Paris on April 7.

External Affairs Department officials last week were pressing the Canadian case for a seat at the talks which are reckoned to be the most important international discussions to be held this year. They will cover not just future oil-pricing policies but also trade in key raw materials in which Canada is vitally interested.

Canada had hoped that at least it could make its views known through the International Energy Agency (IEA), which represents the oil-consuming countries, by being awarded observer status at the talks.

But the IEA has been kept out, too. Consumer countries invited to attend the first meeting by the French government include the U.S., Japan and nine European Economic Community (EEC) members.

Canada is the only one among the big seven world economies not asked to attend.

The meetings will be a face-off between the industrial world, the oil-producing countries represented by Saudi Arabia, Venezuela, Iran and Algeria, and the poorer developing countries, represented by Brazil, India and Zaire.

External Affairs officials last week maintained Canada had "very strong claims indeed on individual representation." Says one spokesman: "We have made our views clear on this. We are a strong economic power in our own right and one of the most important trading countries in the world."

We do not have to emphasize these points here, but it seemed to me I should refer to this matter because a comparison is being made in the U. S. News & World Report between nations. As to total output of goods and services, of all the countries in the world Canada rates eighth. We are close to Italy. Among the oil-producing countries, according to the figures I have here, Canada rates ninth, preceded by Iraq and followed by Libya, who are represented at this conference.

In view of the importance of this situation, and the effect it may have on general trading for Canada with some of these countries, I would like to put to the leader the following questions, to enable us to air the subject as much as we can:

1. Is the published report of the Financial Times of March 10, 1975, by Peter Cook, to the effect that Canada has just received a major political rebuff by being officially excluded "from crucial world-meetings between the oil-producing and oil-consuming countries to open in Paris on April 7", correct and true?

2. What official protest is intended by Canada?

3. Because of its importance to Canada, what counteraction can be taken by Canada so as to somehow also participate in the stabilizing of world trade in raw materials, and general trade?

Honourable senators, this is a subject of great concern to Canada. I do not want to go any further. These are simple questions. They are meant, really, to try to open up the minds of all of us on this subject. The article I referred to may have passed unnoticed by some. I believe that we should attach the greatest importance to this matter, which in my view transcends many other things we have to deal with.

● (2010)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, these questions are very important and they are complicated, as you can appreciate. I shall undertake to obtain a complete answer to the questions which Senator Desruisseaux has posed. There are some preliminary indications, however, that Canada, in fact, will be a participant in the full conference involving the major oil-producing and oil-consuming nations. The article to which the senator has referred may pertain to a preliminary meeting which, I understand, is to precede the full conference at which Canada is to be a participant. However, this is a speculation, and, as I stated earlier, I will undertake to obtain a full and factual reply.

Senator Desruisseaux: Would our leader know whether we have to take the published report by Peter Cook in the Financial Times as incorrect in some substance?

Senator Perrault: It is not for me to comment on the quality or accuracy of the article by Mr. Cook. However, it may be that the assumptions that appear to be drawn from the article may be incorrect. Perhaps its judgments are premature. That is all I am suggesting.

LIGHTING OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS— QUESTION

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government what progress the government is making with its program for the conservation of energy by cutting down lighting of government buildings. I notice that today the Globe and Mail made a very vainglorious announcement, illustrated, of the reduction made in the lighting of one of the buildings down on Booth Street. But when I passed the Department of External Affairs building the other night I felt that Solomon in all his glory could not have been more resplendent than it was. Every single floor of the building was brilliantly illuminated. I could not help wondering whether the announcement by the minister in the other house on the subject of conserving energy by cutting down lighting in government buildings had reached the exalted and rarefied heights of the Department of External Affairs.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, apart altogether from the fact that the Department of External Affairs and its personnel are working overtime these days—

[Senator Desruisseaux.]

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Perrault: —is the fact that there is a certain type of lighting which I am given to understand is more economic to leave on twenty-four hours a day than to turn on and off. But I shall make the appropriate inquiries.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I read very carefully what the minister said in the other place. He strongly discounted that particular argument. As I recall it, he admitted that there were some of these buildings so constructed that there was apparently only one switch per floor, perhaps one switch per building, and said that this would have to be changed. This is why I am asking the question. Are they getting down to doing something about it, or is this something that is just going to go on, with pious hopes and exhortations and admonitions to the general public, with an occasional beautiful illustration of a building in almost total darkness, with just one floor lit up where the cleaning staff is at work? I hope this will be taken very seriously, because it seems to me a very important matter.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I suggest that the inquiry will be pursued with energy and I hope we can cast some light on it in a few days.

Senator Argue: Install some switches.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the second reading of Bill C-49, to amend the statute law relating to income tax.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-49, if you take even a quick look at it, is terrifying in its proportions, and when it is read it does not improve very much. The complexities are extraordinary. When we embarked on tax reform in 1970 we had a whole new world of taxation opened up before our eyes—an area in which everything would say what it meant, and mean everything it said.

Since that time many things have happened. The translation of the White Paper, the position paper of 1970, into an income tax act, Bill C-259 in 1971, occupied 707 pages. Since that time the Department of National Revenue has been busy issuing interpretation bulletins, which have now reached quite substantial proportions. The length of each sheet is approximately a foolscap page, and as to volume they would easily outrival the bill presently before us. Of course, we have had regulations, we have had rulings, and now we have Bill C-49, consisting of 303 pages.

● (2020)

We are told, in this bill, that its purpose is mainly relieving and clarifying. There are some positive features where benefits are granted to individuals and penalties are imposed on corporations, but by and large the bill becomes more and more complex. I would defy any honourable senator to turn to any part of the bill, read two or three pages and then sit back and reflect on what he or she had read. You would certainly have read a lot of English words, but the big problem is how to put them together.

The Financial Times seems to be one of the most quotable sources this evening. In an article on the front page of the issue of March 3 entitled "Not so funny," it says:

The complexity of Canada's tax system now verges on the ridiculous.

It goes on to cite about three different instances which have developed, reflections in the courts, and a studied analysis by some of the people on the staff of the Financial Times, and continues:

Lawyers and tax collectors may delight in these complications, but for the rest of us the system is becoming a heavy burden. Too many people now have to spend too much time to figure out the financial consequences of what they do. It is high time we simplified the rules.

My comment in relation to that is that we have had a fair run at the complex system which was held out to us in 1970 and 1971 as being really the introduction to a simplified era of tax reform and simplicity in taxation. There was no undertaking that it would not be voluminous, but at least it was implied—there was even an undertaking—that it could be easily read. If one examines the amendments contained in Bill C-49, one will find that the majority of them arise from failure to put in Bill C-259—the bill of 1971—the real intent of that particular enactment in clear language and, therefore, we were faced with amendment after amendment.

If we reverted to a system that was more general in the enactment of tax legislation, we could not make any more mistakes than are apparently made in following this very complex system, and I am sure that more people would understand it. Whether any attention will be paid to this, I do not know. Perhaps the little drops of water will gradually produce enough erosion.

In the meantime, the Revenue Department goes on its way, issuing interpretation bulletins and rules, making regulations and amending regulations. So the story runs.

The trial and error method is not a good way to get good tax law. When we go into the field of legislating in a particular way and try to cover every point that may develop under the one subject matter, we are not likely to cover them all, no matter how we may anticipate problems which might develop. If we take a general approach, it may work out better. Perhaps I should be kind and say I wonder if it will work out less well than it does because, in the order of things, there are amendments each year. Having said that, realizing how complex and difficult this bill is, I propose to confine myself to certain subject matters in it.

I hope my judgment as to what subject matters might be of greatest interest to you will meet with your approval, and will be in line with what you are thinking about. One could not deal with all that is contained in this bill. First of all, a clause-by-clause review is not the purpose on second reading. This is when we discuss the principle of the bill. It is difficult to enunciate a principle in a tax bill, except that tax bills either give you money by way of rebates and refunds, or they take it away by way of heavier taxes. Those are principles that we understand. It may well be that the mineral resource taxation measure, being a policy decision, might have a principle, and I will discuss that a little later on.

I have worked out what I call an order of presentation. I am not really going formal on you, but I thought I would develop these points. I will watch the clock, and if at any time I think the clock has run its course as far as I am concerned and as far as your patience is concerned, why, I will just cut off the list and that will be the end of it for this evening.

In accordance with what I usually do, I should like to tell you about the carrots. "Carrots" is the expression I use for the goodies in the bill.

The first item is the reduction in taxes made available under this bill in respect of individual taxpayers. For instance, we know that in 1973 there was a 5 per cent reduction in tax payable as far as individuals were concerned, with a minimum reduction of $100 and a maximum of $500. In 1974, under this bill, the 5 per cent tax reduction will remain, but the minimum will be $150 and the maximum will remain at $500. In 1975 the tax reduction is increased from 5 per cent to 8 per cent, with the minimum reduction being $200 and the maximum $750.

I should tell you that in 1974, as a result of this change, Canadian taxpayers will save $380 million by the elevation in the minimum amount of the reduction from $100 to $150. Also, in 1975 Canadian taxpayers will save $615 million by the increase in the reduction from 5 per cent to 8 per cent, with the maximum being $750.

The next item of interest is clause 70 of the bill, at page 189, which deals with the deduction of interest and dividends in respect of individual taxpayers. In 1974 this deduction is restricted to net interest earned to a maximum of $1,000, but one could deduct only earned interest actually received up to $1,000. In 1975 this deduction will be extended to include grossed-up dividends, so that the taxpayer may use either interest or grossed-up dividend deduction from income, or both if they were of value to him. The use of this deduction—that is, the $1,000—in respect of dividend income does not affect the right of the taxpayer to claim a dividend tax credit.

It is interesting to note that in 1974 the provisions relate only to net interest. The effect of that is that if you borrowed money on which you had to pay interest, and then used that borrowed money to acquire bonds or dividend paying shares, you could not in 1974 do an offset in respect of that interest. That is, you could not deduct the interest you paid on borrowed money to the bank and then use the $1,000 to reduce your income from the bonds or securities. That has not been carried through into 1975. I do not know what the reason for it is, but there would appear to be this exposed area, shall I call it, which may come into use to some extent. I should tell you that dividends received from your private company—and I am sure all senators will perk up when I say that!—are not subject to this interest exemption. It is estimated that taxpayers will save $230 million in 1974, and an additional $10 million in 1975.

Then, on what is called the bonus on Canada Savings Bonds, the taxpayer has a choice of treating the bonus either as income received during the year or as a capital gain. The advantages are that he may treat the $1,000 of bonus as exempt interest and balance his capital gain; that is, if his interest requirement or interest payment does not run to $1,000. The advantage of going the capital gain route may well be that only 50 per cent of that is taxable as a capital gain. He will have to decide which course is preferable for him. Of course, he could take the whole thing by way of the capital gain route, if it is available to him and if it is to his interest to do so.

The next is the pension deduction. An allowance of $1,000 may be deducted at age 65 from a pension payment that is received by a person in that age group. There are certain exclusions—old age security and supplemental payments, federal or Quebec pensions, retirement allowances received—so that this right to deduct this $1,000, which is called a deduction from pension income, is really confined to private pension plans or to pensions received from an employer's plan. In other words, a superannuated pensioner can deduct up to $1,000 from income in addition to the $1,000 interest exemption.

All private and government pension plans, except the ones I have mentioned—that is, old age security payments, the guaranteed income supplement, benefits under the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan—will be treated as pension income eligible for deduction. These include payments from a deferred profit-sharing plan, the taxable portion of annuity payments, and payments from a registered retirement savings plan received by a person 65 years of age or over.

It should be noted, too, that a pension received in consequence of the death of a spouse will be reduced by a maximum amount of $1,000 to arrive at taxable income. On that particular item there is no age limitation. In 1975 it is estimated that the taxpayers' savings will be at least $55 million.

Then there is what they call an age exemption for the benefit of older married couples, beginning in 1975. At present each taxpayer 65 years or over may use this only to reduce his own income for tax purposes. But the bill proposes that to the extent that an individual of 65 or over does not use the exemption, it may be transferred to his or her spouse. In 1975 the estimated saving by the ability to transfer to the spouse the unused portion of this age exemption is estimated at $35 million.

[Senator Hayden]

Now we come to a very interesting subject matter, and in order to be accurate about it I have made an enumeration of the qualifications for entitlement to a registered home ownership savings plan. Since we are great for the alphabetical descriptions of these things, you will find this called in many places the RHOP.

The date for the coming into force was 60 days after the end of the taxation year 1974. That date has now been extended to April 1. If you qualify by that time, your plan will bear date January 1, 1975. Here is an enumeration of your entitlement if you decide to have such a plan. It allows a deduction of $1,000 in a taxation year, or actual contribution up to $1,000 in a taxation year, or if you pay it within 60 days after that. The maximum that may be contributed is $1,000. If the maximum of $10,000 is not reached in ten years, you may continue your contributions until the maximum of $10,000 is reached. It is available only to residents of Canada 18 years old or over, and it applies only to those Canadians who do not own a home in Canada. If a resident of Canada owns a home outside Canada he could still use the plan.

The contributions in the plan, when they are being paid up, must be applied on the purchase of a home and/or furnishings. Thus, a wife could use this plan if she does not own a home or furnishings. Withdrawals from the fund are taxable unless used to purchase a home.

While the trust administers the plan, no tax is payable. That means the accumulation of interest in the plan is not taxable. If money in trust is not used for the permitted purposes, it is taxable but subject to roll-overs. That means a method by which you can defer the payment or the incidence of tax. You can pay into other plans, like a registered retirement savings plan, or you can purchase an income averaging annuity. If the fund receives a gift it must divest itself of that right away, and while the income is in the fund all that income is subject to tax. Loans to the fund must be repaid, and there is a time limit, but while the loans are in the fund the income is subject to tax. As I said before, appreciation of the fund is not taxable.

An amount of contribution in excess of $1,000 a year must be reimbursed within 120 days from the end of the year or be taxable in the hands of the contributor, plus any earnings thereon.

The husband and wife may each have a plan. At death any fund not transferred to the wife within 15 months from the date of death of a spouse is taxable in the hands of the deceased. I had better add some more words to that in a hurry, because you will wonder how you can do that. It says, he shall be deemed to have received that money immediately prior to his death. On transfer to the wife, the roll-overs available to deferred tax are the same as I indicated before. If the beneficiary of a trust, or a contributor, ceases to be a resident while contributing, he is subject to a withholding tax of 15 per cent. The money will be deemed to be a pension. The United States would appear to be a favourite country for any person who enjoys such a plan and was going to move away, because he could escape tax, even withholding tax, by virtue of the Canada-U.S.A. Tax Convention. If you pick on another country you would not be so fortunate.

The husband and wife can get together and jointly buy a home, and they can pool their contributions. Each one can have a plan. So in that way they could have up to $20,000 plus the income earnings from that money to make use of as and when they decide to buy a home. It should be noted that they would not have to buy a home, because there is no limit as to the length of time within which this money may run, but until they used it to buy a home the only comfort and consolation they could enjoy would be in contemplation of the fund and the increasing size of it each year as the earnings accumulated, because if they were to take any part of it out they would have to pay income tax on it.

The next series I should like to refer to is that of mineral resources taxation. This is one of the principal aspects of the bill. It may take me a few minutes to deal with this subject, but I want to proceed very carefully because it has to do with the subject matter described as "Taxation of production income of petroleum and mining industries," and it is a subject which has occupied public attention and the public press over a long period of time. It is a subject matter which has created many strong differences of opinion as to the actions taken by the provincial authorities and the actions taken by the federal authorities. But in the last analysis the thing really boils down to a matter of dollars. The real issue, as I see it, is what constitutes a fair sharing of revenue from petroleum and mining as between industry, the provinces and the federal government.

I will now tell you what the relevant provisions in this bill are. In particular, clause 7(1) of Bill C-49 would amend section 18 of the act so as to prevent taxpayers in the petroleum, natural gas and mining industry from deducting from their income—and now listen to this enumeration: any royalty, tax, rental, bonus, levy or other payment made by them to the Crown in the right of Canada or a province or to a Crown corporation or body in relation to the acquisition, development or ownership of a Canadian resource property or to the production in Canada of petroleum, natural gas or minerals from a well or mine in which the taxpayer had a right to remove petroleum, natural gas or minerals.

While in ordinary discussion the subject has been discussed as "royalties," nevertheless, it is really much broader in its aspects, as you can see from the enumeration which I have given you.

As a parallel measure, clause 4(2) of the bill would amend section 12 of the act so as to add to a taxpayer's income any amounts, other than those just mentioned, or the value of any property receivable by the Crown in the right of Canada or a province or by a Crown corporation or body as royalties, tax, rental, bonus, levy or otherwise in relation to the acquisition, development or ownership by a taxpayer of a Canadian resource property or to the production in Canada of petroleum, natural gas or minerals from a well or mine in which the taxpayer had a right to remove petroleum, natural gas or minerals.

Honourable senators, I have stuck quite close to the wording of the provisions of the bill in making this enumeration because even if I were to change a word or so it might change the intent or the interpretation.

In addition, clause 37 of the bill would amend section 69 of the act so as to deem sales of petroleum, natural gas or minerals between taxpayers and the Crown to have been made at fair market value.

The problems created by these provisions may well be illustrated as follows. First, where royalties are payable to a freeholder in Alberta, the additional royalty payable to the province will be that much less than on a Crown lease. Since the above provisions only affect Crown royalties, the taxpayer paying a royalty to a freeholder will be able to deduct that royalty and so will be less heavily taxed than other taxpayers holding Crown leases. This is a far cry from the ideal of equality as between taxpayers, which was a cornerstone of tax reform hardly three years ago.

Second, provincial royalties are sometimes paid in kind rather than in cash. In such a case a part of the production from an oil or gas well never actually belongs to the taxpayer-producer, but rather remains the property of the province. Nonetheless, the proposed legislation would include the value of this production in the taxpayer's income, thereby violating the principle likewise espoused by tax reform—that income tax should be levied in accordance with the taxpayer's ability to pay.

The object of these provisions was clearly expressed by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech which he delivered on November 18, 1974, and which is to be found at page 12. The minister stated that, traditionally, provincial royalties had been deductible as business expenses, but that with the tax reform in 1972 Canada had begun the process of cutting back the deductibility of these royalties and, at the same time, had begun increasing provincial abatements so that the provinces could enjoy a greater share of the taxation of resource profits through income taxes. However, with the dramatic increase in provincial royalties in 1973-74 in such provinces as Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, notably in connection with petroleum and natural gas but also in certain instances in connection with minerals, a direct challenge had been posed to the federal authorities over the sharing of the resource taxation field. The minister expressed the view that the royalties levied by the provinces—and again I would recall to your mind the enumeration which I gave a little while ago—had risen in certain instances to such a high level that they were in reality disguised income taxes.

Let me say a word with respect to just what the provinces had done. Alberta introduced an incremental royalty which averages 65 per cent of the increased price of oil; Saskatchewan introduced a royalty equivalent to 100 per cent of the increased price; British Columbia proposed new and heavy royalties on oil, and B.C. Petroleum, which I believe is a provincial Crown company, announced that it would appropriate most of any increase in the price of gas. In the last nine months of 1974, the federal share of petroleum was cut from about 13 per cent to 6 per cent; the provincial share went up from 36 per cent to 42 per cent.

What is fair? I suppose that is a judgment which has to be made. It is certainly a judgment of prime importance, and the prime importance is the fact that it is essential to Canada that we should maintain strong and viable resource industries.

While the minister conceded that the petroleum and mining industries would be overtaxed as a result of the government's proposals, he felt that the overtaxation was not the fault of the federal government but rather that of the provincial governments. Of course, that is the way most debates go when controversies develop at that level.

Notwithstanding this, the minister did estimate that, taken as a whole, the changes wrought by the budget in the field of resource taxation would increase federal revenues in 1974 by an estimated $335 million.

As part of the changes in resource taxation, clause 78 of the bill would add section 123.3 to the act, establishing the standard corporate rate of tax applicable to resource income at 50 per cent. Clause 79 would amend section 124 of the act so that, in addition to the present 10 per cent corporate tax abatement, further abatements would bring federal taxes on petroleum and natural gas profits down to 30 per cent in 1974, to 28 per cent in 1975 and 25 per cent in 1976 and following year, and on mining profits to 25 per cent in 1974 and subsequent years.

I suppose the switch from the abatement method in disallowing the royalty deductions was part of a plan to increase the participation of the provinces in the equalization payments, or something of that kind. The end result is that the resources industries are being made to bear an intolerable fiscal burden as a result of the failure of the federal and provincial governments to reach a sensible compromise in this field.

I have some figures which show the division of the income from an existing barrel of domestic oil in Alberta, based on figures provided by the Canadian Petroleum Association. There are four checks in connection with these figures. The item in question is the retention per barrel of oil by the industry, existing before the prices were raised, of 53 cents. When the price was raised under the existing tax system it was $1.17. Before the Alberta offsets in the November 18 budget, it was 13 cents; after the Alberta offsets it was 47 cents.

I have a few observations of my own that I would like to add. The measures which are proposed in clauses 4(2) and 7(1) of the bill appear to be predicated on the assumption that whereas in the past provincial royalties were levied at a reasonable level, so that their deduction as an ordinary cost of doing business could be allowed, they have now reached such proportions as to be a disguised form of income tax. It appears that the point in time at which provincial royalties may have risen above a reasonable level was December 31, 1973, after which royalty rates payable to the Crown in the right of Alberta rose from an industry average of 22.8 per cent, as compared to customary freehold royalty of up to 16 per cent, to their present level—of approximately 65 per cent—that is, during the year 1974.

It therefore appears that in the interests of preserving a viable oil and gas industry in Canada, as a matter of simple justice and equity, and as a step towards a compromise with the provinces in this area, the proposed legislation might either be changed so as to restrict the add-back to Crown royalties levied in excess of the royalty rates prevailing at December 31, 1973, or suspended in its application until after April 15, 1975, at which time further federal-provincial talks are scheduled.

I am putting forward only my own thoughts and views, as sponsor of the bill, because overall the advantages of having the bill are greater than the disadvantages of some of the provisions in it, although these provisions with respect to resource industries are very serious, and are vital to the contingent prosperity, I would say, of Canada.

There is something more I want to add. In the late fall of last year Alberta, as a concession to producers, reduced the royalty payable to it by the producers in Alberta by 25 cents per barrel. The second thing they did was to state that they would not, in respect of tax payments under the Alberta Income Tax Act, follow Ottawa and disallow deductions as to royalties disallowed by Ottawa. I do not know whether they had their tongues in their cheeks when they made that provision but, in any event, it was a gesture of some kind. Thirdly—and this is more important—they said that they would compensate small explorers for taxes paid to Ottawa by reason of non-deductibility of royalties paid to Alberta, to a maximum of $1 million.

Under this bill we have a change in the depletion allowances. They have been changed from 33½ per cent automatic, as it is called, to 25 per cent earned depletion. To get earned depletion the explorer has to spend money so there is income from which to deduct depletion or, indeed, to reimburse himself for exploration expenses. At the present time there is a great demand in the United States for drilling rigs and equipment, and the prices for new oil are much higher than in Canada. Hence the exodus of drillers.

New oil in the United States, contrary to a definition we have in Canada, simply means that if you drill a well in a proven area it is a new well, and therefore it is new oil. We take a different view of this in Canada. The main problem of the industry is that it must earn the money and spend it on drilling in order to get the benefit of these write-offs. The sources from which the industry may get the money are its own operations, or the market place, where it may borrow or engage in equity financing, but this requires that confidence must be generated in the investors. The climate must be made favourable; incentives to attract investors should be developed. The total deductions, both federal and provincial, are a heavy hand on the ability of companies to generate a good cash flow and retained earnings. The activities of both governments, federal and provincial, are not at all reassuring in the face of the situation as it exists at this time. I think that is a fair assessment of the situation.

It is true that the companies are given, as it were, depletion allowances, and I shall just mention what else they are given under this bill. They are given a write-off on exploration expenses of 100 per cent, and they are given a write-off on development expenses of 30 per cent, but the way in which they can use these is as a deduction from their income before it becomes taxable income—before what is left becomes taxable income. But if they do not have the earnings, although they have a right to a deduction, they have no way by which they can recover it. This is a problem that should be clear to everybody. It is a real difficulty in the way of giving the right to write off expenses.

The question of what is a development expense, as against what is an exploration expense, presents a problem too. The view most often expressed is that exploration will include certain expenses incurred in drilling oil or gas wells in Canada, building temporary access roads, and site preparation in respect to the well, but in that connection all this wording seems to be based on onshore drilling. What is the position with respect to offshore drilling, which is being tested, tried out and developed in a very extensive way, and if it is successful will be a great boon to Canada on the East Coast. You can imagine the East Coast, if there is a viable oil development through offshore drilling. The whole picture of the Maritime provinces will change completely.

I should say that in resource taxation there is an abatement of 15 points of federal tax for mining industry profits which, as applied to 1974, result in a net federal rate of 25 per cent. That is for the mining industry. The new ten-point abatement for petroleum profits was introduced in 1974, increased to 12 points in 1975, and to 15 points for 1976 and subsequent years. The exploration expenditures, after May 6, 1974, will be 100 per cent of the expenditures. The development expenditures, after May 6, 1974, will be 30 per cent of the expenditures.

I have tried to summarize as best I can. I can tell you, if you went through this bill and read it as I had to read it in order to extract this information, you would find it is not easily done.

The next thing I want to deal with is the deduction for incorporated small businesses. The bill proposes to increase the annual limits on profits taxed at the low small business rates from $50,000 to $100,000 and the cumulative limit—that is the maximum—from $400,000 to $500,000. You will find that in clause 81 of the bill at pages 219 and 220.

The entitlement: A corporation that throughout the year was a Canadian-controlled private corporation is allowed the lowest rate of tax so long as it does not accumulate surplus income any more than $500,000. This applies to 1974 and subsequent years. Such corporations will have the benefit of the special 25 per cent rate on the first $100,000 of annual business income, and 25 per cent is the deduction in rate. However, the corporation rates go down to 50 per cent in 1972 by one per cent per year up to and including 1976 and remain constant thereafter. This change will cause corporation tax payments in respect of taxation years ending in 1974 and subsequent years to be reduced by $95 million. This is an effort to appease the small business company, which certainly was not satisfied. They accepted the treatment which they received in 1971, but they were not satisfied with it. In my opinion it is a view that was generally accepted, so this change should be of some value.

I then come to a point in respect of which I may quickly have to make some decisions. I will deal with this subject and then exercise my elections. This is known as FAPI. You will remember that in 1970 and 1971 we discussed FAPI in a very learned manner. FAPI means Foreign Accrual Property Income, which is a situation in which a parent or senior company in Canada has operating subsidiaries or affiliates in various places in the world. These provisions of FAPI, as they were incorporated in Bill C-259 in 1971, included rules that were not intended to become effective until 1976. So, while we challenged the sufficiency and fairness of the rules at that time, the answer was obvious. It was that we would have a long time to catch up with it, until 1976. However, now the day approaches. This is the way in this bill, in clauses 55 to 58 inclusive, starting at page 152 and going through to page 158, Canada intends to start in 1976 to tax earnings of Canadian taxpayers offshore.

The original rules have been watered down a lot and also tightened up a lot. Changes in the May, 1974, budget were significant. To summarize the FAPI rules as they are now: first, FAPI means income other than income from an active business, which would include investment income or income from anything other than a really active business. Accordingly, in the case of a Canadian taxpayer, whether an individual or a corporation, if he or the corporation has an interest in a company or a trust resident outside Canada, it must first be determined whether it is a controlled foreign affiliate. In the case of a company, is there a 51 per cent or more share ownership? Therefore, in cases in which there is that controlled foreign affiliate its investment type income will be attributed to the Canadian taxpayer and deemed to have been income of that Canadian taxpayer in the year in which it was earned by the foreign affiliate.

There are an infinite variety of ways in which that can be done, using different companies in different parts of the world. First, however, we have what is known as a de minimis rule. I do not know how you would rate the generosity of those who drafted this de minimis rule, but if the income is under $5,000, FAPI does not apply.

Next, if the foreign affiliate has earned dividends from other affiliates, if in turn these other affiliates own a number of operating companies around the world, the payment of dividends by the operating companies to the holding company of such affiliate will not generate income or FAPI which would be attributable to the top corporation in Canada so as to be taxable in Canada. In such circumstances FAPI will not include inter-affiliate dividends.

FAPI will not include dividends received from taxable Canadian corporations. This could happen if a foreign company were used to earn income in Canada, or in the case of an inherited estate, which may be deemed to be a foreign affiliate, from a father, for instance, living in another country and having Canadian investments.

FAPI will not include active business income pertaining to an active business, such as a refinery abroad. FAPI will not include amounts deductible by other affiliates from their active business income. FAPI will not include capital gains from disposition of property used principally in an active business.

Now, that is the good side of the coin. There is another side to the coin. FAPI will be deemed to arise where a taxpayer has income from property—which means rent, to illustrate—or has income from a business other than an active business, or has capital gains other than from dispositions of properties used principally in an active business. As an illustration, for one holding securities all his capital gains would be subject to FAPI rules.

Payment for services which are deductible by related Canadian taxpayers are subject to FAPI. Service income for services performed by a related individual resident in Canada are subject to FAPI. FAPI rules are designed to give appropriate relief to any foreign tax suffered by an affiliate. It applies to 1972 and subsequent taxation years.

One problem I perceive in this respect is the ability to obtain all the accounting and reporting necessary from all these operations abroad and to obtain it within time limits provided for making returns and filing them. In my opinion this would develop so quickly when these particular provisions are applicable that we would immediately have more amendments, if we were still pursuing the same form of legislation for income tax.

The next item I wish to discuss is registered retirement savings plans, which we discussed extensively in 1970 and 1971. This is only one angle of it. Clause 99(3) has been amended in this respect to permit a taxpayer in respect of his 1974 and subsequent taxation years to make contributions not exceeding his annual limit to either his own plan, or that of his spouse, or both. So this is relieving.

I developed one section, which I believe I could exclude tonight. It is in relation to the provision for partnerships and is highly technical, clarifying and, I would say, relieving. Therefore I would propose not to proceed with that.

I wish to make a brief comment when I speak of another group of sections. With respect to the White Paper report and in our consideration of the tax bill in 1971 implementing the White Paper proposals, our committee raised strenuous objection to the proposals and to the bill, in that roll-over provisions were too restrictive on share-for-share exchanges, and section 85, transfer of properties and take-over bids and statutory amalgamations, which also widen roll-over provisions, are all consistent with our earlier recommendation. These were aspects of the legislation to which we forcefully called attention at that time. There has been a development of the extension of the roll-over provisions. Now, those are mysterious-sounding words but all they mean is that a transaction may be carried out without attracting tax. Up to the present time when two corporations amalgamated, only if the shareholders of the particular predecessor corporation obtained 25 per cent of the shares of the amalgamated company was the roll-over available. This bill removes the 25 per cent limitation.

With respect to the transfer of all property to a Canadian corporation by a shareholder, clause 48, section 85, is one of those roll-over and transfer of property clauses, and has been repealed in part. This enables a taxpayer to transfer property under the tax-free roll-over provisions.

The limitations which are in the act as it now stands—which require that a taxpayer, after the disposition had been made, must have not less than 80 per cent of the issued shares of each class of stock in the corporation—have been done away with. The list of property has also been extended to include inventory.

I come now to the elections which one has to make in order to be able to operate under these provisions for roll-over—in other words, the ability to pay dividends without attracting tax. Section 83 of the act deals with an election in order to declare a non-taxable dividend out of 1971 capital surplus or tax paid undistributed income on hand. Section 85 deals with election for roll-over treatment on transfer of property to a corporation.

As I have said, the limitations which exist in order to qualify for entitlement have been altered substantially. There was a very substantial penalty if one did not make this election within a certain limited period. Due time for filing this election is before the dividend becomes payable. That is being substantially reduced. If one is late in filing, it is a very small percentage figure.

In the transfer to a Canadian corporation from a partnership, the treatment is the same as if the taxpayer, resident in Canada, had disposed of all his property to a corporation. He also enjoys a roll-over or transfer from a partnership to a corporation.

In the winding up of a Canadian corporation, there is the distribution of substantially all property to shareholders deemed to have been disposed of by the corporation immediately before the end of the taxation year so deemed to have ended for proceeds equal to the fair market value thereof immediately before that particular time. Shareholders are deemed to have acquired the property at an amount equal to its fair market value, which is exactly the same figure as the corporation is deemed to have received on the winding up. So no tax problem is presented by this.

I am beginning to realize that I have talked long enough. However, there are one or two points that I should touch on briefly. One is the question of fast write-offs.

Tax cuts effective January 1, 1973 reduced the prevailing general corporate tax rate on Canadian manufacturing and processing income from 49 per cent to 40 per cent, and on small businesses from 25 per cent to 20 per cent. Assets—being manufacturing and processing machinery and equipment acquired for use in Canada after May 8, 1972, and before the end of 1974—can be written off in two years. There is a proposal in the bill to remove the December 31, 1974 deadline.

I have figures to show how these changes will affect corporations. It would be a fair comment to make that in many of the provisions which relate to corporations there is an increase in the corporate tax recoveries by the government as a result of the changes which have been made, and to that extent there is an offsetting of some of the concessions which they have made to individuals.

Notwithstanding that, there is a substantial amount of benefit, over what the situation was before, to individuals, and there is a substantial benefit to the provinces. Under the equalization payments, allocations proceed on a higher base and therefore produce more money for the provinces.

Heretofore financial companies were entitled to report their interest income on a cash or accrual basis. In 1975 and thereafter they will have to report on an accrual basis.

There are other provisions, but I shall not go into them at this time. I shall refer to only one, which is the aid to the construction industry. The November budget permits a loss created by the claiming of capital cost allowances to be deductible against other income. Heretofore loss had to be added to the capital cost of the property. The period applicable, November 18, 1974 to December 31, 1975, applies only to construction commenced during that period, and further, it applies only in respect to multiple-unit residential buildings for rent or unit housing. No other type of loss is allowed arising from depreciation.

That pretty well covers the area on which I had planned to speak. Although there may be other points which might contribute to my providing information for honourable senators, I should like to close by saying—and I may be in order in saying this—that the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee held hearings in connection with the subject matter of Bill C-49, and heard witnesses. The committee reached some conclusions, and formulated them under headings. However, since the bill was on its way to us, it was felt that the committee could not properly make an interim report to the Senate on the subject matter. I discussed the matter—and advised the committee of my action—with officials of the Department of Finance. I arranged an appointment so that our staff and the senior members of the Finance Department who work in the field would have an opportunity of seeing what we were proposing, and to study it. The appointment was made for 10 a.m. I thought the meeting would last about an hour. I was unable to attend, but our chartered accountant and legal counsel were present, and the conference continued until approximately 5 p.m. Therefore, there was complete understanding on what the proposals were. It appeared from that discussion that some of the proposals were certainly clarifying, and the question would be one of what risk there would be if we did not deal with those clarifications right away and say, "This is on our platter for dealing with technical matters in the next series of amendments." Some of them could have been dealt with administratively.

The question I was concerned about and which I shall be concerned with when officials appear before the committee and we obtain their views, is whether any hurt is sustained by any person in the period before that clarification fully develops by way of amendment.

What is the best way of dealing with the matter? If administratively they can deal with these as matters of interpretation, it would appear to me, at least—this is in the hands of the committee—that there is not a real or substantial basis for saying, "No, you must do it now," as long as the net result produces a result which is very close. I think if we are going to have differences, the differences should be substantial.

Honourable senators, I am sorry I have taken so long. I have been an hour at this, but I did not feel I could shorten it any more than I have. I hope you have picked up something from what I have said.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask the sponsor of the bill one question? It rises out of the latter part of his remarks when he was referring to the recommendations, if there are recommendations, that the committee felt it should pass on to the officials.

Is it the intention of the committee to report these to the Senate in due course so that we will know exactly what it is that the committee had in mind to propose if there had been time?

Senator Hayden: I think it will work out in this fashion: once the bill is referred to committee and the departmental officials are in attendance—they have all this material and have had an opportunity to study it—we will question them. Our course of action thereafter will depend on whether or not we are satisfied with their explanations.

Certainly, if we are not satisfied it may mean a report with amendments. If we are satisfied, I would certainly support the position that in the report there should be a recital, such as we have had in the past, to indicate those matters which were developed and the answers which were given and any undertakings as to how they would be handled. All of that should be recited in the report of the committee, even though it is a report without amendment. Those observations would not be recommendations. In my view, to have them as recommendations would be tantamount to a report with amendments.

The value I see in exploring this area lies in being able to resolve the differences that exist, if they are non-substantial and simply of a clarifying nature. The incidence of tax is not such that there is likely to be any great hurt if they are not done right away, particularly if methods are suggested when these things are brought to the notice of the department and undertakings are given to find a way to deal with them.

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, may I ask a question of the sponsor of the bill? First of all, I want to compliment Senator Hayden for his well-known, unique and admirable way of explaining a very complicated piece of legislation. I am not one who has been able to take his preliminary course respecting this bill, as the powers that be have not seen fit to grant my request, made several times over the last few years, to be a member of this committee. However, I did hear the Minister of Finance deliver his budget speech upon which this bill is founded.

My recollection is that when he compared his proposals of November 18 with the proposals contained in the May 6 budget, which was defeated, he said he had backed off with respect to taxation of petroleum resources to the extent, I think, of about 20 per cent. I believe he said that if the provinces were to do something along similar lines there would be considerable relief to that industry. My recollection is that Alberta also did something subsequent to the November 18, 1974, revised federal budget. Perhaps Senator Hayden could explain in percentage points, or in some way, just how less onerous the taxation on petroleum resource industries is now as compared to what it might have been had the provisions of the May 6 budget prevailed.

Senator Hayden: I did give some figures. While I do not have additional figures here, they are readily available. I discussed the industry retention as it is under the existing tax system, which would be prior to the budget of November 18 and prior to the time Alberta made any change or reduction in its position, but after it raised the royalty rate to 65 per cent. I said that under the existing tax system, the industry retention was 53 cents per barrel prior to the November budget, and in November, before Alberta introduced certain offsets, the industry retention was 13 cents per barrel. After the Alberta offsets, the industry retention was 47 cents.

There is a further calculation. If the December 31, 1973 figure of the average of royalty payments is taken as an acceptable figure—and that would be the traditional figure based on the position of the government over the years in allowing royalty deductions—that being 22.8 per cent, it would produce another 39 cents per barrel. Taking into account the Alberta and federal positions, the industry retention would be 86 cents per barrel. You also have other factors by way of expense allowances, but you have to spend money. First you have to find it in order to have something that you may deduct from.

Senator Benidickson: That is not really my question, Senator Hayden. I did hear you compare the rates of taxation as of December 31, 1973, and as of today and under this bill. I am wondering whether your committee has any figures to indicate what the taxation will be under this bill as compared with the rates proposed in the May 6 budget and as a result of some further adjustments which I believe were made by Alberta, for example, after the November 18 federal budget.

Senator Hayden: We have those figures, but I do not have them here tonight.

Senator Buckwold: May I ask the honourable senator a question? You have quoted some adjustments in the Alberta rate which indicate a cooperation on the part of that province to meet the problems that have been created. Have there been similar adjustments on the part of Saskatchewan, which is also a major producer?

Senator Hayden: I am not aware of any.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ACT

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 6, the debate on the motion of Senator McDonald, for second reading of Bill C-10, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, the government has given low priority to this bill. Bill C-10 was introduced and given first reading in the other house on October 4, 1974. Second reading and debate took place on November 18 and 19, and it was discussed in committee for about a half an hour on February 4 of this year, with the Honourable Otto Lang, the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, as the sole witness.

Third reading with a short debate took place a month later on March 3. It took five months for the minister to process this short bill, which had received the approval of all parties. I am sure that the Senate will give the bill much faster passage after full consideration of the terms and implications.

● (2130)

I should like to commend Senator McDonald for his lucid presentation of this bill in this chamber on March 6. The main clauses were adequately explained and the arguments for their implementation were convincing. This makes my task, therefore, rather an easy one, particularly because we on this side of the house support the bill in principle.

I am glad that Senator McDonald mentioned that this legislation has been in effect for about 17 years and amended only once, in 1968, when the maximum was raised to $6,000. In this respect he was much fairer than the Honourable Otto Lang who, as the minister responsible for this act, made no reference at all to the original legislation. Since the minister must have been aware that this bill was an amendment of the earlier act, it appears that he must have political motives for not referring to the original legislation. Apparently he is so partisan that he cannot give credit to his opponents, even when their measures are good.

The first cash advance legislation was drafted in the fall of 1957 by the Honourable Alvin Hamilton of Saskatchewan, minister in the Diefenbaker government. At that time farmers all across the country were in a desperate situation. Large reserves of grain were piled in the elevators and on the farms. Many hunger-stricken regions throughout the world were in need of our grain, but the market arrangements were slow. The Diefenbaker government decided that it was not the fault of the farmers that the grain could not be sold rapidly. The farmer had the right to get cash advances on the grain that he produced, obligating himself to pay back these advances, without burdening the federal taxpayer. The Liberal opposition of the day, however, vehemently opposed this measure and voted against it.

In the meantime, the Liberals have undergone a conversion, a change of heart. The world is going through another cycle of great food shortages and suddenly the government becomes interested in the world food problem. Realizing that grain shipments may be slow in the wake of strikes, and that farmers were reasonably happy with the legislation of the former Diefenbaker administration, the present government turns full cycle. It now is sponsoring cash advance payments to farmers, making necessary changes to meet the current needs by taking into account the rapidly rising costs of production and spiralling inflation, which are undermining the agriculture industry and the living standards of the Canadian people.

The Conservatives welcome this change of heart on the part of the Liberals. Experience is a great teacher, and we want to believe that the Liberal government is learning from experience.

We in the opposition believe that Bill C-10 is in the best interests of the grain producers and the country. This is a good piece of legislation, the principle of which we fully endorse, and we shall have carefully to take into consideration the changes that have taken place in agriculture in the last 20 years.

Let us review the main thrust of Bill C-10. The maximum amount paid to a producer as advance payments in respect of grain to be delivered under a permit book would increase, first from $6,000 per farm to $15,000; secondly, where the producer under the permit book is a corporation, partnership or a cooperative, to $30,000, where two shareholder partners or members of 18 years or over are principally occupied in the farming operations of the actual producer; and thirdly, to $45,000 for three or more shareholder partners or members.

I agree with Senator McDonald and Senator Argue that this is a step in the right direction, and that it will temporarily meet the needs of the vast majority of farmers and the corporate or cooperative farms on the Prairies. The prices of grain are at a high peak now but the costs of production are rising very rapidly. The prices may fall drastically in the future, but production costs seldom go down. This situation would be catastrophic to agriculture. To avoid such an undesirable conjuncture of circumstances, the government must take measures to stabilize the farm industry very soon.

It has been emphasized that these loans are not a hand-out by the federal taxpayer to the western farmer. The record to date of the repayment of these loans has indeed been an excellent one. We learn that the farmers have paid about 99.9 per cent average of cash advances throughout the past years. Honourable senators can see from this outstanding record that farmers can be fully trusted to cooperate in plans which they regard to be of benefit to themselves.

It should be noted that the sponsor of this bill in the other house is Mr. Otto Lang, the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Under this bill the government wishes to encourage farmers to sell through the Wheat Board and not on the open market. It is apparent that many farmers are not delivering their grain to the Wheat Board. There are probably many reasons for farmers to behave in this manner. It may be that they are seeking a better price on the open market because they are unable to get sufficient cash from the Wheat Board, or they are considering income tax benefits.

With the proposed cash advances, the farmer can now probably make a sounder judgment with respect to these alternatives, as this would offset the cash pressure in time of his greatest need, if he still desired to deliver to the Canadian Wheat Board. If, according to Senator Argue, it is true that at least 90 per cent of the farmers vote for the Wheat Board system, then this legislation goes a long way to strengthening the advantages of this system for the benefit of the farmer.

It is the Canadian Wheat Board that has been assigned the responsibility of administering this act, now in existence for 18 years. The grain companies act as agents of the government. These elevator agents must have considerable paperwork in handling the administration involved in these cash advances to farmers. I would like to know how and how much these agents are compensated for their time and work in administering these transactions for the government. I would like to know more about the responsibilities of these agents in assessing the amounts of the cash advances to the farmer as well as their liabilities in the collection of accounts. I think that an agent is in a very difficult position, trying to satisfy the government through the Wheat Board on the one hand, and the customers with whom he lives in the community on the other hand. Since the agent performs the most important role in administering the act, I would suggest that one or two of these functionaries appear before the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture when it will be dealing with this bill.

It is difficult to forecast the real effect of this legislation on the economic situation in the Prairie provinces. In 1969 farmers borrowed some $272 million in cash advances, a very high amount, but that was the year of operation LIFT, when there was plenty of grain in the bins but the producer was short of cash. In the crop year 1972-73, however, only $20 million was borrowed under this legislation and this is a low figure. It appears obvious that cash advances are not the solution to the problem of marketing but only a factor.

I am wondering about the possible abuses that could be practised under this legislation. What would prevent farmers from taking interest-free cash advances and investing them for a short term at a high rate and thus make money on the deal? This would be good business, if it could be done.

Senator Argue: Some do it.

Senator Yuzyk: Could not a farm corporation or large partnership borrow the maximum of $45,000 interest-free and then invest this sum for a year, and at today's rates reap a profit of at least $4,500? Have there been any such cases in the past?

I am glad that the sponsor of Bill C-10 in the Senate intends to refer it to committee. In that case the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board should appear as a witness. I should like the minister to explain the advantages of elevator agents acting on behalf of the government, and also to show that farmers would get better returns if they delivered to the Wheat Board for export purposes rather than selling on the open market.

Senator McDonald: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator McDonald speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, I may be completely wrong and misleading the house in what I am about to say—if so, I will apologize tomorrow—but I think I heard on the radio during the supper hour that today bill number two, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, was introduced in the other place. It was described as bill number two because the bill presently before us is bill number one. If I am right in what I think I heard, I do not think we should proceed with this debate.

Senator Grosart: It is a separate bill.

Senator Benidickson: Yes, but it might have a bearing on our study of this bill. I would, therefore, move the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps the sponsor of the bill, who was about to speak, could deal with that point. Can we conclude our debate on this bill without waiting for another bill to come before us?

Senator McDonald: Honourable senators, I have no information about a bill in the other place. The honourable senator mentioned this to me earlier in the evening, but I have not been able to obtain any information.

Perhaps I might be allowed to answer one question that was put by Senator Yuzyk. Senator Yuzyk wanted to know if it was possible for a farmer to borrow $15,000, or for a corporate farm to borrow $45,000, and invest that money.

Senator Choquette: Excuse me, but is the debate adjourned or is it not adjourned?

Senator Grosart: Senator McDonald is only answering a question.

Senator McDonald: I am not closing the debate; I am just answering a question.

On motion of Senator Benidickson, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Copies of Report on Uranium Enrichment, dated September 3, 1971, issued by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Report of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1974, pursuant to section 22 of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion Act, Chapter R-4, R.S.C., 1970.

Report on operations under the Regional Development Incentives Act for the month of December 1974, pursuant to section 16 of the said Act, Chapter R-3, R.S.C., 1970.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

CONNAUGHT LABORATORIES LTD.—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am pleased to bring to the attention of this house information regarding the activities of Connaught Laboratories Ltd. in reply to the questions raised by the Honourable Senator Sullivan last week.

Connaught Laboratories Limited is owned by Connlab Holdings Limited which hold the different interests of the Canada Development Corporation in the health care field. The CDC in turn is owned by the Government of Canada. Connaught, Connlab and the CDC all have their own boards of directors, which have full responsibility for the operation of these companies. Two senior government officials are ex officio members of the CDC board of directors, and the Minister of Finance currently elects the balance of the board at the annual shareholders' meeting. As can be seen, although the government has the ability to ensure that longer term policy objectives are adhered to, it has deliberately placed itself in the position of not having to be responsible for the day-to-day operations of the CDC and its subsidiaries. This allows the CDC to operate like a private sector company, in line with the provisions of the CDC Act.

The Honourable Senator Sullivan asked a question about a proposed land sale by Connaught Laboratories. The question was:

Does the government approve of the proposed sale for a housing development?

I have to say that this is a matter which, because of the explanation I have given, does not come under the purview of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

The honourable senator's other questions related to the possible danger of micro-organisms and infected animals being kept at the laboratory for the production and testing of vaccines and antisera. Dangerous micro-organisms are handled in many institutions, such as hospitals and universities, which are located in residential areas. The types of facilities and methods employed in these institutions to control the spread of micro-organisms are well established and, I have been informed, have been proven not to present a health hazard. The procedures employed by Connaught Laboratories Ltd., and the precautions taken to segregate potentially dangerous micro-organisms and infected animals, are such that there is no cause for concern by local residents.

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Hayden, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bourget, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-49, intituled: "An Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax".—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. J. Harper Prowse: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Has the Honourable Senator Prowse leave to proceed in the place of the Honourable Senator Flynn?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Prowse: Honourable senators, I notice that you look a little worried, but it is not my intention to speak for four hours without notes. It is my intention, however, to say a few things which I think should be said and which have not been said up to this time by anybody. It looked for a while as though there might be an opportunity to do so on an inquiry placed on the Order Paper by Senator Manning, but he has not proceeded with it, and I understand he may not proceed with it.

I think it is time that certain information is placed before this house and, it is to be hoped, before many of those Canadians who have been just as confused about the current oil situation and government action as they ever have been with regard to anything that has happened in this country. I do not think anyone is particularly to blame, but neither do I think that anyone is blameless. I believe that all levels of government—the Government of Canada, the Government of Alberta, and the other provincial governments—were acting in what they each believed to be the best interests of the Canadian people. That they happened to come into conflict merely results from the fact that if you try to serve the interests of one province it is not unusual to find yourself in conflict with the interests of another province.

One of the bases for our continuing complaint in western Canada arises from the simple fact that if a political party hopes to form the government of this country, its platform must be designed to attract the majority vote in the central provinces. Otherwise, it will not form the government. But if the platform is so designed, it ought not to surprise anyone if it does not suit as well as we might like the extremities of this large and diversified dominion of ours. This applies to our oil policy as well as to anything else.

Another problem we faced in my province of Alberta is that our premier and the other provincial premiers and the Prime Minister of Canada agreed to a price of $6.50 per barrel for oil last year, and they all thought they were acting in a statesman-like way. But there is no way in the world that the Premier of Alberta or the Prime Minister of Canada or myself or anyone else, or any combination of us, could convince the people of Alberta, or of any western province for that matter, that if it had been Ontario or Quebec oil, we in Alberta would be getting only $6.50 for our oil when the world price was $11. There is just no way that westerners could be convinced of that. I am not criticizing Ontario and I am not suggesting that they would not have done it; I am simply saying that that is one of the facts of life that we have to live with out there.

To go beyond that, I think that as far as Alberta is concerned—in spite of all the things that have been said by the media generally and by a whole lot of people who do not have too much information and background on the subject—the producing companies are reasonably well satisfied with the arrangement that now has been reached between the oil companies and Alberta and with the legislation which we hope to pass at the present time.

One action on the part of the Government of Canada which resulted in a great deal of misunderstanding was that all of a sudden they changed what everyone had considered to be the basic rules of oil development financing arrangements for the last 50 years or so. It has certainly been so since 1947, when it became important in this country that royalties be approximately 12½ per cent. That was the original figure suggested by our friends in the oil companies, who undertook to advise us, I must admit, to our advantage. This amount increased and has always been a deductible expense, together with depletion allowances and other items. I must admit that I could never quite figure out why an oil company using up Alberta's oil should be given special tax concessions and then be allowed to take that money to go and obtain oil from elsewhere in the world when all we would have left would be empty holes. It seems to me that the government and the property owners, rather than the exploiters of the property, should have been receiving the depletion allowances.

At the time of the change of that rule, as obviously it was a bargaining point, I am sure the government did not take the oil companies into their confidence. It would have been wrong for them to do so when discussing budgetary matters. However, with the change the oil companies and those involved in the oil investment business suddenly found themselves with a whole new set of rules. They simply felt helpless, exposed and naked to an unkind chance, without a star to guide them or anything to float on, not even waterwings. This caused a great deal of the problem.

At first it looked as though the Province of Alberta would receive approximately 60 per cent of the oil profits, with the federal government, through its export tax and proposed income tax, receiving approximately 30 per cent, leaving the oil companies with approximately 20 per cent. As a matter of fact, in the application of this arrangement, Alberta has reduced its take and allowed the oil companies room to live, because the cost of producing Alberta oil is not all that great. They were making money on oil at less than $3 per barrel, so it is pretty hard to explain to the public that the oil companies are hard done by when allowed $6.50 per barrel.

In Saskatchewan the oil companies under existing combined federal and provincial taxes are producing at a loss of eight cents per barrel on the average. That situation will continue for I do not know how long. It may be that Saskatchewan, in its particular philosophy, wishes the companies to abandon their leases and go out of business. It could be. I do not intend to comment on the situation in British Columbia, because I do not think even the premier of that province could explain what they are doing there.

Now we have a basis for operating in Alberta, but one of the points still misunderstood is the export tax applied by the federal government. It is not a tax on Alberta oil, but a tax applied by the federal government on oil which has been collected in and separated from Alberta and now is the property of oil companies, or those in the oil business. Government really has no interest in that at all. It applies not only to oil companies which originally paid tax to the federal and provincial governments under a related system, but also to people who paid practically no tax at all because they were getting their oil from land acquired on a freehold basis, which brings in another situation.

The biggest thing of all—this is something which this chamber should look at—is that as we watch this play go on it becomes obvious, when we talk about a fair division of the spoils, fair shares and reasonable profit, that we are talking in terms of the public utility principle. Everyone in this country, from government officials—by that I mean elected government officials—to public servants, members of all political parties, newspaper columnists and the publishers of newspapers, and certainly editorial writers, seem to have taken for granted the fact that oil is now a public utility. If we want to make it a public utility, I would be inclined to go along with that, and consider it a good idea. But there is something wrong, particularly when government proceeds as though a decision has been made when the subject matter of the decision has never been the subject of public discussion, as is the case here.

I had the opportunity of being the Leader of the Opposition in the Alberta Legislature for much of the time that Senator Manning was premier of that province. Someone in another place has been described as being the secret weapon of the Liberal Party and the basic cause of their success at the polls. I suppose I might be described as Senator Manning's great weapon and the basis of his success at the polls, because I helped him to establish his record of remaining in power longer than any other premier of any government in the history of the British Empire. While he did not always take my advice—sometimes he did not take it at all—from time to time he did take some of it after he had figured that the people had forgotten that I had offered it. I told him that it was all right, that none of it was patented, and if it worked out to everyone's benefit that would be fine.

If I ask honourable senators, "What is the purpose, the function, of an oil company?" you would answer, "The same as that of any other business corporation," and you would follow that up by saying, "To maximize profits." You would be wrong, but you do not have to take my word for it.

I have a sneaky idea that some members of this honourable house might like to have something better than my word for some of these statements, which they might not have heard before. I have here a book which I obtained from the Library of Parliament. It came into the possession of the library on May 1, 1974, but no one borrowed it until I did on September 6, 1974. I have had my hot little hands on it ever since. It costs $22.50, but this way I get to keep it for nothing. It is called The Pricing of Crude Oil: Economic and Strategic Guidelines for an International Energy Policy.

I would have thought that someone on Parliament Hill would have been looking for this book. I was surprised to find that my curiosity seemed to have exceeded that of others. I also received a shock when I looked for one or two other books, and found that they had not been borrowed.

This book is written by a man named Taki Rafai, and I shall give honourable senators an idea of his qualifications. If I did not offer to do so, I am sure that Senator Croll would want to know. I shall not read the whole of his qualifications, but simply say that Dr. Rafai worked for over eight years with the Institut Français du Pétrole, and the book represents his ideas on oil research and development. The views and opinions expressed in the book are strictly personal, and do not affect the formal thinking of the institute.

The book has some bearing on the discussion we have had involving producing countries and consuming countries. The author has made some statements regarding the purposes of oil companies. This is the type of thing I think you will be interested in, and about which I started out to tell you. He writes:

● (1420)

The basic strategy governing the international petroleum industry and commanding the plans and action of the majors is a strategy of power, not of profit. It is obvious that once you have acquired power, you not only get profits but also the assurance of their permanence and continuity. The strategy of the majors is articulated upon long-term universal objectives, and within such a framework partial, short-term plans are drawn up and optimized through the multitude of affiliates making up the group. Should any conflict of interest arise between strategic objectives and occasional short-term plans or objectives, the latter are generally sacrificed.

[Senator Prowse.]

And he goes on.

The oil companies have been managing for many years the international price of oil and the price we actually pay for the gasoline and petroleum products we use, not only here, but in all parts of the world. In fairness, it has to be said that they have exercised this power with almost incomprehensible reasonableness. That might arise out of the fact that they had their properties taken away from them in Mexico, and they got into trouble with the government of the United States as well.

But they do it pretty well. Their operations in the Middle East have been tied in closely with the external affairs departments of all the major powers in the world, except Russia. At times, it has been impossible to be sure whether the Department of the Secretary of State of the United States was a branch of one of the major oil companies, or whether the oil companies were branches of the Department of the Secretary of State. They were that close. Who actually made the decisions, I do not know, but I would bet on the oil companies.

The Province of Alberta set up an oil and gas conservation board. From where does that board get its information? From the oil companies. We have a National Energy Board in Canada. From where does that board get its information? The only place where it is available—the oil companies.

How do they handle things, and how do they work? They don't hit people over the head. I was giving them a bad time in Alberta, and I got a phone call one day from a fellow with whom I went to school. He was enrolled in engineering at the time I first met him, and I was enrolled in an arts program. In any event, he called me one day and asked whether I was willing to meet with him and a couple of other chaps. I was. When we met I found out he was one of the vice-presidents of Imperial Oil. He explained the situation to me. At that time I was trying to persuade people that we in Canada would be well advised to have a pipeline to Montreal so that we would not be dependent on oil from foreign sources being shipped via tankers—a supply that could be easily cut off by a submarine fleet in the event of hostilities. I was trying to persuade people that we should be a self-contained unit. We had a market in Canada. All we had to do was drop the price of oil by 10 cents a barrel in Alberta, thereby making us competitive in the Quebec market. In other words, we could have done it without petroleum products costing a cent more in the province of Quebec.

In any event, this chap's reply to that was, "Well, the trouble is, Harper, we can go down 10 cents here, but the fellows on the other side of the ocean can go down 60 cents." But guess who owns the oil that could go down by 60 cents? The same company that owns the oil in western Canada which could go down by only 10 cents. In other words, a different branch of the same company was manipulating the prices to the benefit of the company.

I found this a reasonable explanation, and this chap is a nice guy. I am sure he is not a crook. If any person told me that man is a crook, I would say he was lying. He may have been a little overcome by his continual exposure to a particular line of thought, but he is certainly no crook.

We increased our production in the province of Alberta to the point I am talking about now. The reason I say we would have been able to afford to reduce the price by 10 cents a barrel is because our conservation board was only allowing the producers to produce about 50 per cent of what would have been the safe geologically determined capacity. Why was that? Because that was the amount of oil necessary to meet the nominations for oil from the pipelines that carried it from Alberta and from local sources. Who controlled those local sources? There were a lot of independents. This was felt to be a good thing, this kind of arrangement, where the pricing was arranged, set and agreed to, because you cannot say how much of anything you can sell until you have agreed what the price will be. If you change the price you are going to vary the demand for the quantity.

This sounded like a reasonable deal, and it was explained to the independent oil men that this was a really good thing for them, because it assured them that there would be a market for the products of their wells in the major refineries, and even down into the States, where we went, because this allowance would be allocated between the fields and pools and down into individual wells; the little guy would get the same chance to sell it as the big guy.

There was only one thing I did not like about that kind of arrangement; there was no competition. There was no way there could be competition for a market. It gave the little guy just enough to keep him quiet, and it ensured that he could never get enough to become sufficiently large to get his own refinery so that he could get into competition with the big boys.

Those are the kinds of things that were going on, and God help us all if the governments of Alberta and Canada, and the people who are representing us in all of their arrangements, do not keep this in mind in what they are doing.

We are told that with the tar sands business right now we are getting a really good deal from the two companies there. I will not bother naming them. Between the different levels of governments involved we are going to put up about $600 million. The other fellows will presumably put in $1 billion. Could be. They, it is said, have the know-how. To hell they have the know-how. The only body that comes close to having a little bit of know-how is the Great Canadian Oil Sands, who have now been operating for six, seven or eight years. They are operating on a process that was developed during the war by Abasands under C. D. Howe. At that time the oil that was produced from the sands was put on tank cars at Fort McMurray, and by the time it got to the closest refinery they could not get enough for it to pay the cost of taking it that far.

These fellows in Great Canadian Oil Sands have got the best piece of the sands, because they have got the least overlay. The one with the next best has got a little more overlay. Great Canadian Oil Sands are having a lot of trouble with the sand, but they have pretty well got hold of that; they know what it costs them, and at present prices they can break about even and perhaps make a little money. I am sure they could have expanded or doubled their process for less than $1.5 billion. After all, they do know how to do it because they have been doing it. If the other companies happen to run into some clay with the stuff they are working with, heaven alone knows how long it will be before we get production from whatever it is they are after.

It has been said that eventually we will have to depend on in situ, which means leaving the oil in the ground and producing it that way. This could be the answer. These fellows have been working on this for 14 years. They have the know-how, and the know-how they have is that they don't know how to do it! To date all their experiments have indicated that there is no way they have yet come up with that enables them to recover, with the super-heated steam injection method, oil from the oil sands on a basis that stands any chance of being commercially feasible.

Going on from there, let me tell you something else, because there are things we ought to be thinking about. When everybody starts to talk about oil, saying that we are going to be short of oil, I remember that when I went to school I was told we had a lot of coal in this country. I come from the southern part of Alberta. I was born and brought up in a little town, which was part mining town. It was actually a dried-out district until they brought irrigation along. However, I did learn a little bit about coal and a little bit about oil.

It was thought that Hitler would not be able to wage war at all because he had no oil, but he did wage a war pretty successfully for five years without any particular supplies of oil, because he did not get all that much out of Rumania even when he over-ran it. He used substitutes made from coal, and our planes had trouble keeping up with the Focke-Wulf fighters.

Now they say, "Well, there are one or two things to be worked out yet." Sure there are. There will always be one or two things to be worked out until all of the conventional wells have been drained dry. But I will tell you this: a report went out from the federal government 18 months ago pointing out that if oil should ever rise to the astronomical height of somewhere between $5 and $6, it would then become reasonable to expect to provide refinery liquified feed stock from coal and competitive prices—somewhere between $5 and $6. At 65 cents per m.c.f. for methane, which is CH₄, which is the gas you put into the pipe line, you can make it out of coal and get all of the by-products as well.

If you think I am "whistling Dixie," and that this is still just an innovator's dream, you can do what I did: a little research. I looked through some of the literature from South Africa one day and discovered they had something going with coal. I suggest that you have a look at the South African Coal, Oil and Gas Corporation's Annual Report, 1974. In 1955 they started to produce petrol from coal. That was at a time when they were competing with Iranian oil which they were getting for about $1.80 a barrel f.o.b. the Gulf. And that involves far less transportation than for Iranian oil to go to northwest Europe or to come here. By the end of this year they hope to be providing about 30 per cent of their needs of petrol. Then they are going on to natural gas.

I will not bore you with all the details, but I am telling you that the processes have been worked out. They are German processes which have been worked on there. They have done some refining. Certainly, the processes are there and can be used.

My guess is that all these fellows at the top, who are giving the government advice, have been oil oriented, because either we had to borrow them or we rented them from an oil company or we let an oil company give them to us for $1 a year or we got them from geological departments which hoped that there would be jobs in oil companies for all their students. They are all completely petroleum oriented.

I certainly think someone should have been looking at coal before this, because I have an idea that for the amount of money which is going to be put into that second tar sands plant we could build four plants able to produce probably one million barrels of oil per day, or sufficient gas to meet a year's supply—certainly into the export market. Whether we ought to be doing the oil first or the tar sands first, I do not know, but I think we should be discussing it on that basis. We should be discussing this whole business of energy, to see if it has not become too big to be run under the public utility principle, whether it becomes publicly owned or not. These are the types of problems which I think we owe it to the people of Canada to become informed about. There has been no way we could be informed up until now.

There will be some research going on. The big problem between Alberta and the government officials here—with the two young ministers and the young Premier of Alberta, who have all been suspected of having had ambitions in respect of becoming the Prime Minister of Canada—the big problem is that they were in competition with one another. The Premier of Alberta, Mr. Lougheed, felt that it was his responsibility to get the best possible deal he could for Alberta. I cannot fault him for that. I remember that I took the stand—and I did not win any elections on the stand, which probably speaks more for the Canadian outlook of Albertans than it does for me—that if anyone wanted to use our gas and oil all he had to do was come to Alberta and use it. I took that stand because, in looking at history, I found that the basis for Britain's becoming the greatest trading nation in the world was that she used cheap coal, which was power. What was all the fighting in the Saar Basin in Europe for? Cheap coal, which was power. What have we now in Alberta? We have the only power that is left.

Let me tell you something about the tar sands about which nobody else has bothered to say anything. The supposition is that two barrels of tar sands have to be burned to provide the necessary energy to produce one barrel of the synthetic product which they finish up with. Maybe what we should do is build our next atomic plant right up next to the tar sands and use that cheap power to provide the necessary energy so that we can use all three barrels, because the tar sands are useful not only as a source of energy but as the basis of all the chemicals in the petro-chemical industry, producing all of the things you could want or could dream of.

Honourable senators, I have abused your patience long enough. I hope you will agree with me that I have brought to your attention, perhaps in a manner not too well organized, a number of questions which are of the utmost importance to the people of Canada and which ought to be a matter for deep and careful study and consideration by all of us to whom the people of Canada look for leadership, guidance and care.

Hon. Harry Hays: Honourable senators, I should like to make a small contribution to this debate. First, I should like to commend the mover of the bill on the excellent job he did last night in explaining a most complicated bill.

The few observations I have to make are the result of my experience, and I make my remarks because I think it will be well to know exactly what oil companies are going through now. I speak as one sitting on the executive of one of the largest independent oil companies of Canada.

Today we sold oil in Chicago at $12.65 a barrel. That is what we were paid. Of that, 65 cents was used for transportation, which left $12. The federal government took off the top $5.50 plus $1.64 for income tax. The Government of Alberta—because most of our production is in Alberta—received $2.34 for royalties and 39 cents for income tax. Our operating costs were 65 cents to produce one barrel, to get it from the well head to the pipe line. This left us with $1.48 per barrel out of the $12.65. Out of the $1.48 it is expected that we will look after all of our administration costs. In addition to that we are supposed to find new oil.

Since 1969 our company has spent over $100 million looking for oil. Not all but a great part of it has been in Canada. Almost every month I have sat at a table and watched our geologists, young, brilliant men, grow old bringing back reports on their findings. I believe these people are competent and efficient. Certainly their work in finding structures is competent.

Often we had partners. Sometimes our partners were large oil companies, sometimes they were small; sometimes we had 10 per cent of the action, sometimes we had 60 per cent; sometimes we had all of the action. In any event, we were generally associated with good companies but, in spite of that, we did not find enough oil with that amount of $100 million to grease Senator Forsey's car. That is how difficult it is to find oil.

My colleague from Alberta spoke about coal. At the time he was arguing with Senator Manning about things in the legislature, I owned a piece of a coal mine under the city of Edmonton. We were down there shovelling it, so I really know what coal is all about. My best friend drilled the Leduc well that opened the Leduc field. This was a great breakthrough insofar as oil is concerned. One of our contracts was to supply the University of Alberta with coal. I remember that famous well. I was there several days after it was discovered. It was drilled by General Petroleum, and the friend I mentioned was Cody Spencer. I remember that he was instructed to put 600 feet of casing in the well. When the well blew, it blew the casing out and twisted it like a wire. There was so much pressure. A million barrels of oil were on the ground, but fortunately it did not catch fire. They were able to pick up the oil and Senator Manning, who was the premier at the time, permitted the people who owned it to go ahead and sell it. They had all the wells screwed down to the extent that they would only produce about 30 per cent, but they made something over $1 million by selling the oil. That was the beginning of the Leduc field. These people did the offsetting of this field.

After that I remember that we kept shipping coal, although it was not long before they had a pipeline to Edmonton. Then we had a strike at our mine. The miners decided that they wanted coffee down in the mine. At this time we were losing a considerable amount of money, and we never opened up the mine after the strike. We pulled down the tippie, and filled in the hole. I remember very well that we left two cutters that cost $15,000 in the ground, and they are still in there. I hope Senator Prowse is right about coal. We can soon open up the hole and use the cutters again, because the mine was dry when we covered them up.

It matters little whether it is a question of an American company or a Canadian company. If all you are going to leave these people to enable them to produce and find new oil is $1.48 a barrel, then they have an impossible task.

We have been drilling wells in the United States, on the gulf coast, in the North Sea, and in the Mediterranean. If we drill a well in the United States, and it is new oil—of course, it is touch and go, as Senator Hayden said last night, as to whether it is a new field or an old field, insofar as old and new oil are concerned—we get $12 a barrel for that oil, but only $1.48 in Canada. People say, "Well, you go to the United States to drill your wells." But what else can the oil people do?

I think Canada is exporting something like 814,000 barrels a day, and we import about the same amount. We pay about the same amount for a barrel of imported oil as we receive for a barrel of exported oil. Remember that for the last five years we have not been finding as much oil as we have been using. We are losing ground every day. People say, "Well, perhaps all of the fields have been drilled out." I cannot subscribe to this.

I remember the Turner Valley field well. I do not remember the dates too well, but I think it was in 1912 or 1914 that they drilled the first well in the Turner Valley. They got down to within 400 feet of oil and they could no longer finance it, so they abandoned the well. This was in the old days of tool equipment. Ten, or possibly 15 years later they came back, the Royal Bank having put up the money, and they went down another 400 feet and got oil. That was the beginning of the Turner Valley field, which extended from there all the way to the American border. You never know where these structures are; you may find them anywhere. However, you have to keep looking for them.

Certainly, when we consider this bill in committee, we should look at it very closely, and I do not think we should be in all that big a hurry to pass it, because it is very important. After all, the government was defeated on the budget. It is almost a year since it was first introduced, and I think we should take a long look at it. I think the oil people really have a point when they say, "We cannot find oil with this sort of money." Indeed, I do not think they can.

Honourable senators, I thought you would be interested in knowing the breakdown of the expense of producing a barrel of oil.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Flynn, I move that the debate be adjourned until later this day.

Motion agreed to.

PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator McDonald for second reading of Bill C-10, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators will recall that I adjourned this debate, not being certain that I had heard correctly that there had been introduced in the House of Commons yesterday a "Mark II" bill, or a second version of an amendment to the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. I have ascertained that that is correct, so I do not make the apology that I said I might have to make to the house today. Perhaps the sponsor of the bill has something to say with respect to this second bill.

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator McDonald speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator McDonald: Honourable senators, last night when Senator Benidickson adjourned the debate and made the remarks he did, he was referring to the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, No. 2, which will be presented to this house as Bill C-53 at some later date. The bill was given first reading last night, it will be printed, and will eventually come to this chamber. In reality, however, it has nothing to do with Bill C-10 that is before us at the moment.

The only comment that I want to make is in answer to a question that Senator Yuzyk asked last night. If I understood his inquiry properly, he was wondering if it was possible for a farmer, or a group of farmers, to take advance payments, or to take the opportunity of advance payments, under this act, and to use that money as an investment. The answer to that question is yes. There is nothing to prevent an individual or group of individuals from taking a loan under this act and, if they are fortunate enough not to have any debts, they may invest that money in Canada Savings Bonds or any other security. However, I am sure Senator Yuzyk is already aware, although other members of this house may not be, that the number of farmers in western Canada who would be in that position is very limited. Very few farmers are going to take a cash advance, which is interest free, invest it even at 10 per cent interest, and continue to pay up to 24 per cent in interest on their debts. And I can assure you that the vast majority of prairie farmers today have debts incurred by reason of land, equipment, livestock or some other purpose.

Apart from that the only reason for cash advances is that on some occasions the Canadian Wheat Board has not found it possible to sell the farmer's product, namely, grain, on the markets of the world in order to give the farmer some income. I suggest to you that on those occasions when the farmer is not able to sell sufficient grain to meet his operating costs and to continue his activities as a grain farmer, then this legislation is desperately needed. To those people who have been fortunate enough to be able to take a loan and invest it, I say God bless them.

Motion agreed and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Senator McDonald, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES REPRESENTATION BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 6, the debate on the motion of Senator Prowse, for the second reading of Bill C-51, to increase the representation of the Northwest Territories in the House of Commons and to establish a commission to readjust the electoral boundaries of the Northwest Territories.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, Senator Prowse, the sponsor of the bill, did not say this was a simple bill, but on the other hand its passage through the other house, and up until now, through this house, has certainly been very speedy. There is an understandable reason for this in that I am quite sure the purpose of this bill is agreed to by all members of both houses, that purpose being, as was indicated by Senator Prowse, to provide for an additional member of the House of Commons from the Northwest Territories.

At the outset of my remarks I should like once again to draw the attention of the Senate to the difference between bills as they come to us, that is to say, the printed bills as passed by the House of Commons, compared to the same bills when presented for first reading in the House of Commons. I feel that this is a pity because we are all aware that for some reason, which has never been explained to me, we do not find carried through in the bills when they come to the Senate the draftsman's comments, and in this bill the draftsman's comments would probably amount to about half as much as the bill itself and would be very useful. I am going to suggest to the Leader of the Government that, unless there is some good reason why it should not be our practice, we should include the draftsman's comments on the bill when it comes to us from the other place. I know it is always possible to go back and get the bill as it was presented to the House of Commons, but it would be much easier and much simpler to follow a debate if the draftsman's notations were still in the bill when it is presented to us.

The bill we are discussing is in two parts: the first part deals with the addition of one Commons member for the Northwest Territories, and the second part deals with the necessary arrangements to set up boundaries for what would be the two new constituencies in the Northwest Territories.

Part I, of course, is an amendment to the British North America Act. Constitutionally it is rather interesting for the reason that it amends the act of 1867 as amended by subsection 51.(2) as enacted by the British North America Act, 1952. The reason this amendment is necessary is that section 51.(2) of the act of 1952 provided for the first member from the Northwest Territories and described the boundaries of the Yukon and then said:

—and such other part of Canada not comprised within a province as may from time to time be defined by the Parliament of Canada shall be entitled to one member.

So the entitlement in that act was as "a part of Canada not comprised within a province." It is significant, of course, that the Northwest Territories have moved along from that rather indefinite definition to the status today where they are now entitled, or will be when this bill is passed, to two members in the House of Commons. Of course, this means that the British North America Act will now be cited as the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1975.

It is a bit difficult to understand the delay in bringing this reform about. A similar bill was before the House of Commons in 1963 but died on the Order Paper when the election was called in that year, and the incoming government did not pick it up again. Now, some 12 years later, we are finally coming around to it.

Senator Lamontagne: It did not fall within the 60 days of decision.

Senator Grosart: I do not think it was included in the program for the 60 days.

Instead of the definitive measure proposed in 1963, I believe the decision was then to appoint a commission, which may be typical of the differences between the two administrations. In that connection it is perhaps worth pointing out that Senator Prowse omitted—and he tells me it was a lapse of memory, and I am sure it was—he omitted to say that our native Indians received the federal franchise for the first time in 1959, and our Eskimo population for the first time in 1962. It is sometimes well to remember some of the achievements of those days because there is a tendency to forget them in the subsequent era of much less achievement.

Senator Prowse: I can assure the honourable senator that I did not forget it just because it was Mr. Diefenbaker's government which did it.

Senator Grosart: I am quite sure that if Senator Prowse did forget, then that fact would be the last reason to make him forget.

Perhaps I should also refer to another delay that I find difficult to understand. It relates to representation of the Northwest Territories in the Senate. There is a bill, C-3, printed, but it has not come before us and I do not think it has even come before the other place on second reading yet. It deals with the summoning of a senator from the Territories. I hope I will not be accused of being immodest if I recall that two years ago I introduced a bill in this chamber, Bill S-3, which would have provided for the appointment of a senator from the Northwest Territories. One would hope that there would be more speed in dealing with that matter now that we are granting the Northwest Territories a second member in the House of Commons.

Mention was made of the population covered by this measure. Senator Prowse worked from a basic 38,000 but felt that it might possibly be 50,000. I think it is rather less than that, somewhere in the region of 40,000, with the result that we will have two new constituencies, each with a population of approximately 20,000 people. This will make them, of course, possibly the smallest constituencies in Canada, although the Yukon has about the same population as either one of these new constituencies will have.

There has been some question of the names of the new constituencies. Mackenzie has been suggested, which of course was the old name of the constituency before it became the Northwest Territories. It has been suggested that one constituency be Mackenzie and the other Franklin. On second thought, Mr. Wally Firth, M.P., who is, if I may use the term, a native Canadian and the member for the Northwest Territories, suggested that East Arctic and West Arctic might be appropriate designations for the constituencies. Personally, I would hope that it might be a little more romantic than East Arctic and West Arctic. The Eskimo name Innusiq has been suggested for one of the constituencies, and certainly we can look forward to a little more imagination than might be indicated by such designations as East Arctic and West Arctic. After all, we have done rather well in Canada by using our native names, such as Quebec, Toronto, Saskatchewan, et cetera, which in my opinion are rather more typical of Canada than some of the other names which refer to cities elsewhere in the world.

Part II, which amends the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, as Senator Prowse pointed out, has the useful distinction of making it fairly certain that the commission to be appointed will be fully representative of the Territories or of people who have a first-hand knowledge of the Territories. The appointment of the chairman will be at the discretion of the Chief Justice of the Northwest Territories from judges of the territorial courts. Appointments will also be made from among persons resident in the Northwest Territories. As to the other members, I was a little confused at first by clause 6, which provides that:

The chairman of the commission for a province other than the Northwest Territories shall be appointed by the chief justice of that province from among the judges—

And so on. Clause 6.(3) provides that:

The two members of the commission for a province other than the chairman and the Representation Commissioner shall be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Commons from among such persons resident in that province as he deems suitable.

I wondered how that could apply to the Northwest Territories, because it says distinctly "The two members of the commission for a province other than..." Then I find, interestingly, that in clause 4.(2) it is provided that:

In this Act, a reference to a province or to provinces does not include the Yukon Territory but does, unless otherwise provided, include the Northwest Territories.

It is a rather strange way to my mind of enacting this, but it might give some hope to the people of the Northwest Territories that they are now finally approaching provincial status. Here, for the first time in any legislation that I know of, it is said that the word provinces now applies to the Northwest Territories. Many of us are aware of the unhappy situation in which we Canadians find ourselves in holding two territories (the Yukon and the Northwest Territories), actually close to half of our whole land area, under what is "neo-colonialism". We have this large number of Canadians and this large area, perhaps a half of the total land area of Canada, without the benefits of representative responsible government as enjoyed by Canadians in the provinces.

The reason given, of course, is the usual one, that it is a very small population. However, the real reason is that this small population has the largest share of Canadian resources. We are therefore reluctant to advance them, for this and other reasons, including the historical reason of all colonial powers, that of having a vested financial interest in keeping them as they are. Of course, this is perhaps emphasized by the situation in the matter of resources, of which Senator Prowse and Senator Hays have just spoken, that, in fact, it is in these areas that many of our resources of the future are to be found. If this reference means that slowly, and I am not suggesting that it should happen tomorrow, both these territories, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, are moving towards the full citizenship rights enjoyed by other Canadians, it will be welcome.

There has been discussion here from time to time with regard to the Electoral Boundaries Act and continual revisions, certainly of names and suggested revisions of boundaries. It is interesting that contained in this bill, again for the first time, is a definition of the considerations to be taken into account by the Boundary Commission. It has been suggested that it would be an excellent thing and would satisfy a great many members of Parliament if the same conditions were applied to the boundary commissioners who will decide the new boundaries of House of Commons constituencies. They are:

- (i) ease of transportation and communication within the electoral districts;
- (ii) geographical size and shape of the electoral districts relative to one another; and
- (iii) any community or diversity of interests of the inhabitants of various regions of the Northwest Territories.

We have heard members of the House of Commons complain on many occasions that these basic considerations are often ignored by commissioners in delineating boundaries.

Finally, honourable senators, clause 10 might be predictive in another respect. It sets the date when the boundary commissioners must report. It was said in the other place that this legislation will apply only to the next Parliament. The deadline for the report is the first day of March, 1976, which may or may not have some other significance.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Prowse moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

LAW REFORM COMMISSION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. W. M. Benidickson moved the second reading of Bill C-43, to amend the Law Reform Commission Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the Law Reform Commission of Canada was established about four or five years ago. The Minister of Justice at that time was the Honourable John Turner, who spoke very enthusiastically on the rights and future use of this commission. This bill proposes a slight change in the format of the personnel which compose the commission.

The act provides for a commission consisting of a chairman, vice-chairman, two other full-time members, plus two part-time members appointed by the Governor in Council. I am told that based on actual experience the concept of part-time membership has not worked very effectively. While the part-time members have regularly attended meetings and have kept abreast of proceedings, they are, however, limited during periods between meetings because of other activities associated with their private professions and commitments. Those activities and commitments have hindered their effectiveness, particularly in their contribution to the ongoing research of the commission.

Consequently, the purpose of this amending bill is to eliminate the positions of the two part-time members of the commission, and to increase the number of full-time members by one.

The term of one of the part-time members expired last November, and the term of the second will expire in May. However, clause 7 of the amending bill provides for the continuation in office of that second member.

The present members of the commission are Mr. Justice Patrick Hartt of Ontario, chairman; Mr. Justice Lamer, vice-chairman; Mr. Gerald Laforest and Dr. Hans Mohr, full-time members. The continuing part-time member is Madam Claire Joncas.

It is interesting to note that while the work of this commission has not received the public interest which I think it deserves, the front pages of the local press last night reported on the latest working paper to emanate from the commission. It is most appropriate that this working paper has been presented in International Women's Year, because it deals with the controversial subject of family property and, in particular, the sharing of marital assets in the event of separation and divorce.

While there is a recommendation in respect of joint property for spouses of both sexes, it is anticipated that in most instances, if this recommendation eventually becomes law, it will be of particular benefit to wives. As honourable senators know, there have been vigorous protests against recent judgments under which wives, who had worked on farms, say, all their lives and had made a tremendous contribution to the development and improvement of the farm property, were adjudged, on separation, to have no claim to that wealth which in a practical way most of us would conclude had been achieved by joint effort.

Then again, while the work of this commission during its four years of existence has not attracted the public attention which I think it deserves, it is interesting to note that within the past week the Montreal Gazette carried two very interesting stories relating to the work of the commission, written by Professor Philip Slayton of McGill University. I commend the reading of those articles to members of the Senate, because they review and praise the work undertaken so far by this commission.

I did not come here with one of those black books, but I did ask the commission to give me an indication of some of the work it had done in the past four years.

I read the proceedings of the committee of the other place to which the bill was referred after it passed second reading. During the debate on second reading, a member of the Opposition challenged the Minister of Justice, and said:

This has been operating for four years. What law has been changed in consequence of the setting up of this reform commission?

The Minister of Justice, when examined in committee, reported that so far everything that had come from the Law Reform Commission had been by way of a working paper without recommendations, which it was hoped would be circulated and result in a fair amount of public comment.

For some members of the commission this has been rather slender hope and disappointing results. On the other hand, when I asked for some of this material, I was presented with a carton of publications which I would estimate to be roughly two feet square, and one and a half feet high.

The topics on which the commission has been working are varied and exceedingly interesting. I asked what their program is for the current fiscal year, and was informed that they would continue with their working papers—not the ones published, but those which they will continue to work on and hopefully present to the public—on such subjects of the law as maintenance, divorce, imprisonment, mental illness, limits of criminal law, corporate criminal responsibility, code of evidence—they have already produced several expansive volumes on evidence, which I have seen—pre-trial procedure, the Criminal Code, principles, guidelines and structures thereof, et cetera.

We then reach the point of asking when we are going to have recommendations which will place some additional onus and responsibility on legislators to act in amending laws which have become antiquated. I am told that for the forthcoming year their objective is to make recommendations in the field of substantive criminal law, family law, code of sentencing, and expropriation. In addition there would be the continuing study of 11 papers and background papers which are of great interest, and the publication of an informative annual report.

Honourable senators, while I have not been an active practising lawyer, I keep clippings and other material on subjects in which I have a personal interest. When I was asked to sponsor this bill, I looked up my file on the subject of law and lawyers, and was quite shocked to be reminded that I had put aside for an appropriate inquiry an article headlined: "Over Half Fail Quebec's Final Bar Examinations," which was written in 1972. I thought that surely the basis of law reform would be an adequate basic law educational system. The situation has probably improved in the province of Quebec, but certainly as of now some findings respecting law education would be of interest. I repeat, surely an adequate educational system in law is the basis of good law.

● (1520)

Members of the legal profession in the province of Ontario now total about 10,000. That gives a ratio of one lawyer to roughly 860 persons; ten years ago the ratio was one to 1,170. In 1964 there were 233 students serving under articles in Ontario, whereas in 1974-75 there were 850 entering articles pending bar admission courses. In 1963-64 the bar admission course in Ontario cost $833. It does not cost much more now; in 1974-75 the cost is $1,083.

I referred earlier to the surprising number of failures a few years ago in the province of Quebec. I find that in 1973-74, out of a class of 719, only 15 failed. Either the teaching is appropriate to the taxpayers' expenditures on schools, or we have far better application on the part of the students to take advantage of the opportunities offered.

Senator Langlois: Or fewer strikes.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps the lawyers are getting worse.

Senator Benidickson: To point out some of the difficulties of those seeking entrance to professional schools, of 1,800 applicants for the law course offered at the University of Ottawa last year only 180 were accepted. This, I imagine, is applicable to other areas.

Another subject which has given me cause for concern, and one which I thought should be drawn to the attention of my colleagues at an appropriate time, concerns the governing bodies of our professions. The governing bodies of the medical and legal professions control, to a very large extent, the education, recruitment, income, discipline, and so forth, of members of those professions. That, again, has improved in the last few years. There are now representatives of the public at large on those boards. This change came about, of course, as a result of provincial legislation, and I think it is a healthy step.

Before I take my seat, I would suggest to the Minister of Justice that in respect of this particular commission lawyers should not occupy as many as seven seats out of eight. We have thinkers and people qualified in various other walks of life who have opinions on the operation of our laws, which should be considered as well as those of legally trained people who are inclined to "clubbiness" and self-protection, or a little bit of elitism. As I have already said, there is one non-lawyer on this commission, a sociologist, and he is making a contribution of consequence to its work.

In effect, honourable senators, this bill increases the number of board members by one, and eliminates the part-time members. We have the assurance that during the course of the coming fiscal year a good many of these valuable working papers which have been widely circulated will be put in the form of formal recommendations to the Minister of Justice. It will then be up to parliamentarians to act on such recommendations.

On motion of Senator Choquette, debate adjourned.

POVERTY

REPORT BY THE NATIONAL COUNCIL OF WELFARE ON CHILDREN IN POVERTY IN CANADA

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, if you can spare me ten minutes, I should like to bring a document to your attention. I think you will find it of interest. May I have your permission to proceed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Croll: This document is entitled, Poor Kids, and is a report by the National Council of Welfare on Children in Poverty in Canada.

The National Council of Welfare is a national body, on which all provinces are represented. It has an office in Ottawa, and has operated over a period of time.

What struck me in this report was the introduction, and some of the particulars which normally would not be brought to your attention. I think you will be interested in hearing them. I liked what I read, and thought you ought to share it. I quote from the introduction as follows:

Canadians like to believe that ours is a society in which all children are born with equal chance to rise as far as their abilities will carry them. Though they begin their lives in very disparate circumstances, we comfort ourselves with the belief that success is as attainable for the child of humblest origins as the most affluent. The facts, however, are otherwise. To be born poor in Canada does not make it a certainty that you will live poor and die poor—but it makes it very likely.

To be born poor is to face a greater likelihood of ill health—in infancy, in childhood and throughout your adult life. To be born poor is to face a lesser likelihood that you will finish high school; lesser still that you will attend university. To be born poor is to face a greater likelihood that you will be judged a delinquent in adolescence and, if so, a greater likelihood that you will be sent to a "correctional institution." To be born poor is to have the deck stacked against you at birth, to find life an uphill struggle ever after. To be born poor is unfair to kids.

Of the 6.76 million kids under the age of 16 in Canada at the time of the 1971 census, 1.66 million were poor. This report is about those kids. It is about the lives they are living today and the prospects for the years that lie ahead of them. It is about growing up without—without as much food as other kids get, without the toys, the clothes and the outings that other kids get. And it is about growing up marked with the stigma of poverty instead.

It is important that we, as Canadians, understand the effects of the present inequitable distribution of national income on those who suffer the misfortune of being born to families living below the poverty line. It is important that we understand as well that the thousand cruelties that poverty visits on the children of the poor can be ended. Children need not grow up in poverty in Canada because there need not be poverty in Canada.

Then it makes a very interesting point:

The tax system and the income security system together determine the patterns of income redistribution in this country. The changes that are made in these systems as a result of the present federal-provincial review will affect the lives of every one of Canada's poor kids. New programs that are adequate to raise Canada's poverty families out of poverty will transform the futures of these poor kids. Inadequate programs will leave them facing the grim prospects that mark the landscape of their lives today.

There are a few facts in this report that will interest you, such as these:

The census found substantial numbers of children living in poverty in every region and province in Canada. The highest proportion was in Newfoundland where almost half of the province's children (45.3 per cent) were in families with incomes below the poverty line. More than a third of the children in Saskatchewan (38.4 per cent), Prince Edward Island (37.3 per cent) and New Brunswick (34.9 per cent) were likewise living in poverty. Even in the "rich" provinces of Ontario and British Columbia... more than one child in six was living in a family with less than a poverty level income.

The poverty level income that they speak of is the poverty level that I would ask honourable senators to allow me to put on the record, a copy of which was sent to you a few days ago. May I have permission to do that?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is that agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

SENATE REPORT: Poverty level set at 50% of average Canadian family income adjusted to family size, making provision for inflation and gross national product.

[Senator Croll.]

STATISTICS CANADA: Minimum income needed by a family which has to spend 62% or more of its income on basic necessities: food, shelter and clothing.

Senator Croll: These are interesting statistics:

Among children in two-parent families across Canada, 21.2 per cent were in poverty; among those in male-headed single-parent families, 33.7 per cent were in poverty; among those in female-headed single-parent families, an incredible 69.1 per cent were in poverty.

That is the kind of deal some of the women get.

There is just one other point they make that I think is well worth repeating. Talking about welfare, they say:

After almost two years of working parties and task forces the federal-provincial social security review has reached the point where the value choices must now be made. This was spelled out quite clearly by the Minister of National Health and Welfare in a recent speech: "Income Redistribution: A Question of Community Ethics". The politicians will make their choices based on what they believe to be the community's choices.

There can be no hiding behind myths that we can't afford to ensure income adequacy to all Canadians. The recent federal budget proved that. The Minister of Finance redistributed $1.75 billion for the 1975-76 fiscal year through reductions in the personal income tax alone. He redistributed another $885 million of the 1975-76 national income by changes in sales tax and tariff provisions, more than half of this—$450 million—through reduction of the sales tax on building materials.

All of this $2.6 billion that the government has chosen not to collect represents a redistribution in the national income. But in what direction? The personal income tax cuts range from $200 for those in the lowest tax bracket to $750 for those in the highest. In other words, if you were too poor to pay taxes you got nothing; if you were a low-income taxpayer you got $200; but if you were already rich enough to be in the top tax bracket you got $750. The rich got most, presumably because they needed it least. Are these our values?

What brought me to this, and what bothered me a great deal, was the fact that we were talking about $2.5 billion. I will not take an oath that these figures are accurate, but yesterday I sat down to work something out. If you took into account the wildcat and illegal strikes, and the consequent loss of production and wages in Canada this year, you would have enough to finance the basic guaranteed income for one year at the present time.

These people, of course, again recommend the guaranteed income. We did not invent it. What we in this chamber did was to get it off the ground as a social and political movement. We made the idea of it respected, practical and acceptable.

I ask honourable senators to take the opportunity to read this booklet. It was carefully done; it was done in a humane fashion; it is well written. It will give you an insight into Canada that you do not get at the present time.

Thank you very much for giving me your attention.

Senator Benidickson: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Two or three days ago I read a press report, presumably based on this publication of the National Council of Welfare. I believe the National Council of Welfare is funded by governments, and the appointments are mostly made by governments. Has the honourable senator made any inquiries as to why we as parliamentarians did not get this report, when we get so many other publications that we do not need in our mail?

Senator Croll: All I can say is that when I heard about this report I called the department and asked them to send me over some copies, and they sent me two copies. I cannot answer that question. Perhaps the Leader of the Government could answer it.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8.15 the sitting was resumed.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from earlier this day the debate on the motion of Senator Hayden for second reading of Bill C-49, to amend the statute law relating to income tax.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, when I first read Bill C-49 my reaction was quite the same as Senator Hayden's. My memory went back to 1970 and to 1971 when we dealt with the White Paper on fiscal reform and the bill based on it. That bill was a tome of 700 pages, and it was meant to clarify, simplify, and substantially reform our income tax laws.

Three years have passed and we have acquired some experience. If they demonstrate anything, those years demonstrate irrefutably that, if we ever managed to get out, we are now back in the same jungle. In fact, I would say we are into an even worse jungle than that which we were supposed to be getting out of by means of this legislation. Three years have passed and we now have before us for consideration the fourth bill to amend that 1971 legislation. The three previous bills cover 180 pages in the statutes, and this Bill C-49 runs over 300 pages. And, as Senator Hayden mentioned, that does not in the least take into account the thousands of pages of regulations, directives, and opinions put out by the revenue department.

When we were considering the 1971 bill, if memory serves me correctly, I expressed grave doubts as to the value of the method which the government planned to use at the time; that is, an overall reform as compared to a step-by-step or subject-by-subject reform. It seems to me now that experience proves that we did not accomplish much, that the reform was less than a huge success. Of course, apart from clarifications and corrections in adjustments, the present bill deals with problems of substances, to which I will refer later. At this time I merely wish to fill in the background of this legislation which, after all, is merely intended to continue the so-called reform of 1971.

Now, I agree with what Senator Benidickson said yesterday about the sponsor of the bill. I think no one else in this place would be able to explain a bill of that complexity in as lucid a manner as Senator Hayden, and we are most grateful to him for that. For the sake of personal experience, I tried to read some of these provisions to see if I could understand what they meant. Quite frankly, I was not able to understand anything from reading them. The only way I can understand anything like this is when the department, or the minister, in the budget speech, says, "I want to amend the law in order to achieve such and such a thing." Of course, the draftsmen have to express the minister's opinion, or the views of the department, in matters of corrections and clarifications, but they certainly do not succeed in producing anything easily comprehensible. I very much doubt that anyone could understand this bill from simply reading it. You would have to have examples for each of the numerous clauses in this "brick," as Senator Hayden called it, if I am not mistaken.

This afternoon I was reading in Maclean's about Tommy Douglas, and about how Stanley Knowles used to boast of Mr. Douglas's being able to read an editorial twice and have it memorized word for word. He would probably be able to memorize any section of this bill after reading it twice, but I bet he wouldn't understand it or be able to explain it.

Honourable senators, the most important part of this bill is, of course, based on the budget speech the Minister of Finance made last November. At that time the minister claimed that the measures contained in this piece of legislation (a), would bring an end to both rampant inflation and slow economic growth by stimulating increased output and productive capacity; (b), would sustain economic growth by moderating the prices of certain products, maintaining real incomes and stemming the erosion of the value of savings; and (c), would decrease personal income taxes by about 15 per cent.

That, of course, was before the minister was rudely awakened to the economic facts of life. Now, even he has been admitting for the past month that the assumptions upon which he based his November 18 budget are no longer valid. New realities are upon us. The November budget was based on the prediction of a four per cent real economic growth rate this year, and the creation of 250,000 new jobs. We know now that neither of these figures will be attained, and we know a few other things all of them equally pertinent and all equally depressing. Our economy has not been in worse shape since the recession of 1957. How is that for a statistical starter?

In the last quarter of 1974 the real growth in the GNP fell at an annual rate of 5.2 per cent. There was a slower rate of growth in labour income, a decline in corporate profits, a record trade deficit, and a serious slowdown in the growth of consumer expenditures. Real growth in the GNP was not what had been anticipated. It was far from the six to seven per cent once predicted by the government. It was not even the revised four per cent prediction of late 1974. In fact, it was 3.7 per cent. Worse than that, if anything could be worse than that, is the fact that economists are now expecting a real advance in the GNP in 1975 of no more than 3.5 per cent.

From November 1974 to February 1975, the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate jumped from 5.5 per cent to 6.8 per cent. The unadjusted figure rose from 6.1 per cent to 8.6 per cent. In the month of February alone the total number of Canadians out of work rose from 817,000 to 893,000. I am not imitating Paul Martin now, I am basing these facts on real verifiable statistics.

Even though he admits—and I am now speaking of the minister, not Paul Martin—that the November budget is no longer valid, the minister still wants this bill passed. He realizes that the measures contained in it are insufficient, but he wants them anyway. His department brought in a whole carload of amendments when this bill was in the other place but none of them was of any great substance. So we are placed in the ludicrous position of having to discuss legislation that the minister admits will be ineffective in achieving the goals which he has set out. The arguments suggested for not making significant and fundamental changes in this bill are that such changes should come in a new budget. But we have no commitment that a new budget will be brought down in the near future. This is orchestrated nonsense, and our efforts here will be of no value because there is nothing in the bill which will make any significant difference in the economic problems that presently beset us.

● (2000)

Our most serious problem remains—and I am sure everybody here will admit it—inflation. I feel that I must remind you of that because some Canadians are becoming so accustomed to having inflation around that they are learning to co-exist peacefully with it. The federal government's attitude continues to be that inflation is somebody else's fault, and with that sort of facile and spurious reasoning they have succeeded in anaesthetizing their consciences and justifying their scandalous inaction.

{Senator Flynn.}

Inflation is essentially the result of excessive government spending—not entirely, but mostly. The government becomes involved, for the sake of continued electoral support, I suggest, in all sorts of new hand-out programs which the country cannot really afford at this time. In order to finance these programs it, in effect, waters down the currency. It is as simple as that. It is an old practice—as old practically as recorded history.

Inflation is a tax—there is no doubt about that—and a very insidious tax which provides the government with the huge sums necessary to buy support without their having to add to the burden of direct taxes. It is sly and underhanded, but, apparently, successful.

One of the classical ways of fighting inflation is for governments to exercise restraint in their spending. So what does this government do? It preaches restraint, but then proceeds to set records for government spending. In the years since they came to power in 1968 this administration has increased government spending by close to 150 per cent. Using national accounts as a guide, we find that government expenditures will rise from $23.7 billion in the fiscal year 1973-74 to $34.9 billion in the fiscal year 1975-76. That is a 47 per cent increase. And this is done by a government that continues to claim that it exercises restraint in spending. National accounts figures differ from those contained in the estimates because they take into consideration money spent financing pension plans such as old age pensions and the Canada Pension Plan. Again, according to the national accounts figures, direct personal income taxes from the taxpayers of Canada will rise from the $11 billion that they were in 1973-74 to $15.9 billion in 1975-76, an increase of 44 per cent.

The minister also forecasts in his own budget that personal income taxes will skyrocket from the $7.9 billion they were in 1973-74 to $11.35 billion in 1975-76, an increase of 43 per cent over two years and an increase of 105 per cent as compared to the fiscal year 1972-73.

Senator Hayden spoke convincingly last night, but not convincingly enough. He spoke of reductions in taxes in this area amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars. But I should point out that he mentioned the figures not by way of praising the government or by way of supporting the reductions, but simply to inform the Senate.

However, what he did not say was that these reductions notwithstanding, the total amounts raised by the federal government in taxes have continued to rise unabated. Let us not try to snow the Canadian people. That is not what we are here for. The plain fact of the matter is that Canadians will be paying more taxes this year than last year, and will pay even more in 1976 than in 1975. The figures are there to prove it, and they are the government's own figures. Direct personal income taxes will rise from $7.9 billion, as I said, in 1973-74 to $11.35 billion in 1975-76—an increase of 43 per cent in only two years. So, in spite of what the government says, taxes are rising.

Now, what about the number of actual taxpayers? This government has in recent years made pious noises about how it is cutting all kinds of people from the tax rolls. Well, let us look at the figures. In 1971, 7,372,571 Canadians paid taxes; in 1972, 8,081,015; and in 1973, 8,495,000. This represents a constant increase—an increase, in fact, of 15.23 per cent in the number of people paying taxes while over the same period the population of Canada increased from 21,568,311 to 22,095,000, or only 2.44 per cent. So there you have it; not only are taxes rising, but the number of actual taxpayers has also increased.

This government claims it is trying to stimulate growth in the economy by reducing personal income and sales taxes, and cutting back on government spending. The facts tell a completely different and a very sad economic story. This bill certainly will not diminish the total amounts raised in taxes. Therefore a means must be found to force this spendthrift government to stop wasting. One of the easiest, and, of course, most effective, means would be to deny them tax dollars. The Progressive Conservative Party has suggested that personal income tax be lowered for a start. The 3 per cent provided in this bill is not sufficient. It should have been reduced by a further 5 per cent. That idea, however, was defeated in the other place.

The warnings by various responsible and objective bodies engaged in economic research are worrisome indeed. They predict that the 1975 growth in real GNP will be marginal, approximately 3.5 per cent, which is about half of our real capacity. Our economy needs a better tax break, but I do not see it in this bill. Tax monies should be returned, to a minor extent, to the individual taxpayer to generate demand. But to a major extent it must be returned to business. We must increase corporate spending power, and give back to producers more of the savings now being taxed away from them so that they can be re-invested in more efficient and expansive growth. The government did this for some manufacturers by reducing the rate they must pay on income and by increasing their capacity to write off new capital investment. Why not extend this, or equivalent relief, to other forms of production, more particularly resources production, when its benefits have been so clearly demonstrated in the new employment created?

Honourable senators, let me turn now to the problem of resource taxation. The Minister of Finance says that the crux of the problem is: What constitutes a fair sharing of revenue from petroleum and mining, as among industry, the provinces and the federal government?

All other considerations—for example, consultation instead of confrontation with the provinces; maintaining a viable oil and gas industry; security of oil supplies for Canadians; jobs for Canadians—all these factors, so far as the government is concerned, are of secondary importance, if one can believe the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and the Minister of Finance.

All that this government is really interested in is how big a share it will get of the resource profits.

The government argues that in January 1974 it suggested sharing these revenues with the provincial governments of British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan, and it was because the provinces refused that in May, and again in November, the government brought in budgets that would no longer permit royalties paid to provincial governments as deductions against federal income tax.

A document was presented at that January 1974 meeting of first ministers by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It suggested a percentage distribution of revenues. It stated that, with a wellhead price of $6 per barrel, it would be reasonable for the oil producing provinces to receive 28 per cent of the total revenues and the federal government 6.6 per cent. If the price were $7, the percentage suggested was 33.5 per cent for the provinces, and 8.9 per cent for itself. Remember, this was a breakdown suggested by the federal government itself, and these figures were to include export tax.

Finally, a wellhead price of $6.50 was agreed upon in March 1974. The government's figures from the January meeting would indicate that the province's share should have been 30.75 per cent.

The Alberta government introduced a royalty scheme which brought it 23 per cent of the total revenue from natural resource exploitation. This was 7.75 per cent less than the federal government felt in January the province was entitled to.

In May the budget came down and it called for the non-deductibility of royalties. The reason given was that the provinces had acted in bad faith, that they were being greedy. Alberta was taking less than had been offered, yet the federal government considered them greedy. It is unreal. That is the sort of nonsense which has the provinces up in arms.

The federal government brought in a budget in May, and repeated it in November, that would give it 23 per cent of the revenue from natural resources. This was 16 per cent more than the 7 per cent it was willing to accept in March. So who was being greedy?

All of this was done unilaterally. There was no consultation with the provinces about making royalties non-deductible. Suddenly, it was there, an arrogant provision in the federal budget—confiscation by executive fiat, confiscation without consultation or compensation. They confiscated not only a huge share of royalties belonging to the provinces, but the provinces' rights to develop their resources according to their own needs and priorities.

Without the right to deduct provincial royalties, resource companies may find themselves taxed at a rate of more than 100 per cent. In fact, if it is unlucky, a mining company might find that it has to pay taxes even when it incurs a loss in its financial year.

So the provinces were forced either to cut back on the royalties or sit back and watch while the resource industry pulled up stakes and rode out of the West at a gallop. Alberta immediately cut its share of the royalty take, and called for another increase in prices to help the companies. But the federal government made no concessions.

By the stance it has taken, the federal government has destroyed the royalty leverage by which the provinces could direct the industry's development. Unfortunately, it has supplied no new guidelines of its own.

• (2020)

I do not know precisely how the provisions of this bill will affect the mining industry, but that is a question I intend to put in committee.

Another matter that must be borne in mind in all of this is the constitutional positions of the parties involved. What does our Constitution say with regard to the taxing of profits raised as a result of the exploitation of our natural resources? The British North America Act is perfectly clear on this subject. Section 109 states:

All Lands, Mines, Minerals, and Royalties belonging to the several Provinces of Canada . . . and all Sums then due or payable for such Lands, Mines, Minerals, or Royalties, shall belong to the several Provinces—

In other words, it was decided at the time of Confederation that the provinces would be permitted to retain their resources and any income therefrom. The four western provinces were placed in the same position by a 1930 amendment to the BNA Act.

This federal government has been incredibly inept in dealing with the petroleum producing provinces. It has made all the mistakes of the vain individual who does not have a good grasp of the problem but who is too proud to admit it. The government seemingly has no idea where it is going; it has no well-defined energy policy. It is stumbling from one makeshift policy to another, trying to cope as best it can with events as they occur.

In September 1973 the federal government unilaterally, without consultation and as a result of pressure, imposed a price freeze on Canadian crude oil. Later, an export tax was imposed, again without consultation with the provinces. Then the freeze was going to be lifted on January 31; then it was the end of the heating season. Also, there was the business of how prices would be allowed to rise and then how they would not be allowed to rise.

It is small wonder that relations are now strained between Ottawa and the producing provinces. The federal government is no longer trusted.

The third party in this horrible mess, and one that must not be forgotten, is the industry itself. The position taken by the federal government with regard to the non-deductibility of royalties will cause serious hardship. It will drive capital flow, the personnel who have the know-how, the technology, and the tools and equipment out of Canada to explore and develop petroleum elsewhere. We will be forced to live on our proven reserves until those run out, which will be in about five or six years' time.

Unless something is done, the petroleum industry in Canada will die and we will be faced with having to import oil and gas which we could otherwise produce for ourselves, and this will cause even more serious economic hardship.

As far as the other provisions of this bill are concerned, I think I need not say anything at this time. Many of them were mentioned last evening by the sponsor of the bill. Most of them are of a technical nature and the committee will deal with them in due course.

To summarize, then, it is my view that this bill is totally inadequate as a measure to solve the problems besetting the petroleum industry and, in fact, creates other problems. It gives effect to a budget based on a number of misconceptions such as, for example, that the American recession would not be as deep or prolonged as it has been; that there would be a continuing strong rise in capital investment by business to take up the slack in consumer spending; and that we would experience significant real growth in our economy.

The measures contained in this bill are tailored to an expanding economy—which ours, sure as hell, is not. The incentives are all wrong. Consumer spending dropped in the last quarter of 1974 by 7 per cent. That was something to worry about. The tax relief provided in this bill will not do anything to reverse that. The relief is not substantial enough, nor is enough of it going to those who would use it to help reverse the economic tide.

The Progressive Conservative Opposition in the other place tried to amend this bill in a way that would provide some relief for the Canadian taxpayers, but without success.

In my view, this bill is very dangerous, especially with regard to the constitutional problem and the practical problems of royalties with regard to the petroleum-producing provinces.

Before I conclude in this matter, I want to refer to what Senator Hayden said as a personal opinion, as reported at page 610 of Hansard of yesterday:

It therefore appears that in the interests of preserving a viable oil and gas industry in Canada, as a matter of simple justice and equity, and as a step towards a compromise with the provinces in this area, the proposed legislation might either be changed so as to restrict the add-back to Crown royalties levied in excess of the royalty rates prevailing at December 31, 1973, or suspended in its application until after April 15, 1975, at which time further federal-provincial talks are scheduled.

I think this alternative is an excellent one, and I hope that we will examine it in committee and do something about it.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I did not have the privilege of being in the house when this bill was introduced, or this afternoon, and I have not had the benefit of the wisdom I know has been expressed by those who have participated in this debate thus far. I have carefully read the Hansard record of the speech made by Senator Hayden when he introduced the bill. I commend him on once more making an enlightening and intelligent presentation of a piece of legislation that, to say the least, is complicated and exhaustive.

We have 300 pages of amendments in the bill before us. A great deal could be said about many of its provisions. Certainly many of them are beneficial from the standpoint of the Canadian taxpayer. I should like to confine my remarks to some provisions which I am convinced will, in the long run, have a serious, detrimental effect on the people of this country. I am referring particularly to the impact of the change in the matter of royalties and other charges collected by provincial governments in the development of energy resources.

The amendments proposed prevent taxpayers in the petroleum, natural gas and mining industries from deducting from their income any royalty, tax, rental, bonus, levy, or other payment made by them to the Crown in right of Canada or a province or to a crown corporation or body in relation to the acquisition, development or ownership of a Canadian resource property, or to the production in Canada of petroleum, natural gas or minerals.

In discussing this issue, it is first necessary to dispel the widespread misinterpretation that is so often placed on the remarks of anyone who warns of the danger of excessive taxation on corporations.

The socialistic mind, particularly, and a significant section of the media today, has as an obsession the idea that corporations are evil creations; that profit is evil, and that the more governments tax business enterprises the more they are to be commended. Anyone who speaks against excessive taxation on business enterprises is accused at once of being a champion of multinational corporations and, therefore, indifferent to the interests of the rank and file of Canadian taxpayers. That, honourable senators, is a serious and dangerous fallacy.

The points I want to discuss tonight I raise not out of concern for the multinational companies or for the Canadian oil companies. Certainly, they are going to be hurt financially, but they are not going to be put out of business. They have the capacity to look after themselves without any defence from honourable members of this house. What I am concerned about, and what every parliamentarian should be concerned about, is that down the road in another six, seven or eight years the average Canadian citizen, who may cheer today to see increased taxation levied on multinational corporations, is going to be paying a severe price for the folly that is being perpetrated by governments today.

We have a responsibility to try to help the Canadian people realize that in the long run the social and economic well-being of every citizen in some degree is bound up with the economic health of the industrial and commercial enterprises of this country.

It is business enterprise which produces over 80 per cent of the job opportunities in Canada, the payrolls on which our people depend for their livelihood. The production of the vast quantity and great variety of products, which make it possible for Canadians to enjoy one of the highest standards of living in the world, is the result of Canadian industrial and commercial enterprise. For this reason, anything done by governments to impair the economic health of business, particularly in the field of energy resource development, ultimately reacts against the best interests of the rank and file of citizens.

In Canada today we are faced with a most ironic situation. We are one of the few industrial nations of the modern world which could be self-sufficient for decades to come insofar as energy resources are concerned. Surely we do not have to argue that in an industrialized nation an adequate supply of energy resources is a matter of economic life or death. Yet here we are, one of the few countries with the potential to be self-sufficient in energy, heading into a serious shortfall within the next seven or eight years.

We need to address ourselves to the question: Why is this so? I offer for your consideration four reasons why this is so. One of these reasons is geographic and economic, but three are political, and, because they are political and created by governments, we can take some encouragement from the fact that it is therefore possible for governments to correct them, if they have the will and the initiative to do so.

Let us take a moment on the one cause of the problem which is geographic and economic. The governments of this country, provincial and federal, and for that matter the Canadian people, must be made to realize that from here on in the cost of developing energy resources in Canada is going to be very much higher than it has been in the past.

So many of the statistics used today, the assumptions that are made, are based on the fallacious idea that the production costs of the past ten or twenty years have some application to what is going to take place in the future. I submit that they have very little application.

Canada's three main sources of potential future oil supply are offshore drilling, development in the Canadian Arctic, and development of the Athabaska tar sands. In the matter of cost, not one of these can be compared with development in the plains of western Canada, where you could drill a producing well for $100,000 to $200,000. Compare that with wells being drilled in the Arctic today and on the north slope of Alaska which run as high as $6 million a well—and a great many of them dry holes. Arctic development is extremely costly, but it is an area in which we have to look for oil in the future. The same is true of offshore drilling.

The Athabaska tar sands are in the same category. We are fortunate in Canada to have a known oil reserve of at least 300 billion barrels which makes it the largest single known oil deposit in the world. But, honourable senators, you are not going to develop Athabaska tar sand oil at $6.50 a barrel. That development is going to be extremely costly.

For these reasons, from this point on those engaged in oil development must be assured of a far higher return on their production than anything we have known in the past, if we are going to make financially viable the development of oil from offshore drilling, from the Arctic or from the Athabaska tar sands.

It may be asked why that should be a problem, when world oil prices today are three times as much as they were less than two years ago. Surely this increase in the market value of the product is sufficient to offset the higher development costs in these three areas to which I have referred.

Such is not the case, because of the three political factors mentioned. The first of these was the introduction of political price determination.

There are four ways in which you can determine the market price of a product. One is the competition in the market place. That is the ideal situation. A second way of arriving at prices is the method used in the case of public utilities where regulatory bodies arrive at a cost of service plus a reasonable return on investment. I hope our oil industry never becomes a public utility, but that is one method of regulating prices.

● (2040)

A third way is by the action of monopolies. You will find many people who believe that multinational oil companies get together to connive and plan what the price of their products will be. I doubt if any of us are in a position to say if there is any truth to that assumption or not. I do call your attention to one fact that is pertinent. As long as petroleum prices were fixed by the oil companies, we enjoyed prices which were relatively low. It was only when we moved, in the last 18 months, into political price determination, that we saw prices skyrocket, not only in this country and the United States but all over the world.

When OPEC—the oil producing nations of the Middle East—discovered the potency of economic blackmail as a means of attaining their political goals, they were the first to resort to political price determination. The $11 to $12 per barrel charged for Mid-East oil has nothing whatever to do with the cost of production or marketing. It is a price fixed entirely on the basis of political considerations.

We in Canada followed suit. The $6.50 a barrel crude oil price of today has nothing to do with the cost of production. It is a politically determined price. It was arrived at by a conference between the provinces and the Government of Canada. I have some doubts as to whether it can properly be called an agreement, because I am confident that the federal government held over the heads of the provinces what has now been translated into legislation, namely, a federal authorization to fix prices. The provinces had little or no alternative but to agree, in this case, to a price of $6.50 a barrel. That is political price determination and is one of the obstacles retarding further exploration and development of oil in Canada today. It is not merely a question of whether the $6.50 a barrel is a price that makes development from more costly areas financially viable but once you adopt political price determination, no investor, no development company, can know from one month to the next what oil prices are going to be three months or six months or a year from now. The price is no longer a matter of competition in the marketplace but is subject to the whims of parliaments and legislatures, and even may be decided by governments far beyond the borders of this country.

Once that element of uncertainty was interjected, it is no wonder many development companies have been drawing back and saying, "We are going to sit it out for a while and see what comes of this political price determination before we commit millions of dollars for further exploration and development."

This leads me to the second political factor, the problem of uncertainty, which I have already touched upon. Let me amplify. Canadian industry, especially during the last World War, demonstrated a tremendous capacity to adapt to adverse conditions once it knew the problems it had to face. Canadian business can do the same today, but one thing business cannot do is to adapt to conditions which it does not know. In the petroleum industry there is so much uncertainty because nobody knows what the governments of this country are going to do next.

To be fair, I must say that the provinces are as much to blame for this situation as the federal government. But let's take a moment to deal with the federal situation. Some years ago the Government of Canada produced regulations for oil and gas development in the Northwest Territories and the Canadian Arctic. Four years ago many of those regulations were suspended, largely as a result of pressures brought to bear on the government by conservationists and environmentalist groups. The regulations were suspended until environmental and other studies were made. Oil companies have been coming to Ottawa for the last four years, asking the Government of Canada to tell them what the ground rules are going to be for development in the Northwest Territories and the Arctic. The only answer they can get is that the matter is still under consideration. Some of these companies have spent millions of dollars without knowing what the final ground rules are going to be, and they are reaching the point now, with the tremendous inflation of costs, where they are saying, "Look! Until we know what the ground rules are going to be we simply cannot go on making these tremendous expenditures when down the road we may find ourselves faced with a set of government regulations or legislation with which we cannot live."

The same thing has happened in the provinces. In my own province, for many years at the time of the great development of our oil resources, we had a statutory limit on the amount of royalty that could be imposed. It was changed from time to time by the legislature. Three years ago, with the change of government, this statutory limit was wiped out. This means that during any session of the legislature, existing royalties can be increased. Put yourselves in the place of an oil company trying to raise $100, $200, $300 millions for development when you know that any month your royalty rates may be changed at the whim of a government.

In Alberta in the earlier days of development we had an understanding that the rate of oil royalties would be revised once every ten years. This was done to create the stability necessary to attract capital for development. Oil leases, which at one time ran for 21 years, were shortened to ten years, with a firm commitment to the developers that once they took out a lease with a fixed royalty rate embodied in it, even if a change was made in royalties, its terms would be respected. All of that is gone. I would like to come back to this in a few minutes, with respect to this legislation, because one of the serious obstacles in the way of oil and gas development is the element of uncertainty which now prevails and which this legislation will make worse.

This brings me to my third point, which is directly related to this particular bill. I refer to the excessive royalties and corporation taxes levied jointly by the provincial and federal governments on resource development companies.

Let me take the provincial situation first of all. In Alberta there have been three increases in royalties in the past 18 months. I am not saying that none of these increases were justified; I am pointing out that the royalties have been going up and up with no assurance that they are not going to go up again. When the $6.50 a barrel wellhead price was fixed, the Government of Alberta imposed a 65 per cent incremental royalty, which meant 65 per cent of the difference between the old selling price of $3.80 a barrel and the new selling price of $6.50. In Saskatchewan they imposed a 100 per cent incremental royalty. Then, the federal budget came out with the provision wiping out the right of producing companies to deduct the royalties they paid to the provinces before they computed their income for federal corporate tax purposes. The net result of these excessive provincial royalties plus the original federal budget proposals was that, if there had been an increase in crude oil prices in the western provinces, for every dollar of additional income the oil companies took they would have had to pay out more than a dollar in royalties and provincial and federal corporation taxes. This was particularly true in Saskatchewan where the incremental royalty was 100 per cent of the difference between the old price of $3.80 and the new price of $6.50 a barrel. No wonder oil exploration in that region stopped almost completely.

In fairness I should point out something that was done by the Governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan, which undoubtedly was one reason why the federal government moved in the direction of this legislation. Up until the time of the incremental royalties the relationship between the provincial governments and oil developers was a relationship of landlord and tenant. In other words, when the provinces, as the landlord who owned the oil resources, leased them to a company for development, the province leased only a percentage of the resource. The balance was retained by the province as its royalty. It is true that they made an arrangement with the developer to develop the province's retained portion along with what had been leased and to pay it back to the province usually in cash, although there is a provision for the royalties to be paid in kind. The important point is that as long as the landlord-tenant relationship prevailed the developer never acquired the ownership of that percentage of the resource that was retained by the province as its share. As long as that position was maintained it would be almost impossible for the federal government to say, "You cannot deduct that royalty from your income when computing your federal corporation tax," because it never belonged to the developer. He never owned it. He never got a cent from it. He simply developed it under an agreement with the owner who had retained title to that portion of the resource. When the incremental royalty was introduced, it was not a percentage of the product retained by the Crown but a percentage of the difference between the $3.80 a barrel it was sold for before and the $6.50 a barrel that it was sold for after the new federal-provincial price arrangement. In the case of Alberta the province now collected 65 per cent of that price differential, and Saskatchewan collected 100 per cent. The important thing was that it shifted the basis of royalties from a percentage of the product retained by the province to a percentage of the selling price of the product, and it was at that stage that the federal Finance Department stepped in and said, "That is no longer a royalty; it is the equivalent of a sales tax," and so they wiped out the provision of many years' standing that afforded the developer the right to deduct royalty payments before he computed his federal corporation tax.

The federal government perhaps has a case in the matter of the incremental royalties, but I do not believe they have any case in respect of the basic royalties which are a percentage of the product retained by the owner. I hope that before this legislation is finally implemented there will be a recognition of this fundamental difference, and a proper amendment made to the act to correct the present injustice.

This provision respecting royalties combined with excessive royalty rates now imposed at provincial levels is imposing a financial burden on the resource development industries that is stifling further growth. Perhaps of even greater concern is the fact that it is inviting a very serious constitutional confrontation between Ottawa and the provinces. I only speak of Alberta, and to some extent of Saskatchewan, because they both became provinces in the same year, 1905. When they became provinces the federal government retained jurisdiction over the natural resources for 25 years. It was not until 1930, after long negotiations, that the Natural Resources Transfer Agreements between the Government of Canada and the Government of Saskatchewan and the Government of Alberta were finally implemented.

Under those agreements the federal government transferred to the Crown in the right of the provinces the complete ownership and control of natural resources. Alberta and Saskatchewan, therefore, have a valid constitutional argument not only under the British North America Act but particularly in the light of the Natural Resources Transfer Agreements of 1930. When the government of Canada now says, "The resources then transferred are no longer resources of the province, but belong to all of Canada," it is negating the terms of the Natural Resources Transfer Agreements, and in my view that will invite, and almost guarantee, a very serious constitutional confrontation between the provincial governments and the Government of Canada.

Constitutional issues of that magnitude are not settled overnight. If that kind of confrontation develops Canada will go through prolonged period of even worse uncertainty as to what the ultimate position will be in the matter of who is going to have control over royalty rates and the allocation of revenues from the resource development in the years ahead. Here we are, honourable senators, at a most crucial period in our history as far as resource development is concerned, when development should be at an all-time high but instead it is going down and down because of these political factors resulting from unwise government decisions.

In Alberta oil development today is at the lowest point in the last twelve years. In the last 18 months, 90 drilling rigs have left western Canada. Most have gone back to the United States and some have gone as far as the Middle East. Over 30 geophysical crews have left and gone to the United States. When you lose these highly trained technical men you do not get them back overnight. There is no way that you can measure the extent of that kind of loss to the country as a whole.

In considering the effects of these situations it is pertinent to say a word with respect to the tar sands. You have read a great deal recently about the Syncrude project. In my view the governments had to rescue the Syncrude project because it is essential to Canada's future energy supply that there be another major development of the tar sands, both for the oil produced and to gain the additional technological information necessary for still further and, hopefully, less costly development in the future. However, what happened was one of the most ironic situations we have had in this country in a long time. The Syncrude project could have been developed without one single dollar of taxpayers' money had it not been for the created problems to which I have referred which made it impossible to finance the project in the private sector. After the governments, provincial and federal, created the situation that made it impossible to finance the project in the private sector, they then used the impasse as justification for moving in and saving the project by investing $600 million of the taxpayers' money.

Why do the people of Canada not rise up in indignation over this type of folly? Perhaps the answer is rather obvious. If the effect were immediate, they would, but the adverse effect of what is happening today will not be felt by the rank and file of Canadian people until six or seven years down the road, when we will have moved from the position in which we are exporters of some 800,000 barrels of oil per day, on which the Government of Canada collects $5 per barrel. We will have moved from that position to the place where we will be a large net importer of crude oil, and we will not be getting it for $6.50 per barrel but paying $11.50 or $12 per barrel.

Think what this will mean to Canada's balance of payments. Already we are in a severe deficit position. When we start importing one or two million barrels of oil per day at $11 or $12 per barrel, we will be piling up $22 million to $24 million a day of trade deficit, with no more export of oil from Western Canada to offset any part of it.

But that is not all. Once we become a net importer of oil at these higher world prices the cost of every single product produced in this country will be increased. Every product contains an energy factor. So often when people discuss this problem they talk about the price of gasoline for their cars. That is one of the minor factors. Far more serious to the standard of living of the Canadian people will be the net impact of higher energy costs throughout our entire Canadian industry, which will increase the price of every product bought in Canada.

I make so bold, honourable senators, as to predict that if this folly is permitted to continue much longer, six or seven years from now, perhaps sooner, the people of this country will realize the folly that was committed during this crucial period in our national history. I would not wish to be in the position of the people whose names will come to mind at that time, the political leaders, who will be blamed and held responsible for creating the situation for which the rank and file of Canadian people will then be paying, and paying dearly.

I see one ray of hope in this situation, and with this I close. The three political factors with which I have dealt—the element of uncertainty, the excessive taxes and royalties, and political price determination—are all problems created by governments. They, therefore, can be corrected by the governments which created them, if there is the will to do so. If ever this Senate had an opportunity to give leadership, it has it in this issue. I hope that when this bill is referred to committee it will return with a very clear and firm recommendation, if not actual amendments, that this royalty provision be removed before even more damage is done than has already been done.

Thank you for your attention.

Senator Graham: Will the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Manning: Certainly.

[Senator Manning.]

Senator Graham: With respect to the control of natural resources, Senator Manning, you spoke of a 25-year agreement between the Government of Canada and the Provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, which I believe you said was entered into in 1905, when Alberta and Saskatchewan entered Confederation, and extended to 1930. Did that agreement also apply to the other provinces of Canada?

Senator Manning: First, allow me to correct your assumption. Perhaps I did not make the position clear. There was no 25-year agreement. Alberta and Saskatchewan were incorporated as provinces in 1905. The federal government retained the administration of the resources of both provinces until 1930. In 1930 the Natural Resources Transfer Agreements came into effect, which transferred all natural resources to those two provinces in perpetuity.

Senator Flynn: But at the same level as the other provinces.

Senator Manning: The other provinces were not in the same position, because they entered Confederation under the BNA Act, and Alberta and Saskatchewan were new provinces, incorporated in 1905.

Senator Prowse: The other provinces had the legal right.

Senator Flynn: That is right.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I must say that I share with Senator Flynn and others some grave concerns with respect to the bill before us. I will say that when we hear a speech such as we have just heard from Senator Manning, one wonders what the Senate is to do in relation to this bill. Are we going to consider it in committee, and then report it without amendment, or is Senator Manning, for example, right or is he wrong? He has made a powerful speech, predicting dire consequences due to the legislation before us. I for one hope that in committee that position will be clearly put and that whatever cross-examination is necessary and available at that time will be put against it. It is essential that we have answers to the serious criticisms that have been levelled at this bill, not only by Senator Manning and Senator Flynn but by other speakers. For my part, I find it difficult, in fact impossible, to reconcile the stated objectives of the spokesmen for the government in the other place with the bill itself.

The Minister, Mr. Turner, has said that the purpose of this bill is "to deal simultaneously with the twin problems of inflation and slow growth." He also said, somewhat less than a year ago, that he would be proceeding in the budgets on which this bill is based by "cutting taxes rather than increasing government spending." That was the statement Mr. Turner made before the Canadian Club in Toronto on May 27, and for the life of me I cannot reconcile this bill or anything in it with those two stated objectives.

When I read carefully Senator Hayden's excellent explanation—and it was excellent—I was struck immediately by the fact that he had very serious doubts about certain aspects of this bill. He found the bill itself "terrifying" in its proportions and in contradiction with the earlier assurances that were given at the time of the predecessor bill that, if I may quote him, it would be:

—an area in which everything would say what it meant, and mean everything it said.

He had serious doubts whether this bill accomplished that purpose, and I share those doubts.

In looking over the sponsor's speech, I added up a total of 13 major divisions in it. He selected 13 aspects of the bill which he felt should be drawn to the attention of the Senate, and he made it clear that there were others which, for time and other reasons, he was not dealing with. As I added up those 13 items, I reached the general conclusion that 10 of them offered some tax relief and three did not. The 10 were: reductions in the personal income tax, the clause relating to interest in dividend deductibility and pension deductibility, the new aspects of the RHOP—that is the housing bill—the extension of the limits for the low rate of income tax deduction for small businesses, the retirement saving plan improvements, and some relief in the partnership legislation, in the transfer roll-overs, in the fast write-offs, and for the construction industry.

In view of the general statement that the purpose of this legislation was to tackle the problems of inflation, unemployment, and slow growth, I began to wonder to myself if there was significant tax relief in this balance, taking Senator Hayden's main point, or whether this bill might eventually be increasing the tax load.

I do not know the answer, because the three areas in which there seems to be an increase in the tax burden are, of course, the petroleum and mineral resource productivity taxation—which has been the main subject of debate on this bill both here and elsewhere—the FAPI, which is the foreign accrual property income—I do not know why it is called "property." It seems to me to deal with more than property. I am speaking of FAPI. The "P" is for "property," but it seems to deal with more than property. Property is a rather incidental aspect of FAPI. There is also the compulsory reporting by corporations on an accrual basis.

I hope that Senator Hayden will add up the pluses and minuses. He hinted that he might be able to do this, when, on page 612, he said:

I have figures to show how these changes will affect corporations. It would be a fair comment to make that in many of the provisions which relate to corporations there is an increase in the corporate tax recoveries by the government as a result of the changes which have been made, and to that extent there is an offsetting of some of the concessions which they have made to individuals.

It will be interesting to note what is the nature of the offsetting. Is the new tax burden higher than the tax relief? What generally is the relation between the two? One would hope that the numbers would come down on the side of tax relief rather than on the other side.

One wonders about the statement that in implementing the two budgets the government would go in the direction of cutting taxes rather than increasing expenditures. How do we reconcile this with the fact that again we are faced with the largest increase in federal government expenditures in history—a rise from $22 billion to $28 billion? How do we reconcile the emphasis on reduction in personal income taxes with the fact that personal income taxes are increasing? They have increased 40 per cent in two years. I am speaking now of the collective burden.

Will we have what I can only call the charade of saying that the government is actually cutting personal income tax? Clearly it is not. In four years the government take from personal income tax has gone up 100 per cent—slightly more in four years. Is this cutting taxes? Is there some criterion by which this should be judged other than by what I would call the government "take"? It seems to me that the government take is the important thing, as speakers have pointed out.

Senator Manning used the figure of 80 per cent of the productivity, or rather of employment, in Canada—it is almost the same thing—as the contribution of corporate expenditure and expansion. How do we reconcile those two? We were told also by Senator Hayden that the committee had spent some time examining the substance of the bill and had reached certain conclusions. I asked him last night if it was the intention of the committee in due course to let us have the benefit of those conclusions. I think his answer was that in general this would probably happen, because there would be a report depending on the subsequent hearings and the report might or might not suggest amendments. He said that we might have the report with amendments but not with recommendations, because he felt that recommendations were de facto amendments.

Senator Hayden: I know my honourable friend is interested in telling the house what I said. When I talked about recommendations, I indicated what the result would be. I was discussing the various courses that the committee might take. If the report reads differently, then I should say that it is not my policy to read the "blues." If I am not reported correctly, it is just too bad. I am not going to spend time rereading my speech. What I was saying, and I was reading from my notes, was what the effect would be if we made recommendations. On the question of the consideration which we had given the legislation, and possible amendments, I said that these would be considered in committee. It depends on what the committee decides, whether these are incorporated in any report that comes forward. It does not depend on something that I do. It is what the committee does. In the ordinary course of events, if the committee says, "These amendments should go forward as such," that will be the report of the committee. But do not attribute any of these things to me. I was explaining possible courses of action.

Senator Grosart: I am sure I was misunderstood, or perhaps I did not say what I meant to say. Certainly my intention was not to say that Senator Hayden himself was doing these things. Perhaps Hansard will show that I did say that the committee might take this action. In any case, I do not think that I attributed any prospective action to the chairman of the committee. If I did, it was certainly a slip of the tongue.

I again quote Senator Hayden: The committee reached some conclusions, and formulated them under headings. However, since the bill was on its way to us, it was felt that the committee could not properly make an interim report to the Senate on the subject matter. I discussed the matter—and advised the committee of my action—with officials of the Department of Finance. I arranged an appointment so that our staff and the senior members of the Finance Department who work in the field would have an opportunity of seeing what we were proposing, and to study it.

He went on to say that the appointment was made for 10 o'clock and lasted all day. That is an obvious indication of the importance attached by the officials of the Department of Finance to the points put forward by the committee.

Senator Hayden went on to say:

Therefore, there was complete understanding on what the proposals were. It appeared from that discussion that some of the proposals were certainly clarifying, and the question would be one of what risk there would be if we did not deal with those clarifications right away and say, "This is on our platter for dealing with technical matters in the next series of amendments." Some of them could have been dealt with administratively.

I raise this point because of some of the criticisms that have been made. Some of them are more telling, in my view, than those that have been made elsewhere. I would hope that the committee will not proceed on any assumption that the essential ways in which the Senate might amend this bill will be on mere technicalities. I believe it has been made clear that there are fundamental propositions in this bill that may be very definitely not in the public interest.

Having said that, I might say I have every confidence in the committee. I am one of those who have said on more than one occasion that in my time in this place nothing has been more to the credit of this house than the work of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee on Bill C-259. It is my view—and I believe Senator Hayden suggested this also—that had the government listened a little more carefully and taken more action in respect of the proposals and amendments put forward by the committee in respect of Bill C-259, we would not have as many amendments in this bill, and particularly as many amendments as there were while this bill was being considered in the other place. I doubt that there has been a bill containing so many amendments made by the government while it was being considered in the House of Commons than this one.

I was one to criticize the fact that the Senate, in respect of Bill C-259, at the last moment, in effect, abandoned the committee, the committee having actually made recommendations and proposed amendments, saying they were priority amendments. As honourable senators will recall, because of the time factor and the pressures to get the bill passed, the Senate, in effect, abandoned the committee in that it did not insist on those amendments going through.

I am certainly not competent to say whether or not the views which have been expressed during the course of this debate are correct, but certainly the fact that they have been raised with such emphasis would indicate to me that, as Senator Manning said in his concluding remarks, we might be on the eve of another great opportunity for the Senate.

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, I shall try to be as brief as possible, but I want to say a few things which I think should be said. My first words, of course, are to praise the sponsor of the bill for the clarity and brilliance with which it was presented.

This is a very confusing bill. It contains 303 pages in all. It received third reading in the other place in the late afternoon of Thursday, February 27, and was introduced in the Senate on Tuesday, March 4.

I have been informed of a news item delivered over radio and television blaming the Senate for sitting only three hours and some minutes last week. I have also read a Canadian press release in this morning's Montreal Gazette, following the opening of second reading debate in the Senate last evening headed, "Tax bill debate begins in Senate after week's delay." The article goes on to say:

After more than a week's delay, the Senate started debate last night on the massive income tax bill which is holding up rebates to taxpayers.

It implies, of course, that we are not helping the taxpayers. This, to me, is as close as one can get to a dishonest statement made by people who would be expected to report the news exactly as it happens. The article could well have been prefaced with the fact that this bill was discussed in the other place over a period of months—I believe four months—at the end of which it was referred to the Senate, where it will be considered in an absurdly much shorter time. There is something wrong when people criticize the Senate freely without going into a deeper study in order to obtain the facts. Instead, the Senate is reported—and I say it quite frankly—as being lazy and indifferent for not dealing with this bill promptly. I believe the author of this news release should answer for his peculiar behaviour.

It is impossible, I believe, to comment on every clause of this voluminous bill. That will soon become the work of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. This is an important bill and one which will leave its imprint on commerce, the natural resource industry, oil research, producers, and all Canadians. It is of that amplitude.

There is an intent on the part of some to blame the Senate for any delay in the processing of the rebate cheques. Again, this appears to be unjust. The Senate has a job to do and, as in all other matters, it will do its job diligently. Bill C-49 will be referred to committee after honourable senators have expressed their views on it, and given their recommendations during debate on second reading.

● (2130)

If the Canadian public had been well informed of the content of this bill and its consequences, it would not want the committee to proceed lightly with some consequential amendments. We have no alternative in the Senate but to consider fully the objections and the reasons for them, and I am sure that those who take the time to read some clauses of this bill will agree that much of the confusion that exists must be clarified and made understandable.

There is much work to be done on this bill but, thanks to the "Hayden formula," considerable time has already been saved. But let no one be fooled. It is not a one-night, one-meeting job that is before the Senate and its Banking,

Trade and Commerce Committee. It is to be hoped that the media will properly inform the public if it wants to fulfil its ethical duty.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, a few of those who have had the floor before me—and here I shall take a few seconds to congratulate particularly the previous speakers for their speeches, and especially Senator Manning for his very relevant remarks—several speakers dealt with the matter of oil production and the amendments which will affect its price. I had the privilege to hear witnesses, and I was impressed by the relevance of some of the arguments put forward to the Committee.

In the last few years, a few federal and provincial departments have brought about through their actions some uncertainty, as Senator Manning said so well, and some difficulty into the consideration of the progress of many a development.

I will at once stress that I am quite at ease to talk about it, since I have no interest in oil production, except as a Canadian consumer like most of us here, and I am not the manager of any oil company, although I do not disregard them.

It has always surprised me to be able to buy in our supermarkets bottled spring water, on which there are no taxes, at 42½ cents to 49½ cents a gallon, and to buy gas at the gas station at between 68 cents and 72 cents a gallon, which amount includes a federal sales tax estimated at some 3½ cents to 3¾ cents, plus a provincial tax varying from 19 cents to 25 cents—taxes totalling between 23 cents and 30 cents per gallon—and to realize at the same time that the price of gas includes, in addition, a share of the cost of the federal and provincial royalties, plus some costs for its distribution and refining. Gas, without taxes and royalties, sells at roughly the price of spring water. I find it astonishing.

The oil must be extracted from the soil, then it must be refined. Considering that the price of two gallons of oil includes the federal sales tax, the provincial tax, that it includes provincial and federal royalties, considering the long distances it must travel to my tank, oil really does not cost much in Canada. Truly, we are privileged.

Is there anyone who does not know what the cost is in European countries which lie much closer than we do to oil producing countries? It might be well to remind ourselves that those amounts vary from $1.92 a gallon in Portugal, $1.60 a gallon in Morocco—which is an Arab country—$1.45 in France, $1.67 in Italy, $1.33 in Sweden to $1.43 in England. Those figures are dated February 10, 1975.

Our oil companies have done more for Canada than, unfortunately, we are willing to admit. For almost forty years, the stability of which Senator Manning spoke has been possible precisely because of the basic rules adopted in Canada. But the instability and the systematic harassment we witness in far too many cases—for success breeds envy—are gradually eroding the advantages the consumer, especially, enjoyed. I dare say we are unwittingly creating oil shortages.

We treat oil development companies badly. We have already seen, as stated by Senator Manning, some rigging outfits leave. I am told that in the past year, scores of them have left and others have announced their departure. Why? Development is more stable and more profitable elsewhere. Canada will perhaps allege that we must preserve our oil deposits. Well, since exploration is slowed down, our oil production will be reduced accordingly.

You may think that I am wandering from the object of Bill C-49. Not at all, since it is one of its aspects. There are others that are quite important. We cannot overlook its implications in such cases, even though we are being pressed to railroad the bill and give the taxpayers some hope that they will soon receive an income tax rebate which, unfortunately, will no doubt be recovered in a month or two.

I think I have said enough about that. I merely want the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to look fully into this bill so that the Senate may cooperate with the Canadian government and pass the best possible bill under the circumstances.

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I shall take only a few minutes of your time to add a few comments to those of my honourable colleague, Senator Desruisseaux. One of the dispatches that he mentioned was a news item appearing this morning in the Montreal Gazette, in which my name was mentioned. Over last weekend I received two telephone calls from members of the Press Gallery inquiring as to the reason for the so-called delay in the handling of this bill in this house. I informed those callers that although the message from the House of Commons with this bill had been received in this house on Tuesday evening, the Senate had not been prepared to deal with it last week for several reasons, the first and most important being that this is a complex bill of over 300 pages containing important amendments to our present tax law which could not be dealt with on the spur of the moment; much preparatory work was necessary before we could refer it to the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I insisted that, although the Senate was not proceeding with second reading, it did not mean that the Senate was not dealing with the bill at all, since this preparatory work was done outside the chamber.

I also added that there was a second reason for the actions of the Senate, which was the fact that at least one important witness, who had taken an active part in the pre-study that had been carried out by the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee prior to the bill's coming to us, was not available and would not likely be available to testify before Monday, March 17, and that therefore there would have been nothing to be gained by dealing with this bill in the house last week.

Before I made these remarks to members of the Press Gallery I had discussed the matter with the chairman of the committee, Senator Hayden, who had given me most of the information that I relayed to the press. I also called the Minister of Finance to explain the situation to him. I must say that although Mr. Turner was somewhat disappointed at the delay, he understood perfectly the situation with which we were faced in this chamber.

Unfortunately, in the press this morning no mention was made of this second reason, or any of the reasons that I had given, and it was a straight case of blame being laid on the Senate for not dealing with this bill as speedily as the Press Gallery would like.

I do not wish to use unparliamentary language, but this reminds me of the old saying, "You are 'blamed' if you do, and 'blamed' if you don't." I think that is the situation the Senate must face with regard to the Press Gallery. Not only do I have no apologies to voice in this respect, but I affirm that the Senate is doing its job as it feels it should be doing it, and will give good and due consideration to this important piece of legislation.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Hayden speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, this has developed into a very interesting debate, with special emphasis on the mineral resources taxation provisions. In all, I do not expect to take very much time, but before I reply to that phase of the debate, and since it seems to be a time for relating experiences with reporters, I should like to mention one that I have had.

I had a telephone call from a CTV reporter last Friday, and his first question was, "When will the income tax bill go to the finance committee of the Senate?" My answer was very brief—"Never." I said, "It will go to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. Perhaps you should keep more up to date." There were due apologies, and a very curt conversation.

I had a telephone call yesterday morning from a reporter in Ottawa asking me some questions, and I thought the language that I used in describing what I thought the progress might be was very simple. He asked me for an explanation, and said, "You know, I am not very familiar with the Ottawa situation because I have been here only three weeks." So, honourable senators, when you start measuring what you read in the papers, written by people who are alleged to be reporters, and which the papers accept and report as being quality material, you must always bear this in mind.

If I were ever to let myself become upset by the things that people have said about me, I think I would have been a nervous wreck a long time ago. I suppose the appropriate motto is, "Where ignorance is bliss it is folly to be wise," and it is easier to write about a subject when you know nothing about it than it is when you know something.

Having said that, my answer to Senator Grosart with respect to the reduction in personal income taxes is that I estimate the minus to the federal treasury for 1974-75 at $415 million, and for 1975-76 at $1,750 million. As far as corporations are concerned, the increase in tax revenues for the government in 1974-75 is $755 million, and in 1975-76 it is $425 million. It is obvious from the most casual glance at those figures that what I said as to there being some offsetting items is correct, and that on the whole the reduction in income tax payments by individuals is greater than the increase in amounts collected from corporations by the government. To that extent, if there is an argument on figures, you can draw your own conclusions.

Then Senator Flynn enlarged the scope of the debate. I concede that my duty in sponsoring this bill on second reading was to explain it. I did that as shortly as I felt it could be dealt with, and gave clear explanations. Obviously—and I stated this—I did not intend to discuss every clause in the bill. I selected the headings which I thought might be interesting. As a matter of fact, in my index, which I still have before me and on which I tick off each item as I discuss it, I had 17 items, and last night I dealt with 14 of them. One of those which I did not deal with was the one about which Senator Grosart asked his question this evening. At that time I said to myself that I would not mention it because I was sure somebody would be bound to ask a question about it. Sure enough, Senator Grosart did.

Senator Flynn, in the course of his excellent discussion of this bill, said that the measure is totally inadequate. I have just one brief comment to make on that point. I would suggest that he ask the individuals who in the year 1974, by reason of the increase in the minimum deduction from tax from $100 to $150, will be saved $380 million, if they think that the bill as a whole can properly be described as totally inadequate.

● (2150)

Senator Flynn: Oh, yes, I would ask them.

Senator Choquette: He would still ask them.

Senator Flynn: They do not get as much for their money now as they did in former years.

Senator Hayden: I enjoy interjections, but when my friend was speaking, in order to keep his temperature from rising, I sat still and listened. Perhaps he will content himself for a few minutes until I finish the answer to that particular statement. That is only part of it.

Senator Flynn: You were putting a question to me.

Senator Hayden: The new deduction of up to $1,000 of interest income in 1974 will result in a saving of $230 million which individuals might otherwise pay. The taxpayers' tax advantage on the registered home ownership savings plan will be an estimated $100 million in 1974. In 1975 the increase in the federal tax cut from 5 per cent to 8 per cent, with a maximum of $750 and the increase in the minimum from $150 to $200, will save $615 million. The extension of the interest deduction to include dividend income will save taxpayers an additional $10 million. The new deduction of $1,000 of pension income will save persons in receipt of such income an estimated $55 million. The ability to transfer to a spouse the unused portion of the age exemption will result in a saving for taxpayers of $35 million.

I am sure if we were to ask all those concerned whether they would describe this bill as being totally inadequate, the answer would be a very vociferous no.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: It is a good joke.

Senator Hayden: I wish that in the days when I was in closer touch with the people I had as strong a point to make to gain favour with them. If I were in that position today, and had to meet an allegation that this bill is totally inadequate, I could not ask for a stronger point. I believe my honourable friend was referring to the manner in which the bill deals with mineral resources taxation, and the general discussion of the way in which the government is handling the budgets and spending increasing amounts of money on public business. However, so far as this bill is concerned, it is only one arm of the whole program of the business of government, for which the government obtains some of its revenue. Therefore, I conceive it to be my duty not to address myself to all the budgetary policies of the government, but to address myself to the policies indicated in this bill. In my opinion, that is the right position for me to take.

Senator Flynn: I do not blame you.

Senator Hayden: Having said that, I must commend Senator Manning on his excellent analysis of the whole position in relation to the oil industry in Canada. Much of it, but in a less informed and less emphatic manner, I stated last night. I said we must maintain a viable petroleum and oil industry, or Canada will suffer very materially. Senator Manning said the same thing in much better words tonight. Senator Manning also said that the mineral resource taxation provided by way of non-deductibility of royalties—which in the bill is described in very broad terms—at this time, and having regard to the course of action taken by the provinces, is the expected thing to do. When children become bold, rough and unreasoning, relevancy does not become very important. It is simply that one person makes a move on one side, as the provinces did, and then there is a counter move made by the federal authority that is affected.

This is the inevitable method, I suppose, that we have to accept in political bargaining. The persons who suffer in this method of bargaining are the people. In the middle of it all are the corporations, the oil companies, which are put in the position of determining whether it may be impracticable for them to make any reasonable exploration because they cannot develop enough cashflow and retain sufficient earnings to finance exploration. The money markets do not present any hopeful way by which they can raise money at this time. As Senator Hays said this afternoon, drillers from Canada are moving in large numbers to the United States because the price they can get there for oil, $10 per barrel, is much higher than anything they can get in Canada.

Also, the method of assessment of what is new oil is entirely different in the United States from what it is in Canada. You can develop new oil in the United States by moving into a proven oil field, whereas in Canada the oil which would be entitled to an exploration expense deduction must be in an area which has not been developed.

Honourable senators can therefore see that with all these disadvantages at this time, plus the unreasoning and unreasonable attitudes of the governments involved on this question, the market people who provide the money say, "This is a place which we should not go into until these problems are resolved."

That does not mean that we do not need these provisions disallowing royalty payments at this time. This may well be said to be part of the squeeze. But as part of the process of political bargaining I can only hope that the realization will come quickly as to where it is heading. I hope it will not be six or seven years, as Senator Manning indicated he thought it would be. I would hope that realism might take over much more quickly, and that there may come a time when the people will see the unreasonableness of the attitudes in relation to dealing with oil. If we are going to be prosperous in Canada, we must have a good, strong, viable petroleum and gas industry operating in this country.

It is all very well to rail at the corporations. I think that politicians, many of the people, and at least one political party, think that corporations have private gold mines tucked away in their backyards, and every time money is needed they simply dig some out; that there is an inexhaustible supply. Sooner or later they will have to learn, and perhaps learn the hard way, that corporations have to have earnings, and the only way they can obtain earnings in this area is by exploration and development. Otherwise, we are faced with the prospect of reduced production, and substantially reduced production, each year; and the people of Canada, particularly in the Eastern provinces may well be forced into the situation where the government will have to provide subsidies substantially in excess of what it is able to get from the export tax imposed at the present time. We must remember that the export tax which the government imposes at this time is simply a levy on oil which is exported to the United States, and the transfer of that money to pay for the higher cost oil that is delivered to the Eastern provinces and certain portions of the province of Quebec. That is the way in which the level of cost of oil is maintained at a lower level than it would otherwise be. That is a benefit we should weigh for the people of Canada.

I am just as anxious as Senator Flynn, Senator Manning, Senator Grosart and others to know when the realism is going to come. I do not know how we can contribute to it, except by expressing our views in our report that it is now time that realism should take over. We can incorporate that in our report—the committee can, I should add, for the benefit of Senator Grosart. I am merely indicating the way it can be done. It does not form part of the bill, so we cannot make a recommendation in connection with it. We can make observations, which should have great public appeal and support. The present situation is utterly impossible. The provincial authorities and the federal government are like kids just let out of school. Suddenly they become wild and free and irrational, and one action begets a counteraction.

We are in a position of stalemate now. The provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan and, to some extent, British Columbia, have moved in the area of upping very substantially their royalty payments on the incremental value of the oil—that is, on any price increase over the base figure. If they increase that more without the positions being resolved, nothing is going to be accomplished. There will be no deductibility in respect of royalties paid by corporations so far as the federal government is concerned. All that would be accomplished would be a hastening of the day when corporations engaged in this business will have to cut down their operations and employment, resulting in a bad economic situation, and possibly at the same time more inflation.

In my view, the criticism of what is going on and the rivalry, or whatever you want to call it, between the attitudes of the provincial and federal authorities is justified. I hope that when the mineral resource taxation provision in this bill becomes law, it will have the effect of bringing realism to the fore.

As Senator Flynn and Senator Manning have said—and as I have said—there is some cost element in royalties. If I have to prove it, my first witness would be the government itself, because it has allowed it over a great many years. If we took that cost element as it was in 1973 before these various gyrations developed between the provincial and federal authorities—that is, 22.8 per cent—as being a deductible figure, that would improve the position of the oil companies somewhat. It would bring them up with the Alberta changes and reductions, and it would give them about 86 cents a barrel for oil. That is not a lot of money, but as was indicated in committee, a lot of exploration and development can be done with even that amount, with the expectation that as time goes on there may be light in a lot of places where it does not seem to exist at the present time.

Regardless of the criticisms of the bill, it has many excellent features, one of which, I think, is the treatment of mineral resource taxation, having regard to the end for which it was brought in, not in itself for the blanket disallowance in royalties. There should be some reason applied in that, but I suppose when you are resisting some person, whether it is a fight in a hockey game or anything else, you give your opponent everything you can, and it may be the beginning of a better relationship.

I intend that everybody be given an opportunity to express his views in committee, and whatever the committee decides is what will be reported back to the Senate.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

May I just make an announcement? The committee is meeting to consider this bill at 9.30 tomorrow morning, and we will have the departmental representatives present.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, may I add to that announcement? The Senate will meet tomorrow at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, but in view of the widespread interest of honourable senators in this piece of legislation, and in order not to cause any interference with the work of the committee and allow as many senators as possible to attend this important meeting, it is proposed to move the adjournment of the Senate early tomorrow afternoon.

Senator Flynn: At 2.30?

Senator Langlois: The Senate will adjourn at 2.30, or shortly after that.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

PUBLISHING INDUSTRY

NEWSPAPER ARTICLE AND CORRESPONDENCE—FURTHER QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Senator Davey: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to return just for a moment or two to the matter I raised here last week. Honourable senators will recall that the Globe and Mail had published a letter to the editor from me which had been carefully edited to exclude this important sentence:

Perhaps your about-face on the issue may have some connection with the arrival of Globe publisher Brigadier Richard Malone, who announced earlier this week that FP Publications had abandoned its attempt to negotiate a deal with Time.

Honourable senators will be interested to know how the press of Canada, particularly the Globe and Mail, followed up on that story. There was nothing in the Globe and Mail that I received here in Ottawa the next morning. However, there was a story in the Toronto Star of that evening. It was headed, "Globe didn't show conflict of interest Davey Charges"—that is presumably the Star heading, the story being by Canadian Press—and I would like to quote the statements attributed to Mr. Malone.

Malone today called Davey's statements "crazy".

Then again Mr. Malone, in a quotation as it appeared in the Toronto Star—and I would ask you to mark his words carefully—said:

First of all, we have never had any intentions or made any attempts to buy Time magazine or to buy into Time.

A further quotation from Mr. Malone:

Davey is also well aware that the Globe and Mail is a member of the FP group. It is a matter of corporate record in Ottawa and it is stated in all our advertisements.

Then, further on in the same article:

Malone said that the Globe deleted part of Davey's letter "because it was false."

Then two days after I raised my point of privilege here—this would be the Thursday after I spoke—the Globe and Mail finally got around, to the best of my knowledge, to dealing with the matter. The heading for this story is, "Davey remarks irresponsible, Malone says." This is not a CP story; this is presumably done by a writer at the Globe and Mail.

Again I want to give you a sample of the quotations. One was that I was "quite false and irresponsible." Then:

Mr. Malone said in a statement—

And here I am quoting Mr. Malone in his own paper, the Globe and Mail.

—We (FP Publications) have no plans and never had any plans for purchasing any interest in Time magazine.

Referring to me, Mr. Malone went on to say:

He is fully aware that the Globe and Mail has been a member of the FP Publications group for many years.

The article goes on:

Mr. Malone said this fact is shown on all FP letterheads, rate cards and brochures and is recorded in the report of Senator Davey's committee on the mass media.

Well, honourable senators, I should perhaps be gratified that my statement described as crazy one day had become simply irresponsible the next.

I want to repeat and underline two of Mr. Malone's quotations. The first is from the Toronto Star:

—we have never had any intentions or made any attempts to buy Time magazine or buy into Time."

And then in the Globe and Mail:

We (FP Publications) have no plans and never had any plans for purchasing any interest in Time magazine.

Honourable senators will appreciate that I want to be fair and I want to be reasonable and I also want to ask a series of questions of Mr. Malone.

First of all, did the Globe and Mail, or did it not, carry this article on February 25—that is, just three days before my letter appeared in the Globe and Mail? The heading on this article carried on February 25 in the Report on Business is: "FP abandons plans for Time share." Now I want to read it again and I would ask you to note the present tense of the verb. "FP abandons plans for Time share."

Senator Molson: What page was this on?

Senator Davey: This is the Globe and Mail's Report on Business, Senator Molson, three days prior to my letter appearing. It says: "FP abandons plans for Time share." Contrast this with his statement "we have never had any intentions or made any attempts to buy Time."

● (1410)

This clipping from the Globe and Mail is available in the reading room, and senators can study it. Mr. Malone is quoted at some length. The story said:

FP Publications Ltd. of Toronto has abandoned any plan to acquire an interest in the Canadian edition of Time magazine and perhaps use Time as the basis for a new weekly news magazine with greater Canadian content.

R. S. Malone, president of FP Publications, said the federal government's latest proposals concerning the content required for Time to remain classified as a Canadian publication under the Income Tax Act has killed FP's interest in the news magazine.

And so on.

The point, of course, is that if the statements contained in my letter were either crazy or irresponsible, then what about Mr. Malone's statement in his own newspaper in the Report on Business section of the Globe and Mail of February 25?

Incidentally, honourable senators, it is a sad fact that the grievance I put before you received dramatically less attention in the newspapers throughout the country than did Mr. Malone's reply. I continue to believe that if FP attempted to make any kind of a deal with Time then that fact should have been stated in the Globe and Mail editorial opposing the proposed legislation.

I wish now to return very briefly to the public's right to know who owns or controls the various media outlets in this country. Quoting from the story in the Globe and Mail two days after I spoke here, Mr. Malone said, referring to me, "He is fully aware that the Globe and Mail has been a member of FP publications." That, of course, is hardly the point. Certainly I am aware that the Globe and Mail is an FP publication. My concern is that the overwhelming majority of readers of the Globe and Mail are not aware of the fact that the Globe and Mail is an FP publication and that its publisher, R. S. Malone, is also the President of FP publications. Mr. Malone, in the Toronto Star, is quoted as saying again that I am well aware that they are a member of the FP group. "It is a matter of corporate record." Then he says, "It is stated in all our advertisements." Of course, that statement is at variance with the facts. I do not think the fact that the Globe and Mail is a member of FP publications is stated in all Globe and Mail advertising. I was prepared to raise that point, but Mr. Malone qualified his statement the next day when he said it is shown on all FP letterheads, rate cards and brochures. The point, of course, is that the fact that the Globe and Mail is an FP publication is not contained in advertising to the public at large; it is contained in advertising directed to the advertising industry.

I am not interested in whether FP publications lists the Globe and Mail on its letterhead, but I am extremely interested in why the Globe and Mail does not list on its letterhead, or on its masthead carried every day in the newspaper, the fact that it is an FP publication.

Honourable senators, the Globe and Mail editorials on this particular issue are suspect for an altogether different reason and one which again, in my opinion, smacks of a conflict of interest. Remember that the publisher of the Globe and Mail, R. S. Malone, is also the President of FP publications. Time Canada and Reader's Digest are printed by Ronalds Federated Limited and its wholly-owned subsidiary, Evergreen Press. Who owns Ronalds Federated Limited? Well, just under 24 per cent of the company is owned by FP publications. That kind of percentage is sometimes considered sufficient for effective control, and if it is not then it is certainly enough for a forceful voice in the company's direction and profitability. R. S. Malone is a director of Ronalds Federated Limited and so is Bruce Rudd, the publisher of the Calgary Albertan, another FP publication.

I want to make it quite clear that I do not quarrel with the fact that Ronalds Federated Limited prints Time. I do suggest, however, that the Globe and Mail readers should be apprised of this fact when that paper editorializes on a matter which is of such obvious self-interest to its publisher.

I wish to apologize for taking up the time of the Senate. I would have preferred to have dealt with this matter in the pages of the Globe and Mail, but that, apparently, is not possible because letters to the editor of the Globe and Mail are edited to suit the convenience of that paper's publisher.

PUBLIC SERVICE

STRIKE OF GENERAL LABOUR AND TRADES GROUP— QUESTION

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I direct a question to the Leader of the Government. I should like to know if the government is ready to introduce in the other place legislation to end the strike of the general labour and trades group of the Public Service Alliance, which has now been under way for a few weeks. The President of the Treasury Board said two days ago that the government is about to present legislation. Can the leader inform the Senate as to when that legislation is likely to be introduced?

Senator Perrault: I wish to assure the honourable senator that this matter is one of urgent concern to the government, but for a number of reasons I am unable to state whether the government is in fact about to initiate early action to bring the dispute to an end.

Bill read first time.

Senator Argue moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next.

LAW REFORM COMMISSION ACT

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, March 11, the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Benidickson for second reading of Bill C-43, to amend the Law Reform Commission Act.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, Senator Benidickson certainly went out of his way to find the necessary material to enlighten us on this bill. I am sure we are all indebted to him for his explanation of this piece of legislation. Although it is not a complicated bill, Senator Benidickson made it most interesting and I will not add too much to what he has already said.

The Law Reform Commission, as he has explained, is presently made up of a chairman, vice-chairman, two other full-time members and two part-time members. The bill before us would amend the membership of this commission to do away with the two part-time members and replace them with one extra full-time commissioner. The net result would be to increase the full-time membership from four to five, but to decrease the total membership of the commission from six to five.

It is apparently thought that one full-time member would be more useful than two part-time members. Presumably, this bill comes as a result of a request by Mr. Justice Hartt for additional full-time help. I hope this is enough. Mr. Justice Hartt's commission has done valuable work over the past four years. The working papers it has produced are of excellent quality. They are refreshingly clear and well written. Their recommendations have also been characterized by perspicacity and eminent good sense.

Reference to one of the latest recommendations of the commission was made in the newspapers from Monday until this date, and in the Ottawa Journal of last Monday, March 10, we have the following title: "Equal share urged for split couples." I shall read a few lines from the news item:

The Law Reform Commission of Canada said today there must be equal sharing of family property—from furniture to business assets—upon termination of a marriage. The paper calls for a new system which would acknowledge that each spouse makes an equal contribution to the family fortunes, whether at home or in the office, and that each should share in the property when the marriage ends.

That sounds very easy, honourable senators. I can see a spouse saying to her husband, "You have $100,000 in the bank. I want $50,000 of that $100,000. You also have 10 nice houses. I want five of them. Let's sign a document, and that should be the end of it." It will not be that easy, I am sure, and the courts will be called upon to examine many, many factors.

I am sure these will not be all amicable separations. There will be divorces, and the courts will have to take many factors into consideration, such as the number of years the spouses were married, the number of years they lived together, the contribution each spouse made to the acquisition of assets, the reason for their separation, and the grounds for divorce, et cetera, et cetera.

So if it were as easy as it looks, upon reading some of the articles, I could picture some of the girls marrying a well to do man and, after a year or two, saying, "Well, now, let's split, and split it right down the middle." I do not think it will be done that way.

Senator Bourget: Why not?

Senator Choquette: The only unfortunate aspect of all of this is that the government has not yet seen fit to act upon most of the recommendations of the commission. It is surely not because they are too busy wrestling inflation to the ground. The explanation the Minister of Justice gives for his inaction to date is that the commission has provided him with no final recommendations. All they have put out, says the minister, are working papers which are meant to be discussion documents.

I think it might be interesting to hear both the minister and Mr. Justice Hartt when the bill is sent to committee. We would want to know from Mr. Justice Hartt if he anticipates giving the government any final reports with recommendations that are any more specific than the ones contained in the already published reports.

If it is his intention to do so, we would then want to know when he considers these final reports might be forthcoming. From the Minister of Justice we would want to know what he meant when he said that if the government were to work at full speed implementing the ideas for change contained in the reports that have already been brought out by the commission, "We would be in advance of what the public and the interested parties want."

Was he saying that the commission's recommendations are impractical, too avant-garde, that the government could not really think seriously of implementing them for several years? We do not know. If that is the case, we want to know.

If the minister looks upon what is being done by the commission as a mere academic exercise, we should all be made aware of his attitude, Mr. Justice Hartt included, right now.

Far too many of the studies commissioned by the federal government bear no fruit, and that is under any government. The reports lie around in some ministerial or departmental office gathering dust. The taxpayers' dollars should be treated with greater respect and used more wisely. I, for one, consider the work done by the Law Reform Commission of great value. I want to see the fruits of its efforts translated into law as soon as possible.

Clause 4 of this bill allows for the chairman or vice-chairman and at least one of the other members of the commission to be appointed from among judges of the Superior Court of Quebec or members of the bar of that province. I am not a practitioner in the province of Quebec, but I want to add this. A provision of this type appeared in the original act. I thought it an eminently good idea then, and I still do.

Honourable senators should be reminded that the Law Reform Commission is not only studying criminal law. Its first report was on family law, and there are to be others on administrative law, expropriation, and commercial law. It is imperative, therefore, that there be adequate representation from Quebec which operates, in civil matters, under a civil as compared to common-law system. That two of the five members of the commission be experts in civil law constitutes fair and necessary representation.

Clause 7 of the bill causes me some slight concern. The purpose of the bill is, in part, to do away with part-time commissioners. I can understand, however, that we might want to keep those who are there presently until the term for which they were appointed has expired. That, I think, is the intent of this clause, but it could be made clearer. We could indicate that a person who is presently a part-time member of the commission may continue in that capacity, but only until the expiration of the term for which he or she was appointed. In other words, I want to make sure that the present part-time members are not permitted to carry on indefinitely.

All in all, this bill is a good idea. The work of this commission is potentially very valuable. Any help we can give it so that it can bring its projects to a speedy and successful conclusion is to be encouraged.

On motion of Senator Smith, debate adjourned.

THE SENATE

DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENT IN CHAMBER—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Senator Lafond: Honourable senators, may I be permitted to raise a question of privilege at this stage?

Senator Flynn: You are always entitled to.

Senator Lafond: As the Orders of the Day were called a sheet of paper was placed on our desks. I had not at that point an opportunity of being acquainted with its contents, and I would not quarrel with its contents or otherwise. This sheet of paper was placed on our desks by personnel of the chamber. There is no indication of the source or the origin, and I would like to have an explanation of its source and the authority for the distribution of this document.

Senator Prowse: Honourable senators, I can solve this problem. I hope I have not abused my privileges in this respect. I received a copy of the document through the mail and I thought it would be of interest to honourable senators. I had it duplicated and I arranged for its distribution. That is as far as I intend to go. I thought honourable senators might be interested in knowing how things had been done in other places at other times. If I have given offence to anyone, I apologize.

● (1420)

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, as the question of distribution of materials in the Senate has been raised, I might say that if the Senate is sitting on Monday next it will be my intention to seek permission to place shamrocks on the desks of honourable senators.

Senator Lafond: So long as we are satisfied as to their source—which I am sure we are in the case of Senator Grosart.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I move that we now adjourn during pleasure to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately 4 o'clock this afternoon. I should like to add that the reason for this short recess is to allow the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to continue its consideration of Bill C-49, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, in the expectation that that bill will be reported back to this house later this afternoon for further consideration.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 4 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-49, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Senator Deschatelets): Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that this bill be now read the third time.

Honourable Senators, I should like to add a few words at this time. I am prompted to do so because of the alarming and astounding ignorance which exists in portions of the public, whose job it is to know what they are talking about and to talk about things in a proper way having regard to the facts.

Comment has been going on for some time about the ill consideration that we give to bills, and particularly to tax bills. In order to refresh the memories of news reporters, columnists and announcers—whether they will read it or not I do not know—and in order to make it a matter of record, I should like to state that this committee and the Senate have been living in the area of taxation since 1970. We had the consideration of the White Paper which took almost three months of study. We wrote a report. We got our report out at a substantially earlier time than the report of the corresponding committee in the House of Commons. Then, when Bill C-259 was introduced in 1971, we immediately set up our Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee to study the subject matter of the bill. We started our hearings in September of 1971 and we continued them until December 13, 1971. We heard many, many public bodies. We received submissions from many more than those who appeared. In the course of our consideration of that bill we submitted at least three interim reports and made many recommended changes, and so on.

So, when some ill-informed columnist or reporter or announcer makes statements to the public in the press or on television that we were shirking our duties because we only considered the tax bill for three days, in the light of these facts you can see how wrong it was and particularly so that during that period, in order to help out the members of the public organizations, corporations, et cetera, who had difficulties in fitting their times of appearance to our time schedule, and in some cases where we were not able to finish hearing all the submissions that were scheduled for a day, we would sit in the evenings, many, many times. We did that not because we were looking for praise or acknowledgment or recognition of any kind from the public; we did it because we felt that we had a job to do. That is the responsibility I feel, and I have tried to exercise that responsibility in the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. In that regard I have at all times the full support of the members of that committee.

It is most disturbing to find information going out to the public at this time by people who were perhaps too young even to vote when we dealt with these things. But whether they were too young in age or not, obviously today when they make statements of that kind they are too immature in their thinking and are too lacking in knowledge of what is actually the situation.

I have to make use of an expression I used the other night, although I will vary it slightly. It appears that it pays to be ignorant so long as you can say something which the people will have no way of checking and knowing whether you are right or wrong. But the position that you occupy in making such statements is the thing which gives a sort of credibility to those statements. I think that is unfair. It can be most strongly criticized. But the only way that we can do anything about it is by seizing on every opportunity to point out what the facts are.

The other point I wanted to make was that in the course of the inquiry in 1971 there was one criticism that we took only three days to deal with the bill. So, we were criticized for not taking long enough at that time. On this occasion the criticism is exactly the opposite, that the bill received first reading on Tuesday evening last week but that the Senate was not going to consider it until Monday evening of this week. This was a terrible faux pas on the part of the Senate. We should have been digging into it the next day. And yet if you presented the bill to these very people who talk so loudly and so senselessly in that fashion, if you presented that bill to them, I am sure they could read the title and could read the number of pages and would understand many of the individual words, but they would not be able to stand up in public and make any sense in talking about the bill if they had to figure it out for themselves. Therefore, I say it pays to try to do some research and to educate yourself a bit so that you will be able to give informed consideration to a subject matter as important as this, one involving subject matters as this bill does, many of them in which the public are greatly interested.

Having said that, I want to point out one thing we did this time. In the course of preparing for the eventual arrival of this bill, immediately after the budget of November 18 I made a motion here to refer to committee the subject matter of the budget proposals in relation to income tax, and any resolutions, bills or drafts of bills implementing the budget proposals.

We commenced as early as December 4. On that day we had our first hearing in committee, which was really in the nature of a seminar. Our experts were there, and for a day, with projectors and slides, they demonstrated to the members of the committee the pertinent provisions of the bill and what effect they had on individuals and corporations.

We then went on and heard witnesses. Still in December, we heard the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the Canadian Petroleum Association. This was at a time before Alberta made its concessions to afford some relief, as they thought, to the petroleum, oil and mining industries, from the provisions in the budget which dealt with the non-deductibility of royalties, et cetera. We spent most of one day considering all the material which was presented, much of which was on slides which were projected, and we had speakers who illustrated the various points.

When the Alberta proposals by way of concessions came out I invited those people in the Chamber of Commerce who had appeared on the earlier occasion to update their material and to relate the effect on the conclusions they had stated to us to explain what the effects would be, what the changes would be, and whether those changes would alter the situation in relation to corporations, the federal authorities and the provinces. They appeared again at a later date in 1975, and made a further submission. We have had all this information and these briefs submitted to us on Bill C-49.

We gave full consideration to all of these things, and now we have spent a most useful two days with officials of the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue. Before that, in our preparation—that is, the preparation the chairman was making with the committee's staff—and while we were analyzing the bill, we seized on about 30 points, five of them being points that were in the existing law, having been put there in 1971. We felt that these things should have been reviewed before this time. The rest of them were points that we isolated in the bill.

We prepared a statement of those points, and I then arranged a conference with the officials of the Department of Finance, to which also were invited officials from the Department of National Revenue. Our staff, counsel and the accountants, spent a whole day with all those departmental officials going over all these points, because we felt that if we could resolve them in any way it would be helpful when we came to consider the bill.

Having done this, we also acquainted those officials with the fact that in committee they would be asked, in relation to these points that we would develop, what their position was and how they proposed to deal with the matters that we raised.

During the course of the committee's proceedings, as various sections of the subject matters in the bill were being discussed, some of these points leaned on those particular phases of the bill, and those questions were put to the officials. I remember a point that we raised in 1971 on designated surplus. We put this question: Is it not time that we had some definite position in relation to designated surplus? The explanation we got, which I thought was a reasonable explanation—and which put the case in a position where we just could not refuse to pass a bill because they did not deal with this particular thing right away—was that this was a most complex problem, dealing with all the aspects of designated surplus. They said, "We have been studying this matter for at least two years. We have not resolved it as yet. Our position vis-à-vis the public, vis-à-vis the taxpayers and vis-à-vis the effect of foreign income is that we are getting closer to being able to deal with it. We do have an understanding of the problems, and we can tell you that we are not losing any time in trying to understand the matter fully."

Other questions that we put to them were on matters of interpretation. In some instances we found that the interpretation which we thought was the intent of the government when the bill was framed in that fashion, but which we thought was not clear, was, we were assured, in fact the interpretation. I remember the head of the particular branch in the Department of Finance which deals with corporation taxes giving a definite answer to one question respecting a point where there seemed to be a weakness, and where there should have been a cross-reference to limit the scope of the application of the particular part of the bill. He answered frankly, "Yes, a cross-reference would facilitate an understanding of the section." Then I asked the official from National Revenue who is charged with the duty of administering the act, "Having heard the opinion expressed by the head of this particular service in the Department of Finance, are you prepared, if this question arises for administrative action in the department, to accept his statement?" and he said, "Certainly, that is what I would act on."

This is the kind of co-operation we were getting from these witnesses in the last two days, and it marks a singular change from the attitude displayed by them in 1971 when we had to fight every inch of the way and, in a number of instances, had to proceed on our own basis. Furthermore, when we were considering the legislation in 1971 it was only in late December, perhaps a week or so before we got the bill, that we heard any of the witnesses from the Income Tax Division at all because they were tied up in the committee of the House of Commons.

So we have concluded, in relation to these points that we developed, that there is good will in the department. If there are matters of interpretation, they indicated what their attitude would be administratively. One official indicated how he would interpret, depending on instructions as to intent from the Department of Finance. In some instances they went so far as to indicate that these things were on their platter, if I can put it that way. In other words, they have certain headings and they said, "In this year these are the technical things we are going to deal with for clarification in relation to others." The word "platter" is mine, not theirs, but in effect, they said, "These are on our platter for the next round of amendments on the technical aspects of this bill where clarification is needed".

We felt in relation to this that we had gone as far as we should, and as far as it was necessary to go, to ensure that the public was not going to be unduly disturbed if they were not dealt with until the next round of income tax changes. Furthermore, we did not regard these points as being of such substance that we should insist on amendments at this stage, and delay the passage of the bill.

I thought that this should be said, honourable senators, for those members of the public who are uninformed or who do not wish to be informed, but who find it easier to formulate their own ideas and who find that there is benefit in not thinking and, perhaps, in not being able to think as long as they are paid to say some words over television or radio which may be attractive to some of their listeners. This is why I have taken a little time to give an explanation, and I know that the committee in its work carries the approval and confidence of the members of the Senate. We operate in such a way as to give as honest, capable, adequate and understanding consideration to all these matters as we feel is humanly possible.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, first I would like to say that I support the remarks made by Senator Hayden in relation to the work of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce with respect to this bill. I am also satisfied that the committee did as good a job as it could in its consideration of the bill, and any criticism that may be, or may have been, levelled at us in the press is totally unjustified. It has been my experience since I came to the Senate that its worst critics have usually been appallingly ignorant of the work done by this house.

I have spoken about the Senate on many occasions, especially to students. My first question has always been, "What do you know about the Senate?" Invariably, the answer has been, "Nothing." So I suppose those who write in the style mentioned by Senator Hayden belong to that group of people who are easily critical of the Senate because they really do not know what goes on here.

As far as fiscal bills are concerned, in connection with which very often the main problems are technical, I know that the Senate, and especially the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, does an essential job, which very often the other place is unable to accomplish because of other considerations to which they must give priority. As I was going to say yesterday, or the day before, although I would not have been speaking of the same subject, "Bien faire et laisser braire." That is a French proverb which translates "Let them complain, but let us do our job the best way we can."

I will not say that I always agree with the manner in which the Senate dispatches bills. I merely say with respect to this particular bill that I am satisfied that we have done what we should. I reserve my right of criticism on other occasions, because I am not always in agreement with the huge majority in this chamber, which very often supports the government a little too—I will not say blindly—readily and confidently.

With respect to Bill C-49, the committee held many sittings before the bill reached us. After receiving it, and after its having been referred to the committee, four sittings were held. The time that elapsed between the time the bill passed the other place and was referred to our committee was used specifically to prepare the committee, to have our advisers work on the bill on our behalf so that we would be well informed before discussing its various provisions.

In my opinion, we have done a good job. We are satisfied that no amendments are needed at this time. We are satisfied that some changes were made in the other place which were inspired by some of the recommendations—not officially but unofficially—made by the committee and its advisers.

Concerning the general provisions of the bill dealing with individuals, I was told by Senator Hayden the other day that I was rather harsh in saying it was totally inadequate. I meant that it was totally inadequate in that the measures laid down by the Minister of Finance to deal with inflation would not achieve the purpose. Those measures would not relaunch the economy. Yet, at this time when we are in a recession and faced with a possible depression, such measures are called for.

I do not disagree that some of the provisions dealing with individuals are worthwhile, and I am quite sure that half a carrot is better than no carrot at all. The carrots in this bill, as have been described by Senator Hayden, are welcome.

Had we delayed passage of this bill for a few more days, I doubt whether the refund cheques would have been delayed to any great extent. However, in order to avoid that criticism, which I consider unfair, unjustified and unwarranted, we on this side of the house gave leave to proceed with third reading at this time. But I doubt whether it would make that much difference whether we pass the bill tonight or next week.

The main problem in the bill does not really concern the relieving provisions, the tax concessions provided in the bill, because we are all in favour of those. No one is likely to oppose a reduction in tax. We are suggesting, however, that the reductions are not sufficient.

The main problem of the bill, as was indicated during the second reading debate, is that of disallowance of provincial royalties to the petroleum, oil and mining industries. That is the big problem with which we have had to deal. The others were technical problems, and, as I have said, I think we have dealt with them adequately, and probably better than could have been done in the other place.

We are now faced with the crux of the problem, of the confrontation which exists between the provincial governments and the federal government following the energy crisis.

The Minister of Finance, appearing before the committee this morning, made some interesting comments. We had an interesting discussion. I would describe him as being one of the best story tellers I have met, and a very good bargainer. There is no doubt about that.

In explaining the situation, he said that before the energy crisis arose the share of the federal government and of the provincial governments in the field of resources was approximately one to 11—that the federal government was gathering about $400 million and the provinces $5 billion, which is a ratio of about one to 11. He said he was not satisfied with that and whether or not the situation had arisen, he was hoping there would be a narrowing of the gap between the federal government's share and the share of the provincial governments; that he was hoping to achieve a ratio of something like one to two and a half, or one to three.

I would qualify that as being hindsight, because I cannot see what he would have done if the crisis had not arisen or if the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan had done nothing about the increase in petroleum or mining royalties. In any event, he said he considered it essential that the federal government should have a bigger share of the revenues from these resources.

He also said the provinces took unilateral action in this regard by increasing royalties, and added that they were too greedy. However, it has to be remembered that only three provinces could be found guilty of that. The decision of the federal government affected all provinces in the same way, and to my thinking there was no justification, as far as the mining industry was concerned, to act as the government did. Whether the decisions of Alberta and Saskatchewan with regard to oil were justified, whether they went too far, whether they were too greedy, is a problem that can be discussed, and I do not see that the viewpoint of the federal government is necessarily entirely correct.

As was pointed out by Senator Hayden, I do not see why the federal government did not consider the level of the provincial royalties that existed prior to the crisis, prior to the increases made by Alberta, British Columbia and Saskatchewan, as justified, since it had considered them as justified until that time.

With regard to this problem, I should like to remind honourable senators of what Senator Hayden said in his speech when he sponsored the bill. As reported at page 610 of Hansard he said something which I quoted when I spoke on second reading, but which I want to repeat now:

It therefore appears that in the interests of preserving a viable oil and gas industry in Canada, as a matter of simple justice and equity, and as a step towards a compromise with the provinces in this area, the proposed legislation might either be changed so as to restrict the add-back to Crown royalties levied in excess of the royalty rates prevailing at December 31, 1973, or suspended in its application until after April 15, 1975, at which time further federal-provincial talks are scheduled.

I now want to remind honourable senators of the views expressed by Senator Manning, a former premier of Alberta, when he spoke on Tuesday. At page 634 of Hansard, after discussing all the implications of the decision of the federal government, he said:

If ever this Senate had an opportunity to give leadership, it has it in this issue. I hope that when this bill is referred to committee it will return with a very clear and firm recommendation, if not actual amendments, that this royalty provision will be removed before even more damage is done than has already been done.

Need I remind honourable senators that Senator Hays and Senator Prowse, when speaking on the same matter, expressed views in the same vein. I have not heard a word in this chamber supporting the decision of the government.

Senator Perrault: You will.

Senator Flynn: From you? Well, it's about time. I thought you would have come to the rescue much sooner. In any event, if it is only to rally the troops it is not very useful. It may be very practical, but it is not very useful to the debate.

[Senator Flynn.]

● (1630)

In any event, I say that the result of this decision, as was shown in committee, is that the industry is one suffering from an unfortunate confrontation between the federal government and the provincial governments. There is no denying that fact. Fears have been expressed by Senator Prowse, Senator Manning, Senator Hays, Senator Hayden and others that in the present situation if nothing is done in the near future the uncertainty will make a viable oil industry an absolute impossibility, and will destroy our hopes for adding to our proven reserves which apparently will last for only six or seven years.

I see that Senator Lamontagne doubts the validity of what I have just said. Nevertheless, everyone seems to agree that we have only six or seven years left. If that is not his view, I would certainly agree to hearing him express his views.

Senator Lamontagne: We have insufficient reserves to meet our requirements, but that does not mean we will not have any oil eight years from now.

Senator Flynn: The point is that if we are not able to gather the necessary money to explore for any new oil, that will be the case. If we are to continue using the proven resources because the climate does not favour expansion or exploration, then that will be the case. That is what I am suggesting to you, nothing else.

The only way to encourage exploration is to end the feud between the federal and provincial governments. Surely, there is no doubt about that.

The minister said this morning that the provinces had taken unilateral action. I say that that is true possibly for Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, but that is not true for the other provinces. In any event, it is certainly not true as far as the mining industry is concerned. But what is true is that the federal government has taken unilateral action in deciding to disallow royalties. After all, this is an area of provincial competence. There is no doubt that under the Constitution the resources belong to the provinces and that the rights related to resources belong to the provinces. It is all very well to say that the provinces should not try to circumvent the limitations entailed in strict "royalties," but what is the federal government doing now by proposing the disallowance of the royalties as a federal tax deduction, if not circumventing the spirit of the Constitution? It does not suppress provincial royalties. What it does is to say to the industry, "Because the provinces are asking you for more, we are asking you for more." So it is on the back of industry that the battle is to be fought. It is not against the province directly that the federal government is acting. It is against the taxpayer; it is against the corporation engaged in the mining, petroleum and oil industries. That is what the government is doing, and it has been expressed very well and very clearly by Senator Hayden that the government is not really sincere. It is only trying to give itself a strong bargaining position. That is its principal purpose in this exercise.

I for one do not think that that is the proper way for a matter of this importance to be dealt with. It is for these reasons that I think it belongs to the Senate, which has a special responsibility so far as the Constitution is concerned and so far as the rights of the provinces are concerned, to try to attenuate the position of the federal government. We should tell the federal government not to be so inflexible. We should urge it to be ready to compromise. It is for this reason that I think the idea which was expressed in the other place, and repeated by Senator Hayden in particular, should be acceptable to the Senate, namely, that these provisions should not be proclaimed before the federal-provincial conference takes place.

If we were to add to the bill a provision which would say that the provisions dealing with deductibility will not come into force before April 15, 1975—that is, five days after the federal-provincial conference—then I think the provinces could come to Ottawa with more hope, and probably the federal government would be inclined to be more conciliatory with regard to the viewpoints of the provinces.

For these reasons, which should appeal to all members here, and which do not complicate, I suggest, the problem of the federal government, I think such amendment should be made.

If in the end the federal government thinks it has to act as is proposed in this bill, it will still have the right to do so on April 15. But, at least, it will have had in the meantime the opportunity to consider the full weight of its decision. Nothing will be complicated if the act is amended by suspending the coming into force of these provisions until April 15.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT NEGATIVED

Senator Flynn: Therefore, I move, seconded by Senator Grosart, that the bill be not now read the third time but that it be referred back to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce with the instruction:

That clause 4 of the bill be amended by adding thereto, next after line 8 on page 7, the following:

“(6) Subsections 4(2) and (5) and subsections 7(1) and (5) and any other provision of this Act to the extent that it is necessary and incidental to or consequential upon those subsections or any of them shall not come into force and have effect as law except upon proclamation of the Governor in Council following upon the expiration of the 15th day of April 1975.”

I have several copies of this amendment, which I would like to distribute to all members of the Senate who desire to read it. It is quite clear that the effect would be salutary. The federal government would cease to look uncompromising, and therefore would afford a ray of hope to the provincial governments as they look forward to the conference in Ottawa on April 9 and 10.

I think this is the occasion which Senator Manning said the Senate should not miss.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Senator Deschatelets): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Hayden, seconded by the Honourable Senator Langlois, that this bill be now read a third time.

In amendment to the motion, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn, seconded by the Honourable Grosart, that Bill C-49 be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce with the instruction:

That clause 4 of the Bill be amended by adding thereto, next after line 8 on page 7, the following:

“(6) Subsections 4(2) and (5) and subsections 7(1) and (5) and any other provision of this Act to the extent that it is necessary and incidental to or consequential upon those subsections or any of them shall not come into force and have effect as law except upon proclamation of the Governor in Council following upon the expiration of the 15th day of April 1975.”

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I just want to ask a question of the Leader of the Opposition. I am sure he is aware of the round of discussions and consultations which was conducted between May and November of last year by the Minister of Finance with all the provinces separately. While we have heard during this debate about the concession which has been made since then by the Alberta government, we have not heard very much about the concessions made by the federal government between the budget of May last year and the November budget. Could the Leader of the Opposition explain to us the concessions made by the federal government between the May budget and the November budget?

Senator Flynn: Well, the concessions made by the federal government are about the same as those made by the provincial government—that is, from a practical or arithmetical point of view—but the problem constitutionally and practically, as far as confrontation is concerned, posed by the adoption of this bill remains the same.

Hon. Raymond Perrault: Honourable senators, frankly I had not expected to see resurrected from the grave an amendment that had already been defeated in committee. This proposal which was first advanced in the committee study has risen like a phoenix from the ashes.

First of all, I think we should attempt to establish what we have here in this discussion, this dialogue, that some have even described as a “confrontation” between the provincial governments and the federal government. I think we all agree that there is a necessity to establish in this country a good base, a positive base, for the establishment of the resource industries wherever they may be. There is no question about our belief as Canadians that we want to see viable oil-producing and mining companies in our nation. We want to achieve objectives such as self-sufficiency insofar as it is possible in the matter of developing oil and natural gas resources. We want to see a maximization of the mineral resources which we have in this nation for the benefit of all Canadians, and fundamentally we are interested in the employment and prosperity which these industries offer.

I think it should be made very clear that the position of the federal government—not only the present government but preceding governments of other political persuasions—has been to encourage the orderly development of these industries.

Canadians who remember the early 1960s will recall that the western provinces—and I come from a western province—approached the federal government in 1961, when the government in power was not of the same political persuasion as are most of the members of this house, and said, "We require more than the world price for our oil in order to achieve and establish a viable oil industry in Canada. We need help; we need assistance in the matter of merchandising and marketing that oil in other parts of the country." That assistance was given to the oil industry by the taxpayers of Canada, and it was continued despite a change in government which occurred later in the 1960s. It was continued because the new government also recognized the desirability of establishing and developing a strong oil and energy industry in this nation.

We have heard a remarkable speech by the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Perrault: But really—and incredibly—it urged a one-way "ceasefire." It echoed the position of some provincial governments that "heads we win, tails you lose" as far as the federal government is concerned. I am concerned however, about Senator Flynn's ideological purity in view of the great testament of faith by the leader of his party on June 29 of last year, when he said that the federal government has a responsibility to take action "if some provinces are trying to take too much or are eroding in a significant, or improper, way the tax revenues of the federal government or the right of the federal government to share in the profits of those corporations."

Now, the word "royalty" has been bandied around this house with great free feeling and passion this afternoon. It has been discussed as a word—a concept—which is almost enshrined in federal tax deduction agreements with the provinces, that there is something almost sacred about so-called "royalties," and their deductibility, which have existed for a number of years and not recognized until relatively recent months. And now the federal government has been condemned for, supposedly, disallowing certain "royalties" imposed by certain brave little provinces.

In April of 1974 the price of Canadian oil was increased from $3.80 a barrel to $6.50 a barrel as a result of the conference of first ministers on March 27, 1974. If existing provincial royalty systems—these royalties about which we have heard so much from the Leader of the Opposition—had remained unchanged, the percentage of revenue going to provincial governments would have increased by 31 per cent and the federal share would have increased by 13 per cent.

Senator Flynn: From what?

Senator Perrault: As a result of the increase in oil prices from the existing scale.

Senator Flynn: But 13 per cent from what?

Senator Perrault: I am simply setting forth the figures which would have prevailed on a percentage basis of division with the advancement from $3.80 to $6.50 per barrel—presumably, percentages which would have been in the same general area as before.

Senator Flynn: The federal share would have more than doubled.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Perrault: We are talking about percentages.

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator Perrault: But a new development occurred, and what we saw after that date, when the energy crisis began to develop in earnest, was that several provinces moved to increase substantially their taxes, royalties and other levies. Some of them saw, in the increased price of oil throughout the world, an opportunity for a vast increase in their provincial coffers. This was a human reaction on their part. They saw a way to bring many millions of dollars into their provincial coffers. But at that point, this system of so-called "royalties" became something quite different from mere royalties. Through an elaborate system of royalties, imposts and other charges—perhaps a different system of royalty deduction in Saskatchewan and socialist British Columbia than in Alberta—there was a "variation on a theme" from place to place.

Senator Flynn: We did not say socialist Alberta.

Senator Perrault: I did not say socialist Alberta—but at times they seem to have some socialist ideas.

Senator Asselin: It is a good government.

Senator Perrault: What we saw—and the Leader of the Opposition is realistic enough to admit this—was the provinces sitting down, and collectively and individually working out various schemes and ways to increase their share of oil revenues. They said, "We will broaden the concept of 'royalties,' and thereby get more money, and Ottawa's share will be reduced." That is the simple fact of the matter.

As a matter of fact, the efforts of the provinces in 1974 to find ways to increase their take from oil established a new record in Canadian ingenuity. The provinces developed more ways to get money out of the federal government than Heinz has invented pickles.

For example, the province of Alberta, which is governed by a party of the same political persuasion as the honourable Leader of the Opposition, established a so-called "incremental royalty." This "incremental royalty" averaged 65 per cent of the increased price of oil. In Saskatchewan, the royalty was equivalent to 100 per cent of the increased price. In British Columbia, new and heavy royalties on oil announced by the B.C. Petroleum Corporation, a governmental entity, proposed to appropriate most of any increase in the price of gas.

Is the Leader of the Opposition seriously suggesting that all of these huge increases should have been fully deductible from federal taxes to be paid? Of course he is not. I notice that he is not even listening.

Senator Flynn: Oh yes, I am. I was trying to calculate the figures you are throwing at us.

Senator Perrault: I hope the honourable Leader of the Opposition jots them down, and recants what he said earlier. But the result of the new provincial actions would have been, even according to conservative mathematicians—with a small "c" and a capital "C"—a disastrous erosion of the federal corporate tax base.

Senator Flynn: What would you have lost? Not a cent.

Senator Perrault: The Leader of the Conservative Party in November 1963, when he was Premier of Nova Scotia—I hope his words will be noted—said this:

The federal government must retain a sufficient portion——of the tax fields in Canada to enable it to discharge its direct constitutional responsibilities, and to assist provinces with low tax potential so as to enable them to furnish a national standard of service to the Canadian citizen residing within their boundaries.

A sufficient portion.

Of course, that is a good, Canadian, realistic, and eminently fair statement. Yet this afternoon the Leader of the Opposition argues against his own leader's outspoken philosophical dissertation of 1963.

Senator Flynn: You always get more in taxes.

Senator Perrault: What would happen to the federal share of revenue? The royalties which you ask Parliament to, in effect, reject, even for a limited period of time, would have done this to federal revenues: the federal share of petroleum production revenue would have gone from 13 per cent to 6 per cent. In the last nine months of 1974 alone the provincial share would have gone from 31 per cent to 42 per cent, at a time when more and more of the provinces are asking for more and more assistance from the federal government—a government which is being attacked by the party on the other side of the house as being allegedly “profligate” and “wasteful” in its expenditures because it has had to increase its budget in great measure to help the provinces. By the end of the decade the federal share would have gone down to 8 per cent, the provincial share would have gone to 47 per cent, and the industry's share would have been 45 per cent.
